TRIBUTE TO THE LATE SENATOR JOHN B. KENDRICK, BY SENATOR ASHURST

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, on the 27th day of April the senior Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST] wrote a letter to the junior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY] in which he paid so very eloquent and beautiful a tribute to the memory of the late Senator John B. Kendrick that I think it should be preserved in the RECORD. The letter is as follows:

APRIL 27, 1934.

Hon. JOSEPH C. O'MAHONEY,
United States Senator from Wyoming, Washington, D.C.

MY DEAR SENATOR O'MAHONEY: You were one of the closest friends our departed John B. Kendrick ever knew.

Romance and emprise clustered around him, and although his lips have now partaken of the sacraments of the dust, the influence of his character survives and is treasured by his relatives, his friends, and his proud State.

Senator Kendrick possessed that heaven-born attribute which the English call a "cool head" and the Americans call "judgment"; hence, in sharp parliamentary contests and stormy conventions, he held true to the main purpose, was master of himself and of the business at hand.

He was a practical idealist. Nature in one of her prodigal moods stamped upon him her royal seal.

Even when he viewed the swelling dome and the fluted pilasters of the Nation's Capitol he wistfully yearned for the far-away rim of the prairie.

Amidst the din and sensation of politics in Washington, he longed for his shining Tetons and his gorgeous Yellowstone. His nostrils were always eager for the pungent odor of the wild sage, and his kindly eyes ever sought to descry the scarlet glory of the blossoming cactus.

In public office he trod the paths of his feet with marvelous circumspection, and he was inspired by an ardent enthusiasm for the public good. He was a competent Governor, a successful and influential United States Senator. He was a real cowboy, and he became the most distinguished of all of those excellent and racy spirits who, 50 years ago, drove the thundering herds.

The cowboy's work, like a particolored robe, is so woven about Senator Kendrick that a word describing the cowboy he so truly typified may not be out of place here.

No belted knight in chivalry on heath or strand ever appealed with such allurement and glamour as did the American knights of the remuda.

Among the cowboys there were varying degrees of sophistication, for they were drawn from the different walks of life. The majority, however, were drawn from pioneer stock. The nature of the cowboy's occupation afforded him scant opportunity for extended reading, for he must needs constantly attend the cattle.

If this cow range was on the desert, he must grind its bitter dust between his teeth, endure its flail of heat, and ride on and on. If his range was on the mountain, he must, in winter, ride hard beneath the cold stars. The cowboy's life was one of severe isolation, but his work was not only made endurable but was even rendered pleasurable as well when he took refuge, as many, if not most of them, did, during their lonely rides, by entering into the realm of imagination, where ideal experiences are possible without objective restraint—a realm where images form and fall; where glittering towers upthrust themselves and globes of gold expand and float; a domain peopled with a viewless throng, invisible to all but the eye of the imaginer; and in this way a high percentage of the American cowboys became endowed with intellect and grace, fascination and tremendous personal charm.

Senator Kendrick symbolized the American cowboy—calm, steady, generous, fair, adaptable, industrious, and firmly devoted to the rugged old virtues which made our Nation great and strong.

With high esteem, sincerely yours,

HENRY F. ASHURST,
United States Senator from Arizona.

SALE AND DISTRIBUTION OF MILK AND DAIRY PRODUCTS

Mr. ASHURST submitted the following concurrent resolution (S.Con.Res. 15), which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce:

Whereas an audit made by the Agricultural Adjustment Administration has revealed that distributors in four of the largest milksheds in the United States, for the 5 years ended December 31, 1933, made a net profit of 25.71 percent on their net plant investment; and

Whereas this audit shows the net profits of distributors in each of the milksheds for the 5-year period to be: Philadelphia (distributors handling 85 percent of volume), 30.76 percent; Boston (distributors handling 75 percent of volume), 22.45 percent; St. Louis (distributors handling 67 percent of volume), 14.64 percent; and Chicago (distributors handling 90 percent of volume), 25.84 percent; and

Whereas during this same 5-year period the wholesale price of milk sold by farmers declined 50 percent, resulting in severe hardships and suffering to milk producers throughout the United States and strikes and violence in many rural and metropolitan centers; and

Whereas the aforesaid audit by the Agricultural Adjustment Administration has revealed net profits of milk distributors which tends to establish that similar conditions exist in other milksheds throughout the United States; and

Whereas an investigation in the District of Columbia pursuant to S.Res. 76, Seventy-third Congress, first session, revealed testimony which abundantly sustains the contention that over a period of years large milk distributors have attempted to create a monopoly in the District of Columbia, and largely as a result of these efforts farmers producing milk for the District of Columbia milkshed have received low returns for their product and have been placed at a serious disadvantage; and

Whereas the testimony adduced at hearings in the aforesaid investigation in the District of Columbia tends to prove that similar monopolistic efforts likewise exist in other milksheds in the Unted States; and

Whereas there is reason to believe that there exists a close tie between certain leaders of milk producers' cooperatives and milk distributors, which tie is unbeknown to milk producers and detrimental to their interests; and

Whereas the continuation of the practices now engaged in by milk distributors and certain leaders of milk cooperatives seriously endangers the efforts of the Agricultural Adjustment Administration and of the several States to alleviate and remedy the distress now wide-spread among dairy farmers in the United States, which distress if permitted to continue will result in the destruction of the already sorely pressed agricultural industry: Therefore be it

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Federal Trade Commission is authorized and directed to investigate conditions with respect to the sale and distribution of milk and other dairy products within the territorial limits of the United States by any person, partnership, association, cooperative, or corporation, with a view to determining particularly whether any such person, partnership, association, cooperative, or corporation is operating within any milkshed of the United States in such a manner as to substantially lessen competition or to tend to create a monopoly in the sale or distribution of such dairy products, or is a party to any conspiracy in restraint of trade or commerce in any such dairy products, or is in any way monopolizing or attempting to monopolize such trade or commerce within the United States or any part thereof, or is using any unfair method of competition in connection with the sale or distribution of any such dairy products, or is in any way operating to depress the price of milk sold by producers. The Federal Trade Commission shall report to the Senate as soon as practicable the result of its investigations, together with its recommendations, if any, for necessary remedial legislation.

MOTHER'S DAY STAMP

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I shall detain the Senate but 2 minutes.

Each of us received in his mail this morning a letter with the Mother's Day stamp, sponsored by the American War Mothers. This inaugurates a new thought in our postal history. I think we should congratulate the President and the Postmaster General that they have turned aside from the ordinary activities of official life to honor the mothers of America, and particularly the war mothers.

I need not enlarge upon the sacrifices made by this group of fine women. They now have an organization dedicated to the welfare of indigent war mothers. They seek in this organization to see that war mothers deprived of the aid given by sons lost in the war shall not suffer want and privation.

We are now approaching Mother's Day; and I thought we might well pause in our activities for one moment to pay tribute to these women, who made sacrifices which to my mind are even greater than the sacrifices of the men who died in the service.

WHAT THE NEW DEAL HAS DONE FOR WOMEN IN INDUSTRY

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. President, from time to time at this session or previous sessions of Congress I have believed it in the public interest to have included in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD statements of or tributes to leading American women of today. To such previous articles it is appropriate to add another.

Miss Mary Anderson, Chief of the Women's Bureau of the United States Department of Labor, for many reasons has received special appreciation for her public work. She is at all times a friend of women and has established a high personal and official reputation. In her official position she has enjoyed exceptional opportunities and has steadily striven for years to improve the lot of women, with necessary regard for those who, under the pressure of economic conditions or by reasoned preference, are today engaged in gainful employment.

On April 24, 1934, at the National Biennial Nursing Convention in Washington, D.C., Miss Anderson delivered an unusually timely address. This is an hour of searching scrutiny of certain admittedly experimental legislation of the present administration. The National Recovery Administration in some of its developments has produced divided judgments as to its value. Notably the effects of that administration's codes on industrial relations between employers and workers, and on price fixing by powerful business consolidations, if not monopolies, has aroused much anxiety. Whatever the conclusion, so far as the National Recovery Administration has opened the way to better industrial conditions for men, women, and children, credit should be given.

Miss Anderson is unusually qualified to discuss these industrial changes and did so in her address. In part, she referred to the recent emancipation of some women workers from sweatshop conditions under industrial codes adopted during the last year. She noted that about three fourths of such codes do not discriminate against women in regard to wages, and that men and women now, for the most part, have the same working hours. She directed attention to the significance for women of these developments.

I ask that Miss Anderson's discussion be placed in the RECORD as part of my remarks and that it may lie on the table.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WHAT THE NEW DEAL HAS DONE FOR WOMEN IN INDUSTRY

(Address by Miss Mary Anderson, Chief of the Women's Bureau)

Depressions are not new. Throughout our economic history there have been stoppages of work from time to time. What is new about the current depression is the fact that due to unbalanced economic conditions both at home and abroad we had, along with the rest of the world, practically reached the saturation point of production. We no longer had sufficient markets for the goods from our factories and mills.

In the years previous to the depression we had produced on a scale never before anticipated. We had gone gaily along saying that all that was necessary to prosperity was that more and more goods be produced. And had we thought more seriously about adequate methods of distribution of these goods, we should not so soon have reached the saturation point in regard to production. In reality, there has existed in this country not a state of overproduction but rather one of underconsumption, wherein many persons have been unable to purchase the goods to satisfy pressing needs.

We have generally taken for granted that our American standard of living is high, forgetting the hundreds of thousands of workers who have never been paid wages that would guarantee them economic security and adequate decent living conditions.

The Nation's wealth has never been distributed in such a way as to guarantee a sustained purchasing power for all our people, and then we permitted the wages of a considerable proportion of our people to slide so low as to bring about the kind of unbalanced condition that helped greatly to precipitate the depression.

In a country like ours we have to depend upon 90 percent of our products being purchased by our own people, foreign markets in the best years utilizing only 10 percent of the goods produced. It is essential, therefore, that our great national income, which is ample for all the people, shall be more equitably distributed for work performed so that the buying power of the whole Nation be maintained and our home markets kept open. From the point of view of the families of our land we should see to it that wages paid be sufficient to guarantee not only that none shall go hungry or barefooted or be without necessary clothing but that every family shall have the essentials for a well-rounded existence and that all children shall have opportunities for education to enable the coming generation to have a better chance to achieve the good and cultural things of life than the one that has preceded it. Such aims are part of any program to prevent depressions and to promote real progress in the future.

What part did women play or wherein did they fall short in enacting their role in the situation leading up to the present depression? During the so-called "period of high wages" following the World War, women still received $9, $10, $11 a week while working in many instances as long as 10 to 12 hours a day. To be sure, of the 11,000,000 women reported by the 1930 census as in gainful employment, all did not receive such low wages nor work for such long hours. But a sufficient number were employed under such conditions to constitute a telling proportion of all women workers, and these women through their wages were unable to achieve an adequate degree of economic security.

In fact, the competition of employers tapping an ever cheaper and cheaper labor supply—and women, because of economic necessity and weaker bargaining power than that of men, have formed the greatest part of that sort of labor supply—helped to bring about the depression.

To be sure, there were many other causes leading to this major economic disturbance of our times. But cheap woman power was one of the vital factors because the purchasing power of this large block of wage earners was not great enough to buy back the goods they produced.

Once under way the depression brought serious hardships to women workers. Their wages, never high, sank to the lowest ebb. It has not been uncommon during recent years for women to receive $2 or perhaps $3 in their pay envelopes at the end of a week of long hours of labor. If there was any work to be had, many women were glad to get it at these wages. Is it any wonder that our purchasing power sank to so low a level that it became necessary to supplement the inadequate wages of millions of workers with private or public relief?

The mushroom growth of sweatshops, so effectively illustrated by the Women's Bureau study of Connecticut sewing trades, became a startling reality in many sections of the country. Aided by the effective publicity given to the findings of the bureau study, women throughout the Nation became aroused and eager to study local situations. The Women's Bureau was besieged by requests that it make similar investigations in a wide range of places.

By this time the better employers themselves realized that they could not maintain decent employment standards and compete with the increasing horde of cutthroat manufacturers. They joined whole-heartedly in requesting the new administration to formulate plans effectively to curtail destructive competition. The national recovery program was the result.

One of the first industries to avail itself of the new legislation was cotton-textile manufacturing. This industry has been one of those hardest hit by the depression and for several years previous had agitated for national regulatory legislation. It is significant that this is a basic industry and one employing large numbers of women.

Other examples of groups of workers benefiting under the new deal are those of the thousands of employees in certain of the clothing industries which prior to the N.R.A. had been honeycombed with sweashop practices. The code for the coat-and-suit industry, signed in August of 1933, provided for a maximum work week of 35 hours and 5 days for both men and women in manufacturing processes. Guaranteed weekly minimum wages range from $22 to $47, according to occupation and section of the country. Piecework rates must yield from $0.53 to $1.30 per hour according to occupation and geographical section. An N.R.A. label must be attached to every garment made and distributed by plants operating under the provisions of this code.

The code for dress manufacturing also provides for the 35-hour and 5-day week. Though the basic minimum wage rates set are somewhat lower in general than those established for the coat-and-suit industry, they constitute a striking advance over wages paid in sweatshop dress factories a few months previous to the adoption of the code. And that the public may be able to make sure that garments purchased are manufactured under the conditions stipulated by the code, the Blue Eagle label is attached to each garment so produced.

Under the N.R.A., whenever codes have been formulated and presented for adoption, open hearings have been held where all with anything to contribute of factual material have been given a chance to present such data. When a code finally is approved it contains certain labor provisions which include a minimum wage, basic or maximum hours (usually 40 weekly), in some cases the prohibition or regulation of home work, and in almost every case the elimination of the labor of children under 16. To prevent the exploitation of workers as learners, many codes limit the number so employed and the period of apprenticeship.

There are certain problems so far as women are concerned that have come to the fore in the N.R.A. deliberations. The traditional low pay for women is one of the battling points in the making of the codes. Many codes as submitted by manufacturers for consideration by N.R.A. authorities provide that the general minimum wage shall be a specific amount but the females shall receive in the majority of cases from 10 to 15 percent less than this amount. In this regard no consideration is given to the fact that many women are doing the same work as men, that their work in many instances is as highly skilled as that done by men. The fact is overlooked that the minimum set is for unskilled labor and that no workers should be paid below the minimum set if purchasing power is really to be raised. And increased buying power is one of the major planks in the plan for the rehabilitation of industry.

It is true, of course, that many N.R.A. deputies will argue that they can persuade manufacturers to agree to a wage of 40 cents an hour for men and 35 cents an hour for women, and that even then women's wages are being raised considerably. Employers themselves, strangely enough, will second this argument, forgetting or ignoring the fact that it is because of the ruthless competition brought about by juggling wages and allowing women to undercut men that they found themselves in the position they occupied at the beginning of the depression. They are not yet in the habit of considering that they themselves would be better off if wages and hours were excluded from the competitive field between the sexes. If the same minimum should be adhered to for men and women alike, there would be plenty of opportunity to set different wages for types of skill, also irrespective of sex, above the minimum.

Wherever a proposed code has carried a sex differential there has been considerable pressure brought to bear by forces both within and without the N.R.A. for its elimination. It is significant that 75 percent of the codes carry no such differential despite the fact that heretofore women in general have been paid rates below those of men, in some industries from 25 to 50 percent less. The setting of a minimum irrespective of sex in about three fourths of the codes is, I feel, a tremendous gain. Such progress we should not overlook, even though we regret the other 25 percent of the codes that still carry a sex differential. Moreover, we must remember that where such inequality exists in a code, the difference between men's and women's wages is less than has been customary in the past. No amount of legislation and agitation in the past had been able to overcome these basic differences in the wages of men and women. When we consider that between 1920 and 1930 women in gainful employment increased by two and one quarter million we realize what an important part the elimination of so large a part of the sex differentials and the narrowing of others in the wages of workers can play in our industrial life.

Nevertheless, while we as women have cause to be encouraged through the formulation of the codes and their resultant benefits to women we do not want to feel that our job is done, with one fourth of the codes still allowing sex differentials. Also there is still a big army of women who are covered by no code who will themselves have to battle for better standards. It would be well if all women could do this in groups like the nurses, but we know that many individuals will have to fight alone unless they have the backing of other groups.

Another advantage, of course, that the N.R.A. has brought to women is that men and women are now working the same hours. Women cannot be exploited as a group through being forced to work for longer hours than men who in the past because of organization have been in a stronger economic position and better able to bargain for the 8-hour day.

Think of what is meant to thousands of women suddenly to find themselves in a situation they scarcely dared dream of because it seemed so improbable—employment with a really short work schedule. Think of the benefits short work hours bring to women by helping to prevent undue fatigue, safeguarding health, and increasing their efficiency. To the many women who are mothers and home makers and must perform two jobs, one in the home and one in the factory, short work hours give much additional needed time for care of home and family. For a vast majority of women in industry the new law means more leisure, more time to follow their own personal interests and pursuits, more time for relaxation, recreation, self-development, and culture.

There has been much talk recently about how workers are to spend their increased leisure. With the 8-hour day and 40-hour week the question of ways and means of using the time after the job does not constitute a problem with the great majority of workers, particularly the women who have the additional job of home making and who welcome extra and much-needed time for such duties. Our greatest concern at present is that these women shall actually have some real leisure time to afford them opportunity for educational and cultural interests and problems of citizenship.

Secretary Perkins, when asked about the question of increased leisure, said that personally she was not worried about the matter, as she felt that workers would use their leisure very well in their own way, and their ways of spending it would be much better than any she might devise for them.

In conclusion, let me state that through the national recovery program women in general have had a chance to achieve progress in a comparatively short time. It is significant that within the last year women have been appointed in larger numbers to positions of responsibility than ever before in recognition of their ability in specific fields.

I am sure that we shall all rejoice in the advance made, but we must never feel that the work is done. No; we need more extensive and ever-vigilant cooperation so that finally we shall have no distinctions as to sex, but the work of women as well as of men will be predicated upon ability. Nor can we rest content until opportunity and economic security are not only goals but realities for individual women in the great body of those gainfully employed or in need of gainful employment.

EXISTING GOVERNMENTAL TRENDS—ARTICLE BY MALCOLM W. BINGAY

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an illuminating and significant analysis of existing governmental trends from the pen of Malcolm W. Bingay, editor of the Detroit Free Press.

Mr. Bingay rises entirely above partisan considerations in his discussion; yet he points what I believe to be a correct and sustained admonition to administration leaders in behalf of the speediest possible consolidation of the recovery programs on a basis of rational stability. It is a viewpoint largely held in the country. It deserves to be articulate.

Regardless of the degree in which one may or may not concur with all of Mr. Bingay's colorful comments, it cannot fail to be helpfully stimulating to contact these sturdy views of an able editorial analyst.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Detroit Free Press of Tuesday, May 1, 1934]

A GROWING PUBLIC OPINION DEMANDS UNIFIED PROGRAM

By Malcolm W. Bingay

I have just returned from the annual meeting of the American Society of Newspaper Editors at Washington and the spring meetings of the Associated Press and the American Newspaper Publishers' Association in New York.

In these three gatherings will be found all the cross-currents of public opinion in America—from the Atlantic to the Pacific, from the greatest cities to the smallest hamlets, from the roaring industrial communities to the peaceful prairie lands.

And if my eyes and ears and mind were able to register the trend of thought in America today, it is this: A demand for sanity and a sweeping away of the emotionalism that surrounds the new deal.

All indications are that President Roosevelt is fully cognizant of this steady rolling up of a mighty public opinion.

From all walks of life there comes pounding in upon him a demand for a coherent and understandable program of action.

This is not a discussion of whether the swing is to the right or to the left. The consensus of opinion is that the time has come for a clearly charted course so that business man and workingman alike will know where we are going.

Our people are weary of programs that contradict each other.

That the President and his political advisers are aware of it is quite evident by the changed attitude from a year ago when we were last in Washington.

The administration is today plainly on the defensive. Gone is that absolute assurance that the Holy Grail of political truth has been found.

A year ago there was much talk about the great social revolution that was sweeping over us. Today everyone, from the President down, emphasizes until the purport becomes obvious, not rev-olution but ev-olution. The "r" has been dropped like a hot potato.

Now, if the new deal has gone through a period of transition and is to be purely an evolutionary process then nobody can quarrel with that. All civilization, all life, is an evolutionary process.

And like a chorus there comes from all the spokesmen of the administration: "We can do nothing against the will of the people. It is up to them to decide."

The dreams of some of the "brain trusters" of a regimented American life have faded—or at least have been pushed out of the public picture.

A YEAR AGO

No judgment should be reached on the Washington picture without taking into full consideration the situation that confronted the new President a year ago. It would be unfair to him and blinding to a sane understanding of our problems. Then the Nation was gripped with panic terror, our banks were collapsing like dominoes, one touching the other; business was paralyzed and chaos stalked the land.

Many moves were made in a case of desperate emergency. Nothing rallied America out of her depths of despond more than the calm sunny courage of our new leader. But that delirium of fear has now passed, the patient is convalescent and is eager to go places and do things.

MUST DEAL WITH INTANGIBLES

For an understanding we must again deal with the intangible values that go to make up a psychological study.

In this the big, the outstanding, significant fact is that the political divinity of Franklin D. Roosevelt no longer exists. That amazing hero worship which made of him a god, for the like of which we must go to Grecian mythology for comparison, is slowly orienting into an understanding that he is after all a human being. Glaring mistakes on the part of his "brain trust", for which he must stand responsible, have penetrated into the consciousness of the people, and they know now that he is not infallible.

This is the healthiest sign on the horizon.

I am sure that Mr. Roosevelt himself, as a practical politician, welcomes the change. He must take his place among the humans, as did Washington and Lincoln and Cleveland and Wilson, and other leaders who have gone through the agonies of leading a troubled Nation.

The reaction was natural: Out of the misery and terror of depression, to the wild hopes of an immediate millennium, then the disillusionment, and now the awakening to the facts.

Did he lead them with too high hopes or was that picture of the Promised Land necessary to arouse them from the depths of despond? That is aside from the present point, a something for the historians and the academicians to ponder on in the generations to come. We do know this, that a wise doctor promises a desperately sick patient many things that he knows in his own heart are not possible of realization.

By nothing herein contained do I mean to infer that the people have lost faith in Franklin D. Roosevelt, the man. He is still the hope of the Nation from the high skyscrapers of New York to the lowest cottage on the plains of Kansas; he is still the great faith of the great army of industrial workers, but it is now as a man with a man's limitations and not as a god. Miracles are no longer expected. That is why I feel that the change is a healthy one.

The rising tide of public opinion that can be sensed everywhere is not against the President but in a demand for a coherent program.

The main point is that the people are now ready to face a logically worked out program of action based on the hard grounds of practicability.

They are fed up with the theorists, each of whom contradicts all the others.

GREATEST STUMBLING BLOCKS

These theorists, these glib young gentlemen who glory in "showing off" their intellectual attainments, who can laugh at scars because they have never felt a wound—nor met a pay roll—are the great stumbling blocks to the success of President Roosevelt's second year, which must be one of constructive action.

These "smart alecs" are distrusted by the employers, the investors, the taxpayers, and the business men in general—large and small. And it is upon the faith of this latter group that the return of business is dependent. Though by no stretch of the imagination could anyone call Gen. Hugh Johnson a member of any "brain trust", yet his emotionalism, his strutting and swaggering, and his constant bellowing have done more damage than any of them. He has yowled about "cracking down" and "boycotting" and has given voice to other un-American expressions that have completely distorted the whole vision of the N.R.A. program.

What can the average business man, whether he is running a great motor factory or a peanut stand, think when he reads such contradictions as these:

General Johnson tells the National Retail Dry Goods Association:

"Keep prices down for God's sake. Keep prices down. That and that alone is the royal road to recovery."

And a few days later Professor Warren, the so-called "gold expert", equally close to the President, tells a Senate committee:

"By raising prices profits accrue. It becomes easier to pay taxes. Since it starts business, prices will rise."

A REASON FOR THE CONFUSION

Such citations of contradictions are endless. And, I think, there is a reason for all the confusion. It lies in the temperament of the President himself. Let me explain.

The greatest weakness Herbert Hoover had as President was that he insisted on doing everything himself. It was not that he did not trust others, it was his temperament, developed from years of being the lone guiding hand in many engineering exploits. He could not delegate authority or tasks.

The greatest weakness, as I am given to understand it, of Mr. Roosevelt is that he delegates too much to others. Only when a great crisis confronts him, as in the case of Jimmy Walker and the threatened automotive strike, does he reveal his granite side.

Then, too, he is a practical politician. I say this in the highest sense of the dictionary meaning. He has been in politics from the time he left college. The fundamental principle of all politics is to be loyel to those who are loyal to you. Roosevelt instinctively likes people who like him. And he is loyal to them, sometimes to his own detriment.

When he took over the reins of Government, he had gathered around him these bright young men. The wine of success had gone to their heads. They loved to pose and say clever things that would attract attention. That all went with the show.

MOLEY DROPPED EASILY

Raymond Moley was the first shining star. He permitted himself to be advertised by a newspaper syndicate as "the most important man on earth." Deftly, Roosevelt dropped him into an easy editorial job. But they are still friends.

Another example is this General Johnson, who bears the rank of a general but talks like a hard-boiled top sergeant. He has been allowed too much rein. He has angered and exasperated and terrorized business men whose whole-hearted support he could have had if he had shown the slightest understanding of the amenities of human relationships.

During the war he made a record handling the draft. During the war if his orders were not immediately obeyed the one who failed to obey could be taken out and shot. It is not on record that Henry Ford has been court-martialed as yet, though the loud-mouthed general bellowed around as though he were about to be.

When the newspapers of America, from the biggest dailies to the smallest weeklies, insisted that they would sign no code that did not guarantee the freedom of the press, it was the abuse heaped on them by General Johnson that made them more determined than ever to go to jail rather than waive the constitutional rights to free speech and a free press. The more the general bellowed, the more certain they were of sinister motives.

Finally, after months of battle against what they felt was an effort to license the press—as in Italy and Germany—the President signed the code with the constitutional provision guaranteed. But it was signed with a shocking and gratuitous insult.

It said that freedom of the press did not mean "freedom to work children or do business in a fire trap or violate the laws against obscenity, libel, and lewdness."

Probably no other sentence ever written so quickly aroused America to the manner in which we were drifting. It was the beginning of the end of the first phase of the new deal. It was the realization that great major issues were being handled by irresponsible people.

The working of children, of course, meant the newsboys. I sold papers myself as a kid and so did General Johnson. So have most boys. Nobody ever considered that as child labor.

As for fire traps, any Detroiter has but to look at the buildings erected by The Detroit Free Press, The Detroit News, and The Detroit Times to see how wicked that line was. And so it is in every other city. The newspaper plants are generally the finest buildings in the town. It is a matter of pride. And if there were any fire traps it would not be up to the President of the United States or General Johnson or the Federal Government, but to the State to eliminate them. So would any violation of the laws of libel or obscenity or lewdness.

Here was temper gone rampant. The reaction was terrific.

JOHNSON "TAKES THE RAP"

Last week before the assembled editors General Johnson "took the rap." The editors let him understand without mincing words that they resented the false accusations.

Arthur Sinnott, brilliant editor of the Newark Evening News and for many years a Washington correspondent, got the answer from the general that we wanted.

"Our main kick", said Sinnott, speaking for the editors of the country, "is that you are shooting too fast. It makes us all dizzy. You are trying to get heaven on earth—a code for this and a code for that. Give us a breathing spell. For example, I did not know, nor did anybody in this room, that the newspaper trade was a sweatshop."

"Who said that it was?" barked back Johnson, who had been on the defensive all afternoon.

"I think", answered Sinnott, "that it emanated from the White House."

The general grinned sheepishly, hesitated, and then said very quietly:

"I will take the responsibility for that. It was not the White House. I drafted that. It was very unfortunate. I am sorry for it. It was maladroitness of expression."

NOT ROOSEVELT'S WORDS

I have dwelt at length on this to make a specific point clear. President Roosevelt is too keen-minded politically to have said such a stupid thing. Further, he has charm and culture, neither of which are attributes of General Johnson. Yet he is presented to the country as having said it.

The editors of America have voices and typewriters. They can make their thoughts articulate. And so the general apologizes.

But a little merchant somewhere in New England put a sign in his window in which he sought to make use of the same Constitutional provision of free speech. The whole power of the Federal Government in the hands of General Johnson "cracked down" on him because he had the temerity to speak his mind about the N.R.A.

A United States Senator, CARTER GLASS, can call the Blue Eagle a blue buzzard and order it out of his shop without being molested.

FORD IGNORES EAGLE AND THREATS

Henry Ford can calmly ignore the Blue Eagle, though wildly threatened with all sorts of dire results. But a tailor in New Jersey is sent to jail for 30 days because he pressed a man's pants for a nickel less than the code said he should.

Multiply these incidents thousands of times and you have an explanation of the rising tide of public opinion throughout America.

The people are weary of the experimenters, the poseurs, the theorists, the highbrows who alone can understand what they are talking about.

They want action, clear-cut, tangible, understandable action.

There is not one word of criticism of Franklin D. Roosevelt. They know how he led them out of the terrors of a year ago. They have still unshaken faith in him. But they feel that the time has come for something to begin to jell.

They know that among his intimates President Roosevelt is known as "the skipper."

And steadily across this continent there is growing more articulate the voice of the people, and that voice is saying in essence:

"Skipper, for God's sake take the helm yourself and toss these amateur navigators overboard."

RECIPROCAL TRADE TREATIES

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a statement made on May 1, 1934, before the Finance Committee of the Senate by the Honorable Matthew Woll, opposing authorization to our entering into reciprocal trade treaties with foreign nations by reducing tariff rates and removing present import restrictions.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The question before the Congress, in the authorization to the President to enter into reciprocal trade treaties with foreign nations without public hearings and with ratification of any such treaties by the Senate, is rather simple.

The question is, Shall we change our present course and seek to increase the purchasing power of foreign nations, or shall we continue to seek to increase the purchasing power of our own people?

During the past few years the American people have spent billions of dollars in an effort to eliminate the present depression, to increase purchasing power, to provide employment opportunities for America's workers, and to make possible a profitable market for the products of America's farms and mines.

The proponents of this legislation contend that an increase of some $3,000,000,000 in our export trade will lift us out of the present depression. However, they also contend that, in order to make possible the exporting of these $3,000,000,000 worth of articles and commodities, we must import additional billions of dollars worth of foreign commodities and merchandise.

The proponents point to our export trade of 1929. They seemingly neglect or forget the conditions which made possible the exporting of some $5,000,000,000 worth of American products in 1929. They neglect to point out that large portions of those exports were paid for in I O U's or with money which our people had loaned to foreign nations and foreign nationals. They neglect to point out that most of the bonds which we purchased have defaulted in their interest payments and greatly depreciated in value. They fail to point out that most of the I O U's have been charged off to losses, to the greater loss of our Government in the form of tax collections. More important, they fail to point out that these exportations of $5,000,000,000 were based upon a price structure of about twice what current prices of the same articles and commodities were in 1932.

In 1929 we received an average of 19 cents per pound for the cotton we exported, while the average price we received for our exports of cotton for 1932 was only 7 cents per pound; we averaged 26 cents per pound for our exports of tobacco in 1929, while during the year 1932 we averaged only 16 cents per pound on the tobacco we exported; we averaged $1.25 per bushel for our exported wheat in 1929, while in 1932 we averaged only 60 cents per bushel for the wheat which we exported; we averaged 12½ cents per pound for the packing-house lard we exported in 1929, while in 1932 we averaged less than 6 cents per pound on our exports of lard. In 1929 we received 18 cents per pound for our exports of cotton, while in 1932 we received but 6 cents per pound for the copper we exported. In 1929 we received $1 per bushel for our exports of corn, while in 1932 we received only 35 cents per bushel for our exported corn.

The drop in the export value of these six commodities is but 50 percent, while the drop in the purchasing power of the workers amounted to 60 percent.

Naturally, with the price structure prevailing in 1929, our exports in value amounted to $5,000,000,000, especially when, in many cases, we received in payment, not cash, but some form of payment which in too many cases we have yet to realize upon.

America's industrial workers, opposing entry into reciprocal trade treaties with foreign nations without first having the opportunity of a public hearing, and, secondly, without ratification by the Senate of any treaties entered into with foreign nations, contend that our one assurance of safety, our assurance of providing employment opportunities of America's unemployed millions, our assurance of providing and of maintaining a market for the products of our farmers, lies in substantially increasing the mass purchasing power of our 50,000,000 workers.

The Census of Manufactures reports that those engaged in or employed in manufacturing industries in the United States in 1929 received in wages some eleven and a half billions of dollars; salaries paid in the same industries were some three and a half billions of dollars; with some thirty-six and a half billions paid for materials and containers, or a total of some $52,000,000,000.

It is quite generally understood that the present administration seeks to restore the price levels and conditions which existed in 1926.

Table 325, Employment and Payroll Indexes in Manufacturing Industries, as shown in the Statistical Abstract of the United States, 1933, published by the Department of Commerce, based on an index for 1926 of 100, shows that the 1929 index for pay rolls in these manufacturing industries was 100.5. The index for 1932 for pay rolls in the same industries had dropped to 41.6.

In other words, those engaged in or employed in our manufacturing industries alone suffered a loss in purchasing power of from $52,000,000,000 to some $20,000,000,000. Instead of chasing this lost $3,000,000,000 in export trade (based upon the price structure of 1929) we believe it safer, saner, and more constructive to bend our energies toward regaining this lost $30,000,000,000 of purchasing power, formerly possessed by those employed in or engaged in manufacturing industries alone.

The compilation I have just cited pertains only to manufacturing industries.

This compilation does not include those employed in or engaged in steam and electric railways; in mining, quarrying, or oil production and refining; in building; in wholesale or retail trade in hotels; in canneries, etc. We understand that the wages and salaries paid to those employed in or engaged in these nonmanufacturing groups amounted to more than $12,000,000,000 in 1929.

We know that the loss in purchasing power, of 1932, as compared with 1929, was as great as that suffered by those in the manufacturing industries.

The Statistical Abstract of the United States for 1933 contains a table showing the estimated gross income of American farms for 1929 and for 1932.

We note that this shows the income for 1929 at some $12,000,000,000, while for 1932 it was some $5,000,000,000, or, in round figures, a drop in purchasing power for those located on American farms of some 60 percent from that of 1929. Thus, the drop in purchasing power of those employed in or engaged in manufacturing and nonmanufacturing industries and of the farmers was practically the same.

We find that the 1929 purchasing power of some $75,000,000,000, possessed by the three groups which I have just referred to, had dropped to some $30,000,000,000 in 1932.

It is contended by those who wish to experiment with these reciprocal trade treaties with foreign nations that in order to enlarge our exports we must enlarge our imports.

What are those articles or commodities which those representing the United States in these bargaining tariffs will agree to facilitate the importation of, without injury to the employment opportunities of America's workers, or the destruction of the market in the United States, for the products of the American farms?

The press reports that farm organizations have been led to believe that importations of farm commodities will not be increased under these proposed reciprocal trade treaties. Is this possible?

Can we enter into reciprocal trade treaties with any nation on the American continent without accepting from such nations farm products?

Canada, Mexico, Argentina, Brazil, Patagonia, to mention but a few, have surplus dairy and cattle products; other nations have surplus fruits, vegetables, sugar, etc.

All of these farm products of these foreign nations are produced at total costs which are so much less than the costs which prevail on American farms that the prices which the American farmers would be forced to accept for domestic products in competition with the products imported as a result of our entering into reciprocal trade treaties will decline and that the American farmers would be worse off than they are today.

When we look at Europe, what do we find? With few exceptions they have, or they can easily arrange to have, a surplus of industrial products which they may be willing and anxious to trade to us in return for some of our surplus farm products.

In the case of most of the industrial products of Europe the labor costs of production is so much lower than the labor costs of similar goods which are the products of America's workers, that hundreds of thousands of our industrial workers would necessarily be deprived of employment opportunities. Again, and well worth your having in mind, is the fact that capital is very mobile. Already we have a number of American factories in foreign countries. Not only would these factories be supplying that foreign trade, which only a few years ago was supplied with the product of American labor, but we believe that even the American trade might be furnished with the products of these branch factories, located where the concern has the benefit of cheap labor costs.

In such a situation both America's industrial and agricultural workers would lose the benefits which they now have of the purchasing power of those industrial workers who would necessarily be deprived of employment.

Stressing the point further, what are those surplus products which it is claimed we must dispose of in foreign markets?

Short-staple cotton? Ordinarily we produce some 5,000,000 bales of cotton more than we can market in our own country. However, much of this trouble is not due to loss in our exports, as the figures show that our exports of cotton for 1932 was 9,058,000 bales, while for 1929 we exported 7,581,000 bales. The loss of the domestic market to products of cotton is due in part at least to the development of the rayon industry. Congress has just enacted legislation which restricts the production of cotton to some 10,000,000 bales annually, or, with any increase in our purchasing power, to such a figure that the cotton planters won't have to worry about the export market.

Insofar as it is legislatively possible, you have already eliminated the need of looking for foreign markets in which to dispose of our surplus cotton production.

We have a surplus ordinarily of about 20 percent of the wheat which we produce. Eighty percent of our wheat is sold in the domestic market, and, we understand, that we, American consumers, pay some 15 cents per bushel more for our wheat than is paid for the same type of wheat the foreigners buy from us.

We have tried to obtain a fair compilation of the net prices which the American farmer secures for his farm products as compared with the selling price plus transportation costs of similar farm products from other agricultural countries without success.

We believe that if such a compilation was prepared, it would show that with the higher standards of living which ordinarily prevail in our own country the American farmer nets far more than he would through our entry into reciprocal trade treaties with foreign countries, which, as we view it, means the forced unemployment of additional hundreds of thousands of America's industrial workers.

A hue and cry is raised from time to time of the necessity of our increasing our sales of American automobiles in foreign countries. It is claimed that we can undersell the foreigners in their own countries, owing to some supposed wizardry which we possess.

This is not true. We can undersell the foreign producers of automobiles solely because of the vast market for automobiles which exists in our own country.

Not alone is this true, but several of the large American automobile producers now possess plants in foreign countries. Will it be contended that they will dismantle these foreign plants and supply any increased trade which they might secure with the products of Detroit, Cleveland, etc.?

Realizing the necessity at this time of instilling confidence and eliminating fear as much as possible, we believe that the authorization to initiate and conclude reciprocal trade treaties with foreign governments, without hearings to those affected, and without final ratification dependent upon action of the Senate, will result in employers of labor hesitating or refusing to produce except for immediate sale, which means increasing unemployment for America's industrial workers.

INTERNAL REVENUE TAXATION—CONFERENCE REPORT

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma and Mr. HARRISON addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, will the Senator from Oklahoma yield?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, I understand there is some very important and urgent business to be transacted immediately. Because of that fact, I ask unanimous consent to yield the floor in order to permit the transaction of important and urgent business, with the understanding that when it shall have been concluded I may retake the floor.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, do I understand the Senator from Oklahoma asks to be recognized following the disposition of the conference report?

Mr. HARRISON. That is, as I understand, what the Senator from Oklahoma is requesting. He is willing, generously, to yield the floor until the conference report shall have been disposed of.

Mr. McNARY. Of course, it is a rather unique request; I do not care for the practice; but, if the Senator from Oklahoma had the floor yesterday——

Mr. HARRISON. He did.

Mr. McNARY. And he yields for this purpose only——

Mr. HARRISON. Yes.

Mr. McNARY. I shall make no objection.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Oklahoma had the floor last evening when the Senate went into executive session, and the Chair thought that he ought to recognize that Senator this morning. Now the Senator from Oklahoma desires, as the Chair understands, to yield for a certain purpose to enable the Senate to transact certain business, with the assurance that he will have recognition at the end of that time. He asks unanimous consent to that effect. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. HARRISON. I ask unanimous consent that the conference report on the revenue bill be laid before the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the conference report on the bill, the title of which will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. A bill (H.R. 7835) to provide revenue, equalize taxes, and for other purposes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The conference report was read yesterday and appears in the proceedings of the Senate on page 7879 of the RECORD of Wednesday, May 2, 1934. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I simply wish the Senator from Mississippi to explain the present status of the so-called "consolidated returns provision."

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, the only change made in the provision providing for the abolition of consolidated returns is that railroads are excepted; so that the railroads, as common carriers, may file consolidated returns. In doing so, of course, the 2-percent penalty is imposed upon them. That is the only change.

Mr. BORAH. Otherwise, the provision stands as adopted by the Senate?

Mr. HARRISON. Absolutely.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, I am unable to support the motion to adopt the conference report because it still contains the provision taxing Filipino coconut oil, as Senators will recall.

Day before yesterday, May 1, the Philippine Legislature accepted the bill which provides for Filipino independence. There is no doubt in the world that when the Congress passed the bill there was an implied covenant, if not an express one, that the terms upon which they could secure their independence were as promulgated and set forth in that measure. They are a weak country as compared with the United States. We gave them our word that if they would do certain things and comply with certain conditions, independence would be theirs. Hardly is the ink dry on that document than we have changed the whole tenor and purpose and import of our agreement with those people.

Let me point out—and I hope Senators will listen to this one remark—that under the terms of the Philippine independence bill we virtually reduce by 40 percent their imports to the United States. In the matter of cordage alone we assumed they were importing 3,000,000 pounds into this country each year. We thought the figure had reference to pounds. As a matter of fact, it has reference to kilograms. In other words, they are importing three and a fraction kilograms a year, or about 6,000,000 pounds. Yet under the terms of the independence bill we cut their imports 40 percent, on the average, with reference to sugar, coconut oil, and cordage or hemp. That is a tremendous economic obstacle which they must overcome in order to get their independence.

Think what it would mean to us in the United States if 40 percent of our trade in our three major industries were taken away overnight. We question their ability to govern themselves in one breath, and then in the next breath we make it well-nigh impossible for them to govern themselves.

But bad as that situation is in the independence bill, which was written largely with an eye to our own rather than the Filipino interest insofar as its economic provisions were concerned, now we propose to further curtail the imports of Filipino products which are not produced in the United States proper. It is nothing more or less, in its naked truth, than an attempt on the part of some political farmers here in Washington to tax one part of the people under the American flag for the benefit of other people under the same flag. It is dishonest, it is unfair, and it violates our express promise in the Philippine independence bill itself.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. TYDINGS. I yield.

Mr. LONG. I understood that was not a matter on which the Senate yielded, but a matter upon which the House yielded.

Mr. TYDINGS. It does not make any difference who has yielded or who has not yielded; the Senate and the House together have incorporated in the bill a provision which violates the terms of the Philippine Independence Act. Suppose the Filipinos were to violate the terms of the independence act, what would we say? We would rise in the Senate and denounce them as people who do not keep their word. Can we afford to pursue a course which reflects discredit and dishonor on the Congress of the United States? In the Philippine independence bill we take away 40 percent of their imports; and then at the very time when they are about to start on the long and perilous and troublesome road to independence, we propose to take away more of their imports through the process of taxation, and this, forsooth, under the guise that it will help the American farmer.

A calculation has been made which shows that a farmer will get one half cent more per hundred pounds of beef or 5 cents more per thousand pounds of beef as a result of this tax. So little is necessary to enable the Congress to forget its word to those people away over on the other side of the earth! For 5 cents per thousand pounds of beef we violate our agreement with the Filipino people!

They have no voice in this Chamber. They have to take exactly what we give them. The people in my State want this tax, but I do not believe those who want it are informed about the provisions of the Philippine independence bill or the small advantages which will come to them.

I appeal to Senators to reject the conference report. I appeal to Senators to keep their word with the people of the Philippines. The United States should not give its word and then break it if it wants to remain in a position to criticize the breaking of word by any other nation. The United States must come into court with clean hands if it wants to criticize others who may break their word on occasion.

But lo and behold, bad as all these things are, within the next 2 weeks we are going to have a reciprocal tariff bill in the Senate for which, perhaps, we are all going to vote. In 2 weeks there will come here a bill intended to revive world trade, and yet we are at the same time endeavoring to deprive the Philippines of this opportunity to trade with us. Where is there any consistency, logic, honor, principle, or anything else in such a system?

Letters have come here from the President of the United States to the chairman of the committee asking him not to put this provision in the bill and stating that it breaks the word of our Government. Letters have come from the Secretary of War, and letters have come from the Governor General of the Philippines. But the lobby is here to get it through, and what does our word amount to when the lobby is here?

What are we going to gain by it? The Filipinos are the best customers for the cotton goods of the United States. They buy $16,000,000 worth of cotton goods a year. We have just passed a bill to cut down cotton acreage because we cannot sell our surplus cotton, and now we are about to adopt an amendment which will destroy the purchasing power of the best customer we have for cotton goods. Let the farmers in the South know that the amendment destroys the market for $16,000,000 worth of cotton goods a year, the market of the leading cotton-goods customer of the United States. Let those farmers know that the Philippines buy more dairy products from the United States than any other country in the world. We have bills here to take care of the dairy interests, and yet at the same time we undertake to destroy the best foreign customer we have for the products of the dairy interests.

Does anyone in his right mind hold to the opinion that once the producing power of the Filipino people shall be curtailed, as it will be curtailed under the provisions of the conference report, there will be no less dairy products sold to them than they now purchase from us? Does any man claim that when this conference report shall be adopted there will be as much cotton goods sold to the Filipino people as are now sold? Of course not.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. TYDINGS. I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. In just what form does the amendment with reference to the Philippines come back to the Senate?

Mr. TYDINGS. It retains the excise tax of 3 cents.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. TYDINGS. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. As I understand—and I should like to be corrected if I am in error—the conference report contains the language on that subject just as it was adopted by the Senate.

Mr. TYDINGS. I have not read it; but that is my understanding.

Mr. NORRIS. Will the Senator from Mississippi answer that question—or perhaps the Senator from Michigan can answer it?

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, I may say, in response to the query of the Senator from Nebraska, that the only difference is that the House yielded on the 3-cent tax on copra and coconut oil and other oils from the Philippine Islands, and we yielded on the 5-cent tax from other countries than the Philippines, so they have 2 cents a pound differential.

Mr. NORRIS. I was wondering if the conference report now contains the language contained in the bill as it passed the Senate in regard to the payment of the tax into the Philippine treasury.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me——

Mr. TYDINGS. I yield to the Senator from Mississippi in order to elicit the information.

Mr. HARRISON. Of course, the Senator from Maryland understands my position, and knows how I opposed this proposal; but the Senate conferees tried to carry out the wishes of the Senate with reference to the matter.

No change was made with reference to the payment into the treasury of the Philippines of the tax collected on coconut oil from the Philippines. The only difference in this respect was that one or two oils—perilla oil and halibut-fish oil, I believe—were eliminated. I will state what the main difference was; and we did this in order to help the Philippines. There was not very much that the conferees could do, as the Senator appreciates.

The House had adopted an amendment putting a 5-cent tax on coconut oil and sesame oil. The Senate had put a 3-cent tax on coconut oil and on sesame oil, as well as on many other oils that were said to be interchangeable. What we did in conference was not to change the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska, but we provided that coconut oil coming to the United States from any country except the possessions of the United States—Guam, the Philippines, and so forth—should bear a 5-cent tax, but coconut oil coming from the Philippines should bear a 3-cent tax. In other words, the Philippine people have a differential of 2 cents a pound on coconut oil, and we are told by the experts that that will give them a practical monopoly of the importation of coconut oil into the United States.

The Senator from Nebraska will recall, as well as the Senator from Maryland, that in the discussion here it was shown that about 150,000,000-plus pounds of coconut oil come into the United States every year from countries other than the Philippines. So the conference report will give to the Philippines a complete monopoly in sending coconut oil to the United States because of this differential, and they will be given back the tax that is collected on the product from the Philippine Islands.

Mr. TYDINGS. The tax will be given back to the Government, but it will be permanently taken away from the producers.

In the short while I have been in Congress I have heard much about the abuse of power. I never saw Morgan use a more ruthless method of taking care of his own interests, or Wall Street or anyone else, without regard to justice or written agreements or fairness, than the American Congress has used in this instance. Having the ability to carry out what it desires with sheer brutality, it overrides these poor, weak people, who are under the same flag which floats over us.

I have heard much about the ruthlessness of power. My God! Can a more ruthless exhibition of power be found anywhere than that we give, after having taken 40 percent of the imports away from these people under the independence bill, when, in spite of our plighted word, we stab them in the back, tax their farmers, and destroy their markets? It cannot be justified on the basis of honor. It cannot be justified on the basis of fairness. Every Senator here knows our action is unfair, whether he supports it or opposes it.

The fact that we take this money and give it back to the Filipinos is no justification at all for taxing their farmers. It is an invasion of their own taxing rights. We have no right whatsoever to tell the Filipino people how to run their own internal affairs; and, forsooth, while the effort was made to soften the blow by giving the tax back to the Filipino government, the fact remains that the farmer over there in the coconut industry has been penalized for an illusory gain to the American farmer.

There is no tariff at all on tallow. This action is supposed to help the farmers who produce tallow. The irony of the matter is that we tax one part of the American people and keep tallow on the free list. The whole thing is a monstrosity. It is illogical. It is inconsistent. It is unjust. It is dishonorable; and no other word will fit it.

I doubt if there will be any revenue to give back. The purpose of this action is to exclude Filipino products, not to raise revenue. It is false in its very trappings. It comes in here in disguise. It is the voice of Jacob, but the hand of Esau. It will be to the everlasting shame of the American Congress that, simply because, forsooth, a political farmers' lobby made the farmers believe there was some imaginary benefit in this proposal, the Congress stuck its tail between its legs and ran down the legislative alley with this dishonorable tin can dragging behind it. [Laughter.]

Talk about the ruthlessness of corporations attacking the poor and the downtrodden. Talk about Wall Street and all its power. Let those words never be heard again in this body, because nobody has been more ruthless or unfair or unjust or dishonorable than we are about to be in putting the stamp of approval on this nefarious measure.

I believe that in the inner consciousness of every Senator in this Chamber, when he considers this matter over in the light of his own conscience, he must know, if he has any conscience, that it is unfair, that it is dishonorable, that we are breaking our contract. I do not have to put forth my word for that. The President of the United States says we are breaking our contract. The Secretary of War says we are breaking our contract. Are we to break it again in the next session of Congress by taxing some other Filipino product? If this procedure is logical and right, why not tax them all before independence actually comes about? Why did we put certain provisions in the Independence Act if we did not mean to abide by them? What was the use of having a debate about the matter if the conditions upon which Filipino independence were predicated were to be so soon brushed aside, and that only 2 days after they had accepted our agreement for the accomplishment of Filipino independence?

Even so, if this were a revenue tax, we might justify it on some vague ground; but this is a tariff tax and nothing else, put on to exclude an article which we do not produce in the United States.

Senators know that these are true words. They know that the purpose of this tax was not to raise revenue. It is a legislative lie on its face. Senators know that it is one of the most ruthless exhibitions of legislative power toward a defenseless and unrepresented people that is to be found in the history of this or any other country. They know that there is no justification for it except that a number of political farmers running around in the lobby here have perhaps frightened some Senators and Representatives or are at least taking the sharp edge off their otherwise good judgment.

The president of the Philippine Senate, Hon. Manuel L. Quezon, says:

> If the bill is so altered that we must ship both copra and oil into the United States, then the amount of business which can be done by our oil mills in the Philippines will be so small that they will not be able to carry on. The total amount of oil which we could ship to the United States under the Tydings-McDuffie bill would be 448,000,000 pounds. If this be cut in half, we could then ship only 224,000,000 pounds of oil, whereas our Philippine mills actually shipped to the United States last year in the form of oil 316,000,000 pounds.

Showing how we cut down their oil under the Independence Act. But here is the significant thing for the farmers of the South to bear in mind: I quote from the statement of the Secretary of War, in which is to be found this pregnant paragraph:

> The Philippine Islands stand first as purchasers of United States dairy products with which coconut oil is alleged to compete.

They are the first customers for the dairy farmers of the West, and of Maryland, and of the Northeast, and of the South.

The Secretary of War proceeds:

> Our dairy industry should not overlook this fact when it advocates an excise tax which presumably will adversely affect our export market for dairy products.

Here is another thing:

> The Philippines also stand first in the purchase of United States cotton textiles.

We have just passed a bill to cut down cotton acreage because there is a surplus of cotton and no market for it. Now we are beginning to destroy the purchasing power of the first American customers outside our borders. They buy more cotton textiles than any other country in the world; and we are destroying their purchasing power, making it absolutely mandatory that they buy less, while at the same time we recognize that we have more cotton here than we can possibly sell.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator if it is not a fact that the Filipinos buy more cotton textiles from Japan than they buy from this country?

Mr. TYDINGS. I have not the figures as to Japan, but I have the figures showing that the Filipinos buy more from us than from any other country in the world. If this conference report should be adopted, I should not be surprised if they would buy all their textiles from Japan; and they would have a right to do it in the face of our dishonor and the violation of our plighted word. The way to make them buy less is to follow the policy we are now pursuing.

The Secretary of War continues:

> Other items of importance are tobacco products—

Of course, they are manufactured in the cities. New York and Philadelphia, Pittsburgh and Baltimore are the big tobacco producers of the Nation. Tobacco is a city product. The loss in the purchase of tobacco produced in America will hurt the people in the cities only. It will not hurt the farmers, because tobacco is not raised on the farm. [Laughter.]

> Other items of importance are tobacco products, paper, rubber, iron and steel, electrical and sugar-mill machinery, automobiles, chemicals, drugs, books, etc. A complete list of the articles imported into the Philippine Islands from the United States would embrace almost the entire list of articles raised and produced in this country. All of these goods are admitted to the Philippine Islands free of duty.

We do not allow the products of the Philippines to come in, except in certain definite amounts, but we compel them to take all our products free of duty.

> I repeat that any restriction in the use of coconut oil in the United States would have a correspondingly adverse effect on Philippine purchases from the United States. Coconut oil ranks second in value of Philippine products sent to the United States.

Mr. President, that, roughly, is the issue. We have given them our word that they could have independence under certain definite terms and conditions. Are we to have so little regard for our word that a few people who represent a lobby here in Washington can point their fingers at us and scare us into violating our word?

We always talk about nations breaking their treaties, and we are about to break one, not with a foreign nation but with a people even now under the American flag.

We say we are trying to help the farmers, yet we are destroying the purchasing power of the best purchasers of our farm products.

We say we are trying to help the cotton farmers; yet we are destroying the market of the best customer, outside of our own country, for cotton textile goods.

We say we are trying to help the dairy farmer; yet we are destroying the market of the best customer in all the world for the products of the dairy farms of the United States.

We are to have before us in a week or 10 days a reciprocal tariff bill, when the measure before us violates every principle of trade reciprocity.

The provision I am discussing is found in the revenue bill, and it is an embargo measure, designed to exclude Philippine products.

Over and above it all, however, may I say in conclusion that we made an agreement with a weak people, a brown people, living half-way around the earth, and on the very day when they accept our agreement we break it. We, a great, strong Nation, are about to exhibit the most ruthless manifestation of dishonor and force and coercion ever recorded in legislative annals.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I hope the report will now be agreed to, unless there are some questions to be asked me about it. Then I shall ask that the Senate recede as to amendment numbered 13.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CONNALLY in the chair). The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I move that the Senate recede from its amendment numbered 13. That is the amendment put into the bill by the Senate imposing a tax of 10 percent on normal taxes, surtaxes, and so on. The Senate conferees were unable to carry their point, and the House, by a yea-and-nay vote, rejected the amendment. The senior Senator from Michigan [Mr. COUZENS], I understand, desires to speak on the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Mississippi, that the Senate recede from its amendment numbered 13.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, amendment numbered 13—and perhaps the number in this case proved to be unlucky—is the amendment we put in the revenue bill before we passed it on the 13th of April, providing an addition of 10 percent on all net income taxes, to be paid by individuals during the calendar year 1934, not to be payable, however, until March 15, 1935.

So far as I am concerned, I shall not ask the Senate to insist further upon its amendment. The conferees on the part of the Senate, I think, did a very good piece of work in getting the House conferees to agree to nearly every important amendment we inserted in the bill in the Senate; the exception was the 10-percent amendment. It seems to me, however, in view of the publicity that was given to this proposal throughout the country, and particularly because of the vicious attitude taken by the Hearst papers, it is time that somebody replied to that system of yellow journalism.

I wish to compliment the American Congress for never having fallen for the stupid and unscientific general sales tax, in spite of the years and years of propaganda for it. I think Congress is to be commended because in the consideration of this particular revenue bill no one had the temerity to rise and offer an amendment to incorporate a general sales tax, so as to relieve the large income taxpayers.

Mr. Hearst, having a very enormous income, of course seriously objected to our elimination of consolidated returns, and of course objected to any raising of the income taxes.

When the Senate adopted the 10-percent amendment, Mr. Hearst organized a new party, entitled "The New Demagogic Party.' It seems strange to me that when one of us has the temerity to take the side of the less privileged of our citizens; when we plead for the under dog, so to speak; when we adopt a liberal attitude toward those who are less privileged, we are called demagogues. But when we rise and plead for low income taxes, and for a sales tax, which would pass the burden from those less able to pay onto those least able to pay, then we are statesmen. That is a strange attitude which seems to have been built up, I suspect, largely under the aegis of the Hearst papers.

I have before me an article appearing in the Hearst papers—and most of their stuff is what is called "boiler plate"—and the article appeared, I suppose, in all the Hearst papers throughout the Nation, but the particular copy I have I observe was printed in the issue of the Washington Herald of Thursday, April 12, 1934, which I think was the day before we passed the revenue bill.

This communication is addressed to "All members of the new Demagogic Party", and reads:

> All believers in un-American class distinction and discrimination.
> All supporters of the cold deck and the misdeal.
> All headed for the discard.
> The list of Senators who voted for the Couzens amendment for a 10 percent supertax on all personal income-tax payments for 1934, to be paid in 1935, follows.

Here are all the Democrats who belong to the "Demagogic Party", and are slated for the discard:

> Ashurst, Bone, Brown, Bulkley, Caraway, Clark, Costigan, Dill, Duffy, Erickson, Fletcher, Hatch, Hayden, King, Logan, Long, McCarran, McGill, Murphy, Neely, O'Mahoney, Overton, Pope, Reynolds, Russell, Sheppard, Thomas of Oklahoma, and Thomas of Utah.

I warn these Senators that they are all doomed and that this is their last session.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. COUZENS. I yield.

Mr. BLACK. I desire to call attention to the fact that for some reason my name was left out of the list, and I certainly long to be in that club.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, we cannot hear the Senator.

Mr. BLACK. My name should have been included in the list of members of that club.

Mr. COUZENS. It is not a club; it is a party.

Mr. BLACK. My name should be included in the membership of the party. While I was not present on the floor of the Senate when the bill was voted on, I certainly was paired, and was in favor of the Senator's amendment.

Mr. COUZENS. I should be glad to have the Senator a member of this party, but he does not happen to be named by Mr. Hearst.

Mr. BLACK. I appeal to the Senator to permit me to have my name inserted in the RECORD as a member of the party, because I certainly was paired in favor of his amendment.

Mr. COUZENS. The Senator has now made a record of his position, and I am glad to have him a member, because I understand my colleagues have elected me treasurer of the party.

Mr. BLACK. I was wondering whether or not there would be a right of action against a newspaper which left a man's name out of the membership.

Mr. COUZENS. I am not a lawyer, and I cannot advise the Senator as to that.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, if the Senator from Michigan is to be the treasurer of that party he is going to have a lot of converts very quickly. [Laughter.]

Mr. COUZENS. I want the Senate to listen to the list of the Republican members of the "Demagogic Party." We find the name of our distinguished colleague, Senator BORAH, of Idaho, and that of Senator JOHNSON, of California. They are two of the older Members of the Senate, so I mention them first. They are also slated for the discard.

In addition to them, there are CAPPER, and COUZENS, and CUTTING, and FRAZIER, and LA FOLLETTE; MCNARY, our distinguished leader; NORRIS, NYE, ROBINSON of Indiana; SCHALL; my colleague, Senator VANDENBERG, and Senator

WHITE. They are all slated for the discard, and a good many of them will find that out in November of this year.

Then there is the Farmer-Labor Senator [Mr. SHIPSTEAD] who is also slated for the discard.

Some others are named who were paired for the bill, who are also slated for the discard. One is Senator WHEELER, another is Senator GORE, and another Senator CONNALLY. They were paired for the bill, so they are slated for the discard.

It is a strange thing that there is a group of our citizens who love everything foreign more than things domestic, not only as to goods but as to individuals and personalities. It seems that if they get on a pair of spats and go to Europe as delegates to something, they become European. Having been born abroad, I have adopted this country, and am trying to stick to it and to its best traditions. I think it appropriate to advert to the fact that our distinguished colleague the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED], who is not present, is campaigning in support of the British system. He points out that the old British methods are better than ours, because recently in a speech in Philadelphia he said—and he also repeated it in the Finance Committee the other day in a colloquy with the Secretary of State, Mr. Hull—that Great Britain had recovered 84 percent since the depth of the depression in 1932.

Now it happens that Great Britain only fell 14 percent. Eighty-four percent of 14 percent is 11.70 percent; so they have recovered 11.70 percent.

Our distinguished colleague from Pennsylvania also said that we have only recovered 30 percent. We went down into the depths to 45 percent below normal. Thirty percent of 45 percent is 13½ percent; so, notwithstanding our greatly discredited American system, we have made a greater recovery since the depth of 1932 than has Great Britain.

I desire to draw the attention of the Senate to some of the differences between the British system with respect to income and estate taxes and the system in effect in our own country. I desire to say this in behalf of the British, while I am speaking, that they have never even discussed the question of a general sales tax, but notwithstanding that Mr. Hearst so endorses their having at last cut their income tax 10 percent. They have done it at an expense and at a cost to the less privileged class of their citizens, which I know that no Member of Congress would approve.

In that connection I desire to read, at the expense of boring the Senate——

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. COUZENS. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. They have also reduced their taxes at the expense of honest debts due the United States.

Mr. COUZENS. I was coming to that. I was also going to point out that if we repudiated our debts due our citizens to the extent of $10,000,000,000, which is approximately the amount owing us which foreign nations have repudiated, which includes $4,000,000,000 due us from Great Britain, we would not only balance our Budget, but we would have a grand surplus.

At the risk of repetition, I desire to say that if we incorporated in our tax laws the tax laws that Great Britain has we would collect $5,000,000,000 in 1 year, and we could balance our Budget and have a handsome surplus.

I desire to point out at what expense and at what cost the British accomplished this great feat which Mr. Hearst rhapsodizes about. I read from an article which appeared in the New York Times. I have observed that that paper is usually one of the most reliable newspapers. The article is dated April 29. It was written by a Britisher in Great Britain. It is not written by one of our "demagogic party" over here. I assume the writer is reliable and that his information is authentic, otherwise the New York Times would not publish it. It was written by Mr. Ferdinand Kuhn, Jr., in London, and it was published, as I said, in the New York Times April 29. I shall not read it all. I shall read portions of it and ask that the complete article be printed in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

(See Exhibit A.)

Mr. COUZENS. I quote:

Ever since the first of the year elation and pride have spread through the departments of the Government as the surplus became assured and as its proportions became clearer. Every cabinet minister and every member of Parliament not openly hostile to the Government has taken an almost personal pride in an accomplishment unmatched by any country since the world-wide depression began. Complacency has oozed through the headlines in the great conservative newspapers: "A Triumph of Sound Finance", "A Magnificent Achievement", "Virtue's Reward." A chorus of self-congratulation has risen from the financial community in the city of London, in the proud belief that England has pulled through.

I skip a portion and read further:

Yet there is strangely little exuberance in the country as a whole, even at the thought of the small reliefs which the new budget will bring. Millions of everyday citizens, contemplating their Government's fat surplus, somehow cannot bring themselves to regard their politicians as St. Georges who have slain the dragons of poverty and fear. They know only too well that the budget surplus has been wrung from them in sweat and strain—in taxes of almost unheard of severity, in diminished pay rolls and in the burdens which "sound finance" has imposed on countless families.

If there are any heroes who deserve to be decorated by their King for making the surplus possible, they are the middle-class taxpayers of the country, who have watched between a tenth and a quarter of their incomes go to the national treasury; the hundreds of thousands of school teachers, policemen, and civil servants who have seen their meager salaries reduced by 10 percent or more, and finally the millions of the unemployed and their struggling families who have had to give up part of their pitifully small insurance payments to make a budget holiday. These are the front-line soldiers who have taken the punishment.

Too many sacrifices have gone into the making of this triumph to permit of much rejoicing now. No one can spend even a few hours, with open eyes and ears, in any industrial town without sensing that the country is still in the throes of an economic and social crisis of terrible urgency. Whatever the chamber of commerce orators may say, there is no comfortable feeling in the north that the nation's emergency is over.

In order to regain its financial stability, the British Government has had to push millions of these unfortunates a little deeper into insecurity, debt, and distress beyond all measuring. The havoc of the depression is greater, the standard of living lower, the genuine hardship more bitter in Great Britain because the Government has had to reduce its payments to the unemployed and to its civil servants and to heap increased taxes upon every section of the community.

For the overwhelming majority of the British people had known nothing but continual crisis for more than 10 years.

I want to emphasize that they have gone through 10 to 12 or 14 years of depression, while we have had 4 years of depression, and yet we find Congress rebelling against increasing income taxes 10 percent. I desire to tell Members of Congress that that was not even a bite in the cherry of the price that we will have to pay before we are out of this necessary spending and before we will ever come anywhere near balancing the Budget. I continue reading:

Their troubles really began in 1919, when the demobilized troops poured back into a "land fit for heroes to live in", and found there were no jobs. For a year or so the emergency was so great that the Government found it necessary to spend £61,000,000 in an "out-of-work donation"—an outright dole to the unemployed, out of which the existing unemployment insurance scheme was developed in the following year.

What terrors of revolution of civil war these millions of pounds staved off in 1919 and in subsequent years nobody can tell; but when 1931 brought still heavier burdens, it was the unemployment insurance scheme and the existence of a sound banking system which acted as shock absorbers and enabled the British public to carry on.

They bore up under these taxes. They did not rebel. They knew that it was the humane thing to take care of the unemployed and to provide taxation for that purpose.

While on that point, I have a personal letter from an acquaintance of mine in London, who writes me and commends Great Britain for her policies with respect to the "dole", so called. In 1931 his concern made 101,120 pounds, and, out of that 101,120 pounds, he paid imperial taxation of 63,000 pounds.

We rebel and wince at our moderate taxation, while Great Britain maintains its position with even the large taxation she imposes, and still has to grind the poor.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. COUZENS. I yield.

Mr. LONG. I just want to say that the Senator's amendment did not affect the man of average means anyway. It did not start until a man earned in excess of $4,000 net. So it did not even begin to bear down as a burden on anyone.

Mr. COUZENS. In that connection I want to draw to the attention of Congress an editorial which appeared in the Daily News of last night, published here in Washington, wherein it is pointed out that Members of Congress not only increased their salaries from $8,500 to $9,500 a year but decreased their income taxes. What a grand position we are in to go before the public, having not only increased our salaries $1,000 but also having actually decreased our income taxes below what they were before the new tax bill was framed.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. COUZENS. I yield.

Mr. BONE. I hope the Senator at this point makes it plain that the members of the new "demagogic party" did not do that.

Mr. COUZENS. I have not distinguished between those who voted to raise their salaries. I was one of them; I voted to raise the salaries because we had to override the President's veto in order to get salary increases for the little fellows and also to get some recognition of the needs of the veterans. The two items were incorporated in one provision and there was no other way of getting at it.

Mr. President, we hear much said to the effect that the imperial or federal taxation of Great Britain is all-inclusive, while in our country we have local taxes outside our Federal income taxes. That is not a correct statement. I want to read from the same article about a little clerk who at the time the depression began was receiving as much as £10 a week, or about $2,500 a year. He bought one of those little stucco houses which those who have been to Great Britain recently will have seen scattered all around the outskirts of London:

> In one of the newer stucco houses lived Mr. Thimble and his wife and two young children. He is an expert bookkeeper in a big office building in the city, who formerly brought home £10 a week ($2,500 a year) and whose friends still think he has an excellent salary. Four years ago he bought his house for £800 through a building society; paid part of that sum by selling his little savings of war-loan bonds, and still pays the rest at 6 percent.
> Before the Government's finances ran on the rocks in 1931, Mr. Thimble had all he could do to make his £10 meet expenses; but, like all his big neighbors, he was thrifty and he managed. Shortly before England was forced off the gold standard his pay was cut by 10 percent. Then the tax assessments began to come in. His exemptions were reduced and his tax raised 10 percent over the year before, so that the Government could balance its budget. With a salary reduced to $2,250 a year, Mr. Thimble was called upon to pay $100 in income tax, $50 in property tax on his house, and $90 in local taxes.

So it appears that his aggregate local taxes were greater than the income tax which he paid to the British Government. Yet a man with such an income in America would not pay a nickel in Federal income taxes; in other words, he would have $2,500 exempted and $400 for each of his children.

So, Mr. President, the fact that Great Britain, after all this human misery, is able to reduce her income tax 10 percent and is being so heartily endorsed by Mr. Hearst should hardly have any appeal to us.

Now let us look at a comparison between the taxes paid by citizens of Great Britain and those paid by citizens of the United States. The new British normal tax in the case of an unmarried person with an annual income in excess of $515 is 22½ percent. That is their normal tax, while our normal tax is 4 percent. Not only that but the British tax begins in the case of an unmarried person when the income reaches $515 and above. A married person in Great Britain who has an income of $800 pays a normal tax rate of 22½ percent on his additional income; that is, he is exempted only on the income of $800. In our country a married man has to have an income in excess of $2,500 before he pays a normal tax. He then pays only at the rate of 4 percent.

I just wonder sometimes, Mr. President, as my colleagues talk about balancing the Budget and the great burden that we are placing upon our citizens, do they ever stop to think what Great Britain and other countries have had to go through as the result of the world-wide depression and the World War.

In Great Britain the Government collects from income taxes an average each year of about $52 for every person, while the average collected in the United States is only about $12. If we decided to impose a burden such as the British Government imposes, we would get about $5,000,000,000 more each year from our taxes, and we could balance our Budget very quickly.

During the 3 years—1931, 1932, and 1933—we collected in this country about a billion and a half dollars a year, while, if we take the taxes collected by the British Government over the 9-year period from 1924 and 1933, we find that the average collection was $2,286,000,000 a year. In other words, the British, with a population only about one third the size of ours, collected about $800,000,000 more than we did each year.

Now, take the British income tax and some of the schedules, which show how absurd it is for the press and for some of our colleagues to be continually crying and shedding tears in behalf of our terribly overburdened taxpayers. For example, on a $3,000 income under the present bill the possessor of that income pays $8; with 10 percent added he would pay $8.80. In Great Britain, on the other hand, he pays $311.

In the case of a $5,000 income—and I am referring, by the way, to a married man with no dependents—on a $5,000 income in Great Britain the possessor of that income would pay $711, and in our country he would pay $80.

A man with a $10,000 income in Great Britain would pay $1,862, and in the United States he would pay $415.

A man with a $50,000 income in Great Britain would pay $19,655, while in our country he would pay $8,869.

In the case of an income of $100,000 in Great Britain the possessor of such an income pays $48,102, while in our country he pays $30,594.

On a million-dollar income in Great Britain the tax is $639,160, and in our country $571,394.

Mr. President, I am not going to take up the time of the Senate in a further discussion of the income tax, but I do want to draw the attention of the Senate and the public to the differences between our estate tax and the estate tax imposed by Great Britain, because there has been some comment to the effect that in Great Britain the maximum tax on estates is 50 percent, while ours goes up to a maximum of 60 percent. Yet in spite of that an estate netting $10,000,000 in Great Britain pays a tax of $5,100,000, while, with our 60-percent maximum such an estate would only pay $4,387,600. So the average, in spite of the maximum being 60 percent, is only some 43 and a fraction percent of the net income. This is so notwithstanding the fact that the great Hearst newspapers continued to propagandize with the slogan, "soak the rich", but somebody evidently "put them wise" to the fact that you cannot soak the poor, so they have changed around and now have adopted the slogan, "soak the thrifty." Yet, with all their great organization, they have been unable, apparently, to secure the support of more than a few Members of Congress for a sales tax.

Great Britain begins taxing estates of only £100, or approximately $500. Such estates are taxed at 1 percent. The tax schedule then runs up to 50 percent on estates of more than £2,000,000, which is just about our $10,000,000 schedule. We do not begin taxing estates until they have reached the sum of $50,000. That is one of the amendments on which the Senate receded, a provision in the Senate bill having reduced the limitation to $40,000, but the conferees have agreed on $50,000, as provided by the House.

All during this time of high tax rates in Great Britain, and notwithstanding what the workers and the unemployed had to suffer, we heard no cry over there, and I was unable to find any evidence of any cry, for a general sales tax or any general criticism of the high tax rate.

Senators, if we want to prevent trouble—I do not like to use the expression "trouble by force" or "revolutionary trouble"—not only Members of Congress but industry as well have got to adopt ways and means to establish some sort of security not only among those already unemployed but the millions and millions of our citizens who are now uncertain of whether they are going to have a job tomorrow. Only today a representative of the great industries of Detroit was in my office and stated that factories there had just this week laid off 8,000 men, and here it is the 1st of May. What are those 8,000 men going to do now? How will they live through the winter of 1934–35?

Senators, we are living in a strange era. We are living in a queer atmosphere. We seemed to be lulled by the N.R.A. and the A.A.A.—and when I mention them I am in no sense intending to criticize them, because I believe they are at least an effort, though by no means is it determined to be a correct effort. I have been loath to criticize all of the new things that have been started, because I am hoping that out of them something will come to bring a greater security for the workmen. We can talk about plowing under cotton, and we can use all the letters of the alphabet in these various organizations, but there is no solution to this economic problem until we can devise some substantial means of security.

UNSUNG HEROES GAVE BRITAIN A SURPLUS IN THE TREASURY—MIDDLE-CLASS TAXPAYERS, CIVIL SERVANTS, AND THE UNEMPLOYED BORE HEAVIEST BURDEN AND FACE GREAT SACRIFICES IN THE FUTURE

By Ferdinand Kuhn, Jr., London

History looked in at the House of Commons the other day when Neville Chamberlain opened his brandnew brief case and submitted his budget for the coming year. The stuffy air of that old chamber was vibrant with the sense that this was an occasion which would be remembered by future generations. It was not simply that the Government had a surplus of £31,148,000; England has had surpluses before and has forgotten them. What set this budget apart was the belief that it marked the end of a heroic struggle, the triumph of a nation over a crisis which had threatened to engulf it.

Ever since the first of the year elation and pride have spread through the departments of the Government as the surplus became assured and as its proportions became clearer. Every cabinet minister and every member of Parliament not openly hostile to the Government has taken an almost personal pride in an accomplishment unmatched by any country since the world-wide depression began. Complacency has oozed through the headlines in the great conservative newpapers: "A Triumph of Sound Finance", "A Magnificent Achievement", "Virtue's Reward." A chorus of self-congratulation has risen from the financial community in the city of London, in the proud belief that England has pulled through.

GROUNDS FOR SATISFACTION

And who but a cynic can deny that there are grounds for solid British satisfaction? A nation which was on the edge of bankruptcy less than 3 short years ago has produced a balanced budget with the largest surplus in 10 years; a financial panic has been checked and confidence restored; and London has regained some of her old proud preeminence as the world's financial capital. In the past few months industry has revived, profits have mounted for the first time since 1928, and unemployment has been reduced by three quarters of a million from its tragic peak of almost 3,000,000 at the beginning of last year.

Yet there is strangely little exuberance in the country as a whole, even at the thought of the small reliefs which the new budget will bring. Millions of everyday citizens, contemplating their Government's fat surplus, somehow cannot bring themselves to regard their politicians as St. Georges who have slain the dragons of poverty and fear. They know only too well that the Budget surplus has been wrung from them in sweat and strain—in taxes of almost unheard-of severity, in diminished pay rolls, and in the burdens which "sound finance" has imposed on countless families.

THE NATIONAL HEROES

If there are any heroes who deserve to be decorated by their king for making the surplus possible, they are the middle-class taxpayers of the country, who have watched between a tenth and a quarter of their incomes go to the National Treasury; the hundreds of thousands of school teachers, policemen, and civil servants who have seen their meager salaries reduced by 10 percent or more; and, finally, the millions of the unemployed and their struggling families who have had to give up part of their pitifully small insurance payments to make a budget holiday. These are the front-line soldiers who have taken the punishment.

Too many sacrifices have gone into the making of this triumph to permit of much rejoicing now. No one can spend even a few hours, with open eyes and ears, in any industrial town without sensing that the country is still in the throes of an economic and social crisis of terrible urgency. Whatever chamber of commerce orators may say, there is no comfortable feeling in the North that the Nation's emergency is over.

The Government's surplus may be very fine, but there is a greater and a tragic surplus of willing hands and able bodies in England today—at least 1,000,000, and possibly 2,000,000, workmen for whom it may be impossible to find jobs again. The work their fathers and grandfathers did in Victorian times is now being done more cheaply by oriental coolies and Central European factory hands, and by American potters and weavers and steel workers who, behind their tariff walls, are plying the trades which old England taught them.

DEBT AND DISTRESS

In order to regain its financial stability the British Government has had to push millions of these unfortunates a little deeper into insecurity, debt, and distress beyond all measuring. The havoc of the depression is greater, the standard of living lower, the genuine hardship more bitter in Great Britain because the Government has had to reduce its payments to the unemployed and to its civil servants and to heap increased taxes upon every section of the community.

It is fashionable in London to imagine that the people of Great Britain rallied to meet the crisis in a fine surge of patriotism. There was a time, it is true, in 1931, when a proud exaltation seemed to grip the country, just as it did in 1914, when cheering crowds shouted for a glimpse of their King outside Buckingham Palace and the war was still a glorious adventure.

"Cavalcade" caught the mood of the moment exactly; night after night in the autumn of 1931, in the audiences at Drury Lane, there were lumps in a thousand throats when two figures on the stage drank a final toast "that this England of ours, which we love so much, shall find dignity, greatness, and peace again."

Those were the days when a monster electric sign "Buy British" threw a lurid light on the lions of Trafalgar Square, and when every housewife found a paper Union Jack stuck in every British steak and joint in the butchers' windows. During that first winter of the financial crisis long lines of taxpayers waited outside the collectors' offices for a chance to pay their taxes and so help to save the country.

But within 6 months the crisis mentality had worn off. To the average British wage earner the events of 1931, which had seemed so catastrophic in the financial offices of London, had been like one more shock to a patient already numbed by hardships.

For the overwhelming majority of the British people had known nothing but continual crises for more than 10 years. Their troubles really began in 1919, when the demobilized troops poured back into a "land fit for heroes to live in" and found there were no jobs. For a year or so the emergency was so great that the government found it necessary to spend £61,000,000 in an "out-of-work donation"—an out-right dole to the unemployed, out of which the existing unemployment insurance scheme was developed in the following year.

What terrors of revolution or civil war these millions of pounds staved off in 1919 and in subsequent years, nobody can tell; but when 1931 brought still heavier burdens, it was the unemployment insurance scheme and the existence of a sound banking system which acted as shock absorbers and enabled the British public to carry on.

HIGH INCOME TAXES

Not once in those desperate post-war years did England know prosperity, judged either by her old pre-war standards or by the standards then prevailing in the new era in the United States. Even in the relatively prosperous year of 1925, when Calvin Coolidge sat in the White House and America boomed, every Englishman earning more than $10 a week had to pay income tax at a basic rate of 22½ percent (slightly less, of course, when exemptions were deducted).

Even in 1927 and 1928 there remained an indissoluble mass of more than a million chronically unemployed. Whole industries died a slow and lingering death as the foreign trade of Britain declined, and as her former customers became industrialized nations themselves, and thickly populated areas became derelict, swamped with idleness and shot through and through with human misery.

No amount of prosperity elsewhere in the country could penetrate to these stricken regions. When the Prince of Wales visited Durham in 1928, the dizziest year of America's boom, he was sickened at the sights he saw and the stories he heard. In Lancashire, at almost any time from 1921 to the present day, one could have stood on a hill outside Blackburn and seen the smokeless chimneys of dozens of vacant cotton mills.

The cotton industry on which almost a million families depended for their livelihood was half dead, a living symbol of England's decline in a nationalistic world. Its spinners and weavers, by the hundreds of thousands, were thrown into the streets; its manufacturers lost enormous sums and some of them slipped into destitution like the workers whom they discharged. A blight lay upon the tradespeople who once supplied the cotton workers' wants, upon the towns in which they lived; and today one has only to go into Oldham or Blackburn or any one of a hundred cotton towns to see that the blight persists.

The miracle is that these people of England, who bore such back-breaking burdens while the rest of the world was prosperous, have been able to endure still more, to pay still higher taxes, and live on still less money, so that now the Government is able to congratulate itself on the largest budget surplus in 10 years.

But what else could they have done? They were told, during the election campaign of 1931, that they must make these sacrifices or lose everything in their country's utter destruction. At that time so honest and so moderate a statesman as Stanley Baldwin proclaimed his deliberate opinion to an audience in Liverpool that "if the Socialist Party is returned and puts its declared policy into operation it will plunge the nation into irretrievable ruin. You will see the pound smashed and the poor starving."

Nobody who was there will ever forget the utter unreality of the scene in a shabby miners' auditorium in Durham during that campaign, when Prime Minister MacDonald was begging his constituents to vote for the Government and save the nation from disaster. The hall used to be a motion-picture theater; in the glare of arc lights on the platform, where the screen should have been, stood Mr. MacDonald, talking of the national credit and the mysteries of currency to a crowd of pasty-faced miners in slouch caps and with soot-stained mufflers around their necks who had seldom earned more than $10 a week in their lives.

UNEMPLOYMENT BENEFITS

At that very moment most of them were dependent entirely on their six or seven dollars a week of unemployment benefit or upon the still smaller amounts of outright charity doled out by the poor-relief administration. The Prime Minister waved a 100,000-mark note at them, dating from the years of Germany's inflation. "Do you want your wives' shillings to be worth twopence at the grocer's shop?" he thundered at them in those persuasive evangelical accents of his. And there was an uneasy stirring in the hall, a tremor of fear at terrors which might, after all, be lurking just around the corner if the National Government were not elected.

So bus drivers and business men, miners and factory hands and farmers, and even the unemployed in that Durham movie theater, trooped to the polls to elect a government which was pledged to restore the nation's credit and balance its budget. They were weary and frightened, and they voted in millions to banish the specters of doom from their firesides, no matter what the cost might be.

Two and a half years have gone by since that momentous decision was made. Today one might peep through a million curtained windows and stand at a million firesides and hear tales of sacrifices which would differ only in details. One family in an industrial town would tell the tale of thousands; 1 shipyard worker's family along the Tyne, 1 wool comber's family in Bradford, or 1 white-collar man's family in a London suburb would be typical of a legion of others.

There have been no noncombatants in this war which has swept so relentlessly over the British Isles; the struggle to balance the nation's budget has gone on in millions of peaceful homes; it has unbalanced millions of family budgets in homes where "sound finance" is valued just as highly as in the Government offices.

IN A TYPICAL HOME

Suppose one looks at a typical street in Wambley, a few miles northwest of London, where the pleasant stucco houses face one another in long rows exactly alike, and with only the tiny gardens to distinguish one from its neighbors. These are the homes where the white-collar workers of London live—the bank clerks, the automobile salesmen, the floorwalkers in the big department stores, who commute to town every morning and hurry home again in the evening.

In one of the newer stucco houses live Mr. Thimble and his wife and two young children. He is an expert bookkeeper in a big office building in the city, who formerly brought home £10 a week—$2,500 a year—and whose friends still think he has an excellent salary. Four years ago he bought his house for £800 through a building society, paid part of that sum by selling his little savings of war-loan bonds, and still pays the rest at 6 percent.

THE BURDEN OF TAXES

Before the Government's finances ran on the rocks in 1931, Mr. Thimble had all he could do to make his £10 meet expenses, but like all his big neighbors he was thrifty and he managed. Shortly before England was forced off the gold standard his pay was cut by 10 percent. Then the tax assessments began to come in. His exemptions were reduced, and his tax raised 10 percent over the year before, so that the Government could balance its budget. With a salary reduced to $2,250 a year, Mr. Thimble was called upon to pay $100 in income tax, $50 in property tax on his house, and $90 in local taxes.

Things will be a little easier for Mr. Thimble and his little family now, with the possibility that his salary cut will be restored and taxes slightly lowered. The 2½ years since 1931 have been a nightmare to him, but he knows he is a happy man compared to his neighbor, who was laid off but who was not eligible for unemployment insurance, having earned more than £5 a week.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] to recede from Senate amendment numbered 13.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair lays before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives receding from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 1, with an amendment, which will be read.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, UNITED STATES,
May 1, 1934.

Resolved, That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 1 to the bill (H.R. 7835) to provide revenue, equalize taxation, and for other purposes, and concur therein with the following amendment: In lieu of the matter proposed to be inserted by said amendment insert:

Mr. HARRISON. I move that the Senate concur in the amendment of the House to the amendment of the Senate numbered 1. This is an amendment to take care of the table of contents, merely a clerical amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Mississippi to agree to the amendment of the House of the amendment of the Senate numbered 1.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, I notice in the conference report, on page 30, that two or three oils were left out of the Senate amendment. One was perilla oil, which was included by an amendment offered on the floor of the Senate. Perilla oil comes in direct competition with linseed oil made from flaxseed. I want to ask the Senator from Mississippi why perilla oil was left out of the bill by the conferees.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, the Senate conferees tried to carry out the wishes of the Senate with reference to perilla oil, but it was pointed out, and the House conferees objected on the theory that perilla oil is not an edible oil but is a drying oil. It is not interchangeable with the oils on which we are seeking to put the processing tax. It is used in the manufacture of linoleum, varnishes, and so forth, and to mix with other oils so as to hasten the drying of paints, and so forth. The House conferees objected and we had to yield.

Mr. FRAZIER. I should like to ask further what particular experts advised the conferees to leave out perilla oil?

Mr. HARRISON. It was not a question of advice. It was a question of the discussion of the various oils. When we came to perilla oil it was pointed out by the House conferees, upon information which was given to them, that it was a drying oil and was not interchangeable with other oils. We thought the reasons were such that perilla oil should be eliminated.

Mr. FRAZIER. Does the Senator mean information given by experts from the Department of Agriculture?

Mr. HARRISON. We sought information from various sources. We sought information also as to the use of perilla oil. Of course, none of the experts would advise one way or the other as to whether perilla oil ought to be taken out or left in the bill. They were there to give us information as to the use of the various oils.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state that this discussion is taking place by unanimous consent. The parliamentary situation is that the conference report has been agreed to and has been disposed of. Under the unanimouse-consent agreement entered into this morning the Chair expects to lay before the Senate the unfinished business, and the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. THOMAS] by unanimous consent has the right to the floor at this time.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. McNARY. I do not think it is quite considerate that the Senator from North Dakota should be taken from the floor. He has an inquiry to submit to the Senator from Mississippi. It is true that the conference report has been agreed to; but if there is any question about the rights of the Senator from North Dakota, I will ask unanimous consent that the vote by which the conference report was agreed to may be reconsidered.

Mr. HARRISON. I hope the Senator will not do that, but will request that the Senator from North Dakota may be recognized to ask his questions.

Mr. McNARY. Very well.

Mr. FRAZIER. I do not care to discuss the matter at length. I simply want to get some information. The people of my State are very much interested in the tax on perilla oil because such oil comes in direct competition with our linseed oil.

The Tariff Commission report on oils, no. 41, which was submitted to the Congress, discusses perilla oil and says that it is used for drying, and so forth, but also says that if perilla oil can not be obtained, linseed oil or tung oil may be used in its place.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, there is no doubt that perilla oil competes somewhat with linseed oil. Both are drying oils, but perilla oil dries more quickly than linseed oil.

Mr. FRAZIER. Yes; and turpentine is also used as a drier, and that is produced in the Senator's State.

Mr. HARRISON. I have given the reason why perilla oil was eliminated.

Mr. FRAZIER. I wish further to call the Senator's attention to the fact that flax was included as one of the principal farm products to go under the processing tax if the Department wished it to do so.

Mr. HARRISON. As one Senator I did insist on perilla oil being included and retained, but I was unable to have it kept in the bill.

Mr. FRAZIER. I appreciate that very much. I merely want to say in conclusion that the importation of perilla oil has increased tremendously during the last few years. In 1921 the imports were less than 1,000,000 pounds. In 1933, according to the Department of Commerce, the imports were 22,775,968 pounds of a value of a little more than $1,000,000. It is quite an important import, coming from Japan and China, and it seems to me our own farmers ought to be protected against the competition of such imports.

LOANS BY FEDERAL RESERVE BANKS FOR INDUSTRIAL PURPOSES

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair lays before the Senate Senate bill 3487, relating to direct loans for industrial purposes by Federal Reserve banks, and for other purposes, and recognizes the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. THOMAS].

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I ask that the unfinished business be laid before the Senate.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator withhold that request for a moment?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Yes; I withhold it.

Mr. LONG. The Senator from Oklahoma and I have reached, I think, an understanding by which he will permit me to offer the amendment which came from the Agricultural Committee, and then he can offer his amendment as a substitute for the agricultural amendment. Is that satisfactory to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, I think there is an understanding that will enable this matter to be disposed of in a moment. In order to make the situation as I would have it, and I think it will be satisfactory to those in interest, at this time I withdraw my amendment temporarily.

Mr. LONG. Now, Mr. President, I offer——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Let the Chair understand correctly the parliamentary situation. Under the unanimous-consent agreement the Senator from Oklahoma has the floor. The Chair understands him to yield to the Senator from Arkansas, who requests that the unfinished business be laid before the Senate.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. This matter can all be worked out satisfactorily in just a moment, I am sure.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Very well. I have no objection, Mr. President, to the withdrawal of the Senator's amendment and the offering of another amendment. The understanding is that the matter will not be proceeded with now.

Mr. LONG. Now I offer my amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the rules the Senator from Oklahoma has a right to withdraw his amendment. It is withdrawn.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The Senator from Louisiana does not want his amendment read?

Mr. LONG. No; I do not want it read.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President——

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I yield to the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. GLASS. I understood that the Senator from Oklahoma had consented to withdraw his amendment, with the understanding that if, after a conference over the matter, it should be deemed desirable to offer the amendment again, he would present it or not, as he might determine. What is the use of the Senator from Oklahoma withdrawing his amendment if the Senator from Louisiana is going to offer his?

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. I am at a loss to know what is taking place on the Democratic side of the Chamber. I think I know what Senators are trying to do, but I do not understand the suggestion made by the Senator from Virginia.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state that when the Senate recessed last evening the so-called "Glass bill" was pending. This morning a unanimous-consent agreement was reached that upon the disposition of the conference report the Senator from Oklahoma should have the floor.

Mr. McNARY. I am thoroughly familiar with that situation. I simply wish to know what is now taking place on the floor.

Mr. LONG. May I state what we are trying to do?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Let me make a statement of about two or three sentences.

There is an understanding among some of us that the further discussion of this amendment shall be postponed until Monday. That is agreeable to me; but in order to preserve our parliamentary status, I offered to withdraw my amendment on condition that another amendment, known as the "agricultural amendment", be offered to this bill, whereupon I am to offer my amendment as a substitute for that amendment, and let the matter stand until Monday.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understood that the Senator from Oklahoma had withdrawn his amendment.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, I will not lose any of my rights. I now withdraw my amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the Senator from Oklahoma is withdrawn.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I now offer the agricultural amendment which I have sent to the desk, to be numbered section 6, and ask unanimous consent that the reading of the amendment be dispensed with at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Louisiana offers an amendment and asks that the reading of the amendment be dispensed with. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. LONG's amendment is, on page 9, after line 6, to insert the following:

SEC. 6. That for the purpose of exchanging American agricultural surpluses for silver bullion and coin, and for the purpose of properly protecting and promoting international and domestic trade and commerce and promoting the general welfare, the Secretary of the Treasury and the Export-Import Bank of Washington (hereinafter referred to as the "bank") are authorized to acquire and purchase silver in the manner hereinafter provided.

SEC. 8. The bank is further authorized to purchase such agricultural surplus products as may be deemed necessary to fulfill option contracts with foreign buyers or to make deliveries to foreign buyers for the purpose of carrying out this act. SEC. 11. The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to accept any deposits of silver in the Treasury of the United States which such Secretary, subject to regulations prescribed by the bank, is satisfied have been imported into the United States in payment for agricultural surplus products sold and delivered, or to be delivered, to foreign buyers for exportation at a price which shall from time to time be determined by the said bank: Provided, however, That the price per ounce for such silver shall not be less than 10 percent above the world market price of silver and not in excess of 25 percent above the world market price of silver: Provided further, That such price (including the amount of the world price plus any excess) shall at no time exceed $1.29 per ounce. SEC. 12. Upon receipt of such silver bullion or coin the bank shall deliver same to the Secretary of the Treasury. The Secretary of the Treasury shall immediately cause to be issued against such silver bullion or coin silver certificates based upon a value of $1.29 per fine ounce in denominations of $1, $5, $10, $20, and $100.

SEC. 13. The silver bullion received under the provisions of this act shall be stored in the Treasury of the United States in blocks or bricks of standardized or uniform fineness and in convenient units by weight and stamped by authorized official stamp as may be determined within the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury.

SEC. 16. In addition to the powers granted in section 10, after January 1, 1935, the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to purchase silver bullion at the rate of not less than 50,000,000 ounces per month, wherever silver shall be procurable, at a price to be fixed by him from time to time as provided herein, and the silver so purchased shall be paid for, held, and deposited as provided in this act.

SEC. 18. The bank is hereby authorized to make such rules and regulations as may be necessary for immediately carrying out the provisions of this act.

SEC. 19. The receipt and purchase of silver under this act shall continue until the general domestic price level as measured by the index of the Bureau of Labor Statistics shall equal the price level of 1926, or until 371.25 grains of fine silver shall equal in purchasing power $1 in gold of the weight and fineness as fixed or as may be fixed by law, whereupon in either instance the acquisition and purchase of silver under this act shall be suspended: Provided, That if thereafter such general price level shall fall as much as three points or to 97, as measured by such price level as herein defined, or if the value of 371.25 grains of fine silver having reached a parity value with the gold dollar shall fall three points or to 97 cents as measured in gold, then in either event silver purchases, exchanges, and acquisitions as provided herein shall be resumed in such amounts monthly as may be necessary to the end that such 1926 general price level shall be maintained and/or the value of 371.25 grains of fine silver shall be maintained on a parity with the gold dollar.

SEC. 20. The right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved. If any provision of this act, or the application thereof to any person or circumstance, is held invalid, the remainder of the act and the application of such provision to other persons or circumstances shall not be affected thereby.

SEC. 21. The provisions of this act are hereby declared to be supplemental to provisions of law respecting silver heretofore enacted.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, I now offer the amendment which I submitted on yesterday, and withdrew just a moment ago, as a substitute for the amendment offered by the Senator from Louisiana.

The amendment of Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma is, on page 9, after line 6, to insert the following:

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. THOMAS] to the amendment of the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG].

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I now ask that the unfinished business be laid before the Senate.

Mr. McNARY. In other words, the Senator demands the regular order.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Yes.

CORPORATE REORGANIZATIONS

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H.R. 5884) to amend an act entitled "An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States", approved July 1, 1898, and acts amendatory thereof and supplementary thereto.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The pending amendment is the amendment of the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. FRAZIER].

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, this amendment presents some difficult questions.

The amendment provides that—

Any farmer failing to obtain the acceptance of a majority in number and amount of all creditors whose claims are affected by a composition or extension proposal may amend his petition or answer asking to be adjudged a bankrupt. Said farmer may, at the time of the first hearing, petition the court that all of his property, whether pledged, encumbered, or unencumbered by liens or otherwise, be appraised at its then actual value and that his homestead and exemptions be set aside and that he be allowed to retain possession of any part or parcel or all of the remainder of his property and pay for same under the terms and conditions set forth in this act.

Upon such a request being made in the petition or answer, or at the time of the first hearing, appraisers shall be designated and appointed. Such appraisers shall appraise all the property of the debtor at its then reasonable actual value. The words "actual value" shall not necessarily imply cash value, but shall imply the reasonable and fair value of the property at the time the appraisal is made. Such appraisers shall be designated and appointed.

At the time of the order setting aside to the debtor his homestead and exemptions, and giving him possession, under the control of the court, of any part, parcel, or all of the remainder of his property, whether pledged or covered by any prior lien or encumbrance, the debtor shall agree and bind himself that he will pay to the secured creditors, as their interests may appear, and to the trustee of the unsecured creditors, as his interests may appear, if a trustee is appointed, the value of the property as fixed by the appraisal together with interest at the rate of 1 percent per annum on the following terms: 2½ percent, together with interest on or before 6 months from date of agreement.

I understand that 2½ percent is 2½ percent of the principal. He pays 2½ percent of the principal, and pays 1 percent interest only.

Two and one half percent, together with interest on or before 12 months; 2½ percent, together with interest on or before 18 months; 2½ percent, together with interest on before 24 months, and that thereafter he will pay 5 percent principal, together with interest semiannually for the following 4 years and will pay the balance on or before 6 months after the last semiannual payment has been made to the secured creditors, as their interests may appear, and to the trustee of the unsecured creditors, as his interests may appear, if a trustee is appointed.

I am frank to say that I do not think this is a constitutional measure, but I am also frank to say that I think it is a constitutional measure within any rule which could be announced by the court sustaining the municipal bankruptcy act. Both propositions involve the impairment of contracts. They are different in terms but the constitutional question is the same. I cannot see any real distinction so far as the legal phase of the matter is concerned. I was of the opinion that the bankruptcy act was unconstitutional, and I think this comes within the same principle.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, I am not an attorney, and there may be a question of constitutionality involved; but in some of the recent court decisions, including one that was mentioned yesterday with reference to the Minnesota moratorium law, the Court practically held that under the existing conditions they were justified in ignoring certain technicalities in the law and Constitution.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Reference has been made to the decision in the Minnesota mortgage moratorium case, having to do with a statute enacted by the State of Minnesota; but, in my judgment, that case has no application whatever to the amendment proposed by the Senator from North Dakota.

The Senator from Idaho has said that he believes the amendment to be invalid because it violates the Constitution. I concur in that statement, but for a different reason from the one the Senator has expressed.

An analysis of the Minnesota decision referred to will show that the majority opinion of the Supreme Court merely held that the statute authorized an extension of the time within which redemption might be made, and did not impair the value of the security in any particular. With the indulgence of the Senator, I quote just a few sentences from the decision. In the pamphlet published by the Senate as Document No. 113, at page 13, is this language:

That under the law then applicable the period of redemption from the sale was 1 year and that it has been extended by the judgment of the court over the opposition of the mortgagee-purchaser; and that during the period thus extended, and unless the order for extension is modified, the mortgagee-purchaser will be unable to obtain possession, or to obtain or convey title in fee, as he would have been able to do had the statute not been enacted.

Particular attention is called to the following:

The statute does not impair the integrity of the mortgage indebtedness. The obligation for interest remains. The statute does not affect the validity of the sale or the right of a mortgagee-purchaser to title in fee, or his right to obtain a deficiency judgment, if the mortgagor fails to redeem within the prescribed period. Aside from the extension of time, the other conditions of redemption are unaltered. While the mortgagor remains in possession he must pay the rental value as that value has been determined upon notice and hearing, by the court. The rental value so paid is devoted to the carrying of the property by the application of the required payments to taxes, insurance, and interest on the mortgage indebtedness. While the mortgagee-purchaser is debarred from actual possession, he has, so far as rental value is concerned, the equivalent of possession during the extended period.

Mr. President, it is apparent from a reading of other paragraphs in the decision that the Court merely held that the Minnesota statute under consideration effected a change in remedy without impairment of the right of the mortgagee, and for that reason sustained the statute.

It did not hold that the reduction of the rate of interest on the mortgage from, say, 5 or 6 percent, or whatever the rate may have been, to 1 percent was a valid exercise of the legislative power. It did not hold anything other than that the extension of time for redemption, on payment to the mortgagee of the rental value of the property, was not an impairment of the obligation of the contract. That was what the Court actually held.

Under the pending amendment the right of the mortgagee to have a sale of the property, the right to proceed for the deficiency, if any, against the mortgagor in person, the right to receive interest in accordance with the terms of the contract, are all disregarded. A mere nominal rate of interest is to be charged, under the amendment, interest at the rate of 1 percent per annum, and very small payments are permitted; 2½ percent for some years, and then later 5 percent, the interest at all times being 1 percent.

To my mind that plainly is an impairment of the contract. It is not a mere extension; it is a reduction of the value of the mortgagee's security, and, as such, if enacted by a State, would constitute a violation of the constitutional provision to the effect that no State shall pass any law impairing the obligation of contracts. As it is not an arrangement for composition or adjustment between the debtor and the creditor, it does not come within the power of Congress to pass uniform bankruptcy laws.

I thank the Senator from Idaho for yielding to me.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. AUSTIN. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Arkansas whether it is not true that there is another significant difference between the Frazier amendment and the Minnesota moratorium law in this respect, that whereas this amendment is not limited to a temporary period or the period of an emergency, the moratorium law was distinctly limited in time.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. That is entirely true.

Mr. BORAH. What difference does that make? What difference does the emergency make with reference to plain provisions of the Constitution? Emergencies cannot suspend, change, or modify the Constitution.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, for my part, I feel that I would take the same position the Senator from Idaho takes if we came to debate that question. I am not thoroughly satisfied that the Constitution may be suspended for any period of time, however short.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, in further answer to the question of the Senator from Vermont, the Court in the Minnesota mortgage-moratorium case expressly held that the emergency did not create any new right, that it did not bring into life any new power; that it merely made applicable the use of a power already in existence. I do not see the relevancy of the reference to and a lengthy discussion of the subject of emergency.

Mr. BORAH. I quite agree with the Senator. If, as the Court declared, an emergency created no new powers, what could be the relevancy of discussing it?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. In view of the fact that the existence of an emergency did not in anywise alter, according to the Court's opinion, the rights of the parties to the contract.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I do not desire to discuss the Minnesota case at this time, but here is the situation. Day before yesterday we passed the municipal bankruptcy bill. The effect of that bill will be, in its execution, in my opinion, to impair the obligations of cities which are outstanding.

I received a telegram upon yesterday from the Teachers Association of the United States, in which they say that the school teachers of the country have a very large amount of outstanding warrants of cities, contracts to pay them money. They are objecting to this bankruptcy bill on the ground that it would impair the value of their contracts; and it would. Their contracts, unless they consent to come in, will undoubtedly be impaired.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, did they not say they had their savings invested in these bonds?

Mr. BORAH. Yes. It would impair them. Suppose these school teachers throughout the country have a large amount of contracts of these different cities where they have taught, and suppose the cities proceed with their plan for reorganization and refinancing. The school teachers' contracts amounting to less than 25 percent do not come in under the plan. Suppose the plan provides for reduction of 50 percent in the obligations of the cities. Has not the school teacher had his contract changed and impaired without his consent? That is precisely what this measure would do. I think both provisions are clearly within the provision of the Constitution of the United States which inhibits the impairment.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. McGILL in the chair). Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. LOGAN. I should like to ask the Senator whether there is not a clear distinction between the impairment of the obligation of a contract and the impairment of the value of a contract. As I understand it, this proposed law would not impair the value of the holding, or the obligation, although it might impair the contract. Under the power of the State to take property if it makes just compensation, it seems to me that in any composition, if the minority stockholders do not have the value of their holdings impaired, they have no right to make any complaint at all, although the obligation of the contract might be impaired. If they get the full value of the obligation, whatever it may be, in the reorganization, then what right do they have to complain that the value of their contract has been impaired?

Mr. BORAH. I do not know that I would dispute the position which the Senator takes in regard to that, but the very object and purpose of the municipal bankruptcy bill is to enable a city to reorganize its finances, to reduce its expenses, if it desires to, or to cut its obligations, if it desires to, and to bring into court creditors to the extent of 75 percent for that purpose. If 25 percent remain out, and have no part or parcel in the proceedings, their contracts may be impaired without their consent.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, does the Senator think it is probable that the 75 percent will be apt to reduce the value of their obligations? The minority must be treated the same as the majority, and if these creditors of cities are going to be willing to accept less than that which is nominated in the bond, they will be a new species to me. I have not found any creditor who was anxious to take anything less than he could force. So if the 75 percent get all they possibly could get, the 25 percent will certainly get all they possibly could get.

Mr. BORAH. It must be remembered that these cities have the taxing power, and it must be borne in mind, furthermore, that the bankruptcy bill does not propose to distribute the property of the city, to have it go through an actual process of bankruptcy.

It does not propose to set up the property and divide the property among the creditors, and let them take what they may. The city is a continuing institution, a continuing business. The taxing power remains intact. In 10 years—in 5 years—after it has taken its advantage under this law, it may be in a perfectly sound financial condition. It is not proposed to wind it up, to terminate it, to put it out of business. Bear in mind that every person who took a contract from the city took it with the knowledge that it had the taxing power. They took it upon the faith of the city, and upon the ability of the taxing power to meet it. Now we say that if 25 percent hold out and refuse to accede to the program, and if the program reduces the value of the securities by 50 percent, they are bound by it. If that is not the impairment of a contract, I do not know what would be.

Mr. LOGAN. Let me suggest to the Senator, because I know what I say is true, that there are cities which do not have the unlimited power to levy taxes, and who cannot secure it. If the city has the unlimited power to levy taxes it can never receive any benefit from this law, because it can never be insolvent, and it can never be unable to meet the obligations of its debts.

Let me call the attention of the Senator to one city I know, a city having outstanding obligations of about $750,000 in bonds. Then, as the result of an old suit that had been pending for years, it had thrust upon it the payment of an old issue of railroad bonds amounting to $250,000—bonds which had been floated to build a railroad. The railroad was never built, but the bonds had passed into the hands of innocent purchasers. The city, under the constitution of its State, going to the full length of its taxing power, can raise $40,000 to apply on its debt. Its annual interest rate is 5½ percent. It requires $55,000 to pay the interest on the $1,000,000 outstanding. If by some composition with its creditors it could make arrangements whereby the interest rate were reduced to 3 percent, it could collect enough to have a sinking fund which in the course of time would extinguish the debt. What I am suggesting is that 25 percent, or a small number, ought not to be allowed to appear anywhere and prevent a city refinancing when a city is in such a condition as that, and there are many cities which are in that condition.

Mr. BORAH. That may be true, but it was precisely that nature of things which the Constitution was designed to correct. It might not have been a wise provision, but there it is.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. Is there any difference in legal contemplation, so far as the impairment of contract is concerned, between authorizing 75 percent of the creditors to impose their will on the 25 percent, and 10 percent to impose their will on the other 90 percent?

Mr. BORAH. So far as the contract is concerned, there is no difference.

I desire to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that when we were considering the bankruptcy bill a certain case was cited from the Supreme Court of the United States by several contending for the constitutionality of that bill. It is my opinion that the Senators who cited this case were misled as to its purport by a brief which had been filed here by the supporters of this measure, as the brief failed to present the facts as they are. The facts, when presented, show beyond a question that the decision could be cited against the bankruptcy bill and not in support of it.

What was that decision? The decision is reported in One Hundred and Ninth United States Reports, the Canada Southern Railway Co. v. Gebhard. This was a corporation which had its origin under the laws of Canada; not under the laws of the United States, where the constitutional provision prevails, but in Canada, where there is no limitation as to the impairment of contracts and no limitation as to the due process of law clause. Here the Court says, and this part was not quoted in the brief:

> There is no constitutional prohibition in Canada against the passage of laws impairing the obligation of contracts, and the Parliament of the Dominion had in 1878 exclusive legislative authority over the corporation and the general subjects of bankruptcy and insolvency in that jurisdiction.

The legislative body in Canada had no limitation imposed upon it by any superior constitutional authority. It had full control over the corporation. It might pass any law with reference to putting it through a state of bankruptcy or reorganization that it desired to. But when the Court reaches that point it is careful to distinguish the cases.

Hence it seems to be eminently proper that where the legislative power exists some statutory provision should be made for binding the minority in a reasonable way by the will of the majority—

That is what the able Senator from Kentucky contends for—and unless, as is the case in the States of the United States, the passage of laws impairing the obligation of contracts is forbidden, we see no good reason why such provision should not be made in respect to existing as well as prospective obligations.

In other words, Mr. President, the Supreme Court held that owing to the fact that the corporation had its charter from Canada and under the Canadian law, and there being no limitation upon the impairment of contracts, that the Court would hold that they had a right to pass a subsequent act providing for the reorganization of the corporation. But they made the distinction and discrimination between the Canadian situation and that of the United States.

I cannot see any difference myself between that situation and the one presented by the amendment of the Senator from North Dakota. This amendment of the Senator from North Dakota undoubtedly, to my mind, impairs the obligation of a contract, or, as would be more proper to say, takes property without due process of law. It takes property without due process of law, in my judgment. It does not wind up the business and distribute the proceeds; it permits it to continue under certain conditions, but it impairs or reduces the amount which is to be paid, thereby impairing the obligation of the contract—thereby takes property without due process of law.

But what is the difference, I ask Senators, between that and what we did the day before yesterday, where we take a city with the taxing power; we do not dissolve it; we do not distribute its property; we do not divide up its assets; we permit it to continue as a continuing proposition, but we say that if 75 percent agree upon a reorganization and refinancing that it shall bind the 25 percent, and that their obligation shall follow the direction of the 75? Is not that the impairment of the obligation of a contract? Is not that taking property without due process? If we are going to give a great city like Detroit, with its stupendous wealth, the power to reorganize its finances and to impair its obligations with the taxing power complete, is there any reason why we should not extend the same right to a farmer? I do not mean to say that either is constitutional, but if one is it would be difficult to find a reason for holding the other unconstitutional. Both impair the obligation of contracts or neither does. While the facts are different, yet in both you meet the question of changing a contract. In the bill passed upon Tuesday you have a definite promise of the city to pay so much. In this case before us you have the farmer agreeing to pay so much. In both cases you propose to change the amount to be paid. I do not think you can do this in either case, but I do not see the distinction sought to be made.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. HASTINGS. I ask the distinguished Senator whether he has in mind section 12 of the Bankruptcy Act with respect to compositions? Of course, this theory upon which this new legislation with respect to bankruptcy has been passed has been an extension of the power which has been recognized for many years in the bankruptcy law with respect to composition; that is, under certain circumstances, and under certain rules and regulations laid down by the act, a composition may be made by the bankrupt with his creditors. The theory upon which all this new bankruptcy law is based is upon an extension of that provision. I was wondering if the Senator had given consideration to that and whether he could distinguish between the contracts which he speaks of with respect to the municipality, and the contracts that could be violated under section 12 of the Bankruptcy Act as it has existed for many years.

Mr. BORAH. Before I answer that, let me preface my remarks by saying that there are some things in this Minnesota case which it seems to me are worth considering in connection with both these propositions. I am frank to say that I do not cite the Minnesota case as representing the views which I would entertain upon that subject. In other words, I would not have supposed, prior to the rendition of that decision, that such a decision would be rendered by the Supreme Court; but it has been rendered, and until they see fit to depart from it, I suppose it is a fairly safe guide for legislators. But they say here:

An emergency existed in Minnesota which furnished a proper occasion for the exercise of the reserved power of the State to protect the vital interests of the community. The declarations of the existence of this emergency by the legislature and by the Supreme Court of Minnesota cannot be regarded as a subterfuge or as lacking in adequate basis.

It is difficult to know why the Court calls attention to the fact that an emergency existed in Minnesota, when it has said in the opening of its opinion that an emergency can add nothing to the Constitution, take nothing from the Constitution, or change the terms of the Constitution. Just what part the emergency played in this matter is difficult for one to understand, but undoubtedly the Court must have given some credit or some weight to the fact that an emergency existed; and that is the design of this measure and, I presume, of the other measure which was passed the day before yesterday—to meet an emergency.

I think the Minnesota moratorium case did something more than merely extend the time. It is true that it did not actually change the terms of the contract, but it is also true that it deprived the creditor of the benefit of his contract in realizing on the assets upon which he rested.

Mr. HEBERT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. HEBERT. As I remember from my reading of that decision, the Court maintained that it did not deprive the creditor of any of his rights unless it be the right of immediate possession. The Court went on to say that in effect they declared he did have possession of the property and was deriving a benefit from it, because it was understood that a rental should be paid by the occupant, who was no longer the owner of the property.

Mr. BORAH. Yes; that is the sophistry in which the Court indulged, undoubtedly.

Mr. HEBERT. I did not go so far as to characterize it in that way.

Mr. BORAH. When the Court says that a contract is not impaired which changes my right to enjoy the conditions and terms of the contract, no amount of reasoning can convince me that it is not in conflict with that provision of the Constitution. One of the things to which a man is entitled when he makes a contract is its execution in accordance with its terms. That is one of the most vital things touching a contract. And to say that it may be changed about and I may be given a different possession from that which it has been agreed I shall have, or a different enjoyment from that which it has been agreed I shall have, is to my mind not meeting the issue which was before the Court. It is in that sense I use the word sophistry, not, I trust, in any disrespect for that august tribunal.

Mr. STEIWER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. STEIWER. Applying the Senator's argument to the amendment offered by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. FRAZIER], does not the Senator from Idaho believe that the argument of an emergency as the basis for the constitutional validity of the legislation might better be made if this amendment were limited in time instead of being offered as a permanent and lasting piece of legislation?

Mr. BORAH. Undoubtedly, if an emergency has anything to do with the matter, then it would be desirable to have a limitation of time in the amendment.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President——

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. FRAZIER. Is there any limitation of time in the bankruptcy bill which we passed the other day?

Mr. BORAH. Yes; there is a limitation of 2 or 3 years. Of course, Mr. President, I agree with the Senator from Oregon that if we are going to give any consideration to the question of emergency, we ought to have a limitation of time, because it is one of the things upon which the Court always dwells.

However, without going into a discussion of that matter, I think the question, the existence or nonexistence of an emergency, can have nothing in the world to do with the construction of the Constitution of the United States. If the Supreme Court of the United States can say, "Here is an emergency; we recognize it to be an emergency, and, therefore, we find something in the Constitution that we did not otherwise see there", we have in this country a judicial oligarchy. When a statute comes before the Supreme Court of the United States it looks alone for the power under the Constitution, whether it is in time of normalcy or in time of emergency. If the Legislature of Minnesota had passed that same statute in a time of normalcy, the Supreme Court would have been compelled to search for the same power and the same authority to sustain it that it would in a time of emergency. This contention that an emergency calls up unused powers or sleeping powers, still necessitates the finding of these powers within the Constitution. Awake or asleep, used or unused, they must be found within the terms of the Constitution, under the rules of construction long established by that Court. There is one duty the Court owes the country and the Congress; it is that when it calls up an unused power or sleeping power, that power should be christened, named, identified, and defined so the people and their Congress may know what it is, its extent, and when it may be invoked.

Mr. STEIWER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. BORAH. Yes.

Mr. STEIWER. Admitting the force of the Senator's logic with respect to the question of emergency, can it not be stated, nevertheless, under the decision of the Court in cases like Wilson against New, a few of the rent cases, and a few of the moratorium cases, that the Court does recognize that an emergency alters conditions and to some extent permits it to read into the Constitution that which it might not otherwise have seen there?

Mr. BORAH. It seems so. The Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Adams against Wilson did exactly the same thing that they did in the moratorium case. It started out by saying that an emergency neither added to nor took from the Constitution of the United States. What it had to do with the decision thereafter I have never been able to understand.

Mr. STEIWER. And then proceeded to say that it did add to it.

Mr. BORAH. Yes; that is, they proceeded to render a decision upon the theory that it did add to it.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President——

Mr. BORAH. Just a moment. But nowhere do we find that the Supreme Court ever declared that an emergency called out any power that did not exist theretofore. The power was there, but it had been permitted to sleep. What a bundle of unused powers may be sleeping awaiting for some emergency to awaken them we do not and shall never know until the Court finds it necessary to arouse them from their slumbers.

I now yield to the Senator from Delaware.

Mr. HASTINGS. I was wondering whether the mere statement in the act itself that an emergency exists was binding upon the Supreme Court, or whether they would try to find from some other source whether the statement was or was not correct.

Mr. BORAH. The Court might take the statement of the legislature as being conclusive that there is an emergency, but suppose they do take the declaration of the legislature that there is an emergency, what must they then do? They must turn around and take the Constitution of the United States and find whether the legislation is there permitted or inhibited, must they not? And if they do not find it, what difference does it make whether there is an emergency or not; and if they do find it, what difference does it make whether there is an emergency or not? If a mere declaration of an emergency by the Congress, by the President, and by the Court either suspends, changes, modifies, or adds to the Constitution, then the will of the people as expressed in the Constitution gives way to the will of the agents of the people. A more subtle and vicious doctrine in a free government could not well be conjured up.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. LEWIS. May I ask the able Senator from Idaho, does he not recall that many of the views touching which he is expressing some conviction were specifically alluded to in anticipation or in referring to what was passed in what is known as the "Milligan case"?

Mr. BORAH. I do. I remember the Milligan case very well. There was stated in that case a sound doctrine. The Court stated, in effect, that the doctrine of emergency was the most insidious one which could be called into existence against free institutions, that the Constitution was made for peace and for war and binding upon Congress, the courts, and the President at all times and under all circumstances.

Bear in mind, Mr. President, that until, I think, about 115 years after the Court had been in existence, never was the doctrine of emergency consented to or admitted for a moment by the Court. That an emergency calls up or evokes unheard-of, unusual, or sleeping powers is a doctrine of recent origin. And the striking peculiar part of the doctrine is that it is repudiated in express terms and then applied by implication.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. LOGAN. Is it not true that it is only in case of some kind of emergency that we have any use for a Constitution? If the Constitution is to be set aside during the course of an emergency, then we had just as well have no Constitution at all. It is in time of emergency when the Court ought to adhere more strictly to the Constitution than at any other time. Then the Court should not be persuaded by reason of emergency to make any effort to make the Constitution more elastic than it really ought to be construed.

Mr. BORAH. I do not contend, Mr. President, that the Constitution of the United States is sacred, but I do contend that the right to change it is sacred, and that right belongs exclusively to the people of the United States. Upon that doctrine rests the whole scheme of a peoples' government. The reason we declare this to be a Government of the people, for the people, and by the people, is because the people alone may change the Constitution.

Once grant that either the Congress or the Court can change the Constitution by implication or otherwise, is to implant a doctrine in our free institutions which means their end. The people, and the people alone, may change the Constitution of the United States. It may be that we have reached a time when it should be overhauled, when it should be rewritten, and when it should be changed in its terms and conditions, but no one can change it except the people themselves; and if we ever adopt the contrary doctrine it is not a government of the people but a government of Congress and of the courts. In the olden times the plea was "State necessity", and under that plea the people were the playthings of the ruler. If under the plea of emergency we have a different Constitution than we have in normal times then the people are the playthings of Congress and the courts, because the Congress and the courts can create an emergency or they may declare an emergency when in fact there is no emergency; this doctrine of emergency is the plaything of rulers.

But coming back, Mr. President, to the amendment before us, the Court says:

> In view of the nature of the contracts in question * * * the relief afforded and justified by the emergency, in order not to contravene the constitutional provision, could only be of a character appropriate to that emergency and could be granted only upon reasonable conditions.

Mr. President, if the municipal bankruptcy bill shall be sustained, the courts will have some difficulty in holding this amendment unconstitutional. I do not believe that either one of them will be sustained. I do not think the Court will go that far. The emergency cry will perhaps be over or faded into disrespect before the case reaches the Court, and it will again take up the Constitution itself and be guided by the Constitution. The day of unused or sleeping powers will be over.

Mr. NORRIS obtained the floor.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. Does the Senator from Delaware desire to ask me a question?

Mr. HASTINGS. No; I wanted to make a brief statement with respect to the difference between this amendment, as I understand it, and section 75 of the bankruptcy law which now exists.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not want to do exactly that, but I want also to make a short argument.

Mr. HASTINGS. Very well.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, will the Senator from Nebraska yield to me to suggest the absence of a quorum?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. BLACK. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The absence of a quorum has been suggested. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Eighty-nine Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, the pending question is the amendment offered by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. FRAZIER] to amend the Bankruptcy Act. It seeks to enable farmers to secure the benefits of a bankruptcy provision and have their indebtedness, including all mortgages, ascertained, to have a homestead set aside and their indebtedness to be extended at a considerable reduction of interest, and so forth.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. FRAZIER. The setting-aside of a homestead is provided for under the present law, as, of course, the Senator knows. Any such setting-aside of a homestead is covered under existing law. Where the homestead is not mortgaged, of course, it would be set aside now under the exemption provided for in existing law.

Mr. NORRIS. But the homestead is mortgaged 999 times out of 1,000. I do not know how we can reduce a mortgage debt or reduce the interest on a mortgage debt without the consent of the owner and holder of the mortgage. Whether that would be a good thing or a bad thing, it seems to me, is a secondary question. I think it is an impossibility for us to enforce such a law as is proposed by this amendment.

I take it from the argument of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] that he agrees with that contention; but he thinks we passed an act day before yesterday in which we did the very thing I have just referred to. I do not agree with the Senator from Idaho that the bankruptcy act we passed day before yesterday is unconstitutional. I believe the Supreme Court will hold it to be constitutional; but I do not want to go into a discussion of that matter now, because, as I look at the question, it is immaterial whether that act is constitutional or not. As I see it, the passage of an illegal measure today cannot be justified on the ground that we passed one day before yesterday.

If I had any doubt about the matter, I should vote for the amendment of the Senator from North Dakota, because I recognize his honest intention to do something to help the farmer. In that, I agree with him. I am just as anxious to do that as he is; but, as I see the matter, it is useless to enact a law of this kind when, as I look at the measure, it is perfectly plain on its face that the first court that has anything to do with it will nullify it.

A strong argument can be made against the amendment on its merits, also, as I shall point out a little later; but, Mr. President, we must remember that these mortgages in the main are executed under State laws. They are given under State statutes. I do not think, either, that the recent opinion of the Supreme Court holding the Minnesota law constitutional—with which, incidentally, I agreed, and I am glad they held that way—has anything to do with this question.

We have a mortgage executed by the owner of the property. We are called on now, by this amendment, to provide by law that that mortgage shall be extended as to time, that the rate of interest shall be reduced, and that other things shall be done in regard to the mortgage executed under a law that Congress did not pass, and over which Congress has no jurisdiction.

It is not a question, either, as I look at it, as to the remedy. I concede that a State would have a right to pass a law applying to future mortgages, making them illegal on homesteads or on any other property that might be specified. It could be provided by law that when an effort was made to foreclose a mortgage there should be a moratorium of 25 years, as applied to future mortgages. I do not mean to say that the States could have that kind of a law apply to existing mortgages; but the State is supreme. A State, if it wanted to do so, could make all mortgages absolutely illegal from the date of the legislation, and make it impossible for anyone to get a mortgage that was good. A State could provide, if it wanted to, any other thing in regard to the property of its citizens over which it is conceded to have jurisdiction.

Suppose a farmer has a farm that we will say, for the purpose of illustration, is worth $10,000. He gives a mortgage to somebody for $5,000. It is a perfectly honest deal. He wants the money; and the mortgagee—it may be either a widow or an orphan—has the money, and loans it to the farmer honestly, at a low rate of interest. The interest is not material, but suppose it is 5 percent. Later on, the farmer gives another mortgage to somebody else for $5,000. Still later, he gives a third mortgage for $5,000. Still later, he gives a fourth mortgage for another $5,000.

Can we, by a bankruptcy measure passed here in Congress, provide that that farmer can apply to the United States court and ask to be declared a bankrupt, and that the owners of these four mortgages amounting to $20,000, secured by property worth $10,000, will have to come into court and submit their mortgages there, and have appraisals of the property made, and find out that the mortgages are much more than the property mortgaged is worth, and have their mortgages reduced so that they will not be greater than the value of the property mortgaged, and that the mortgagees will be compelled, without their consent, to take interest at 1 percent instead of 4 percent for 20 years' more time?

Would that appeal to us if we were members of a State legislature? Even assuming that we had authority to pass a measure of that kind, would it be just to make the first man who had a $5,000 mortgage take a deduction because the farmer had put subsequent mortgages on the property, and subsequently had gone further into debt, and provide that the first mortgagee must reduce his mortgage and reduce his interest on that account?

As the constitution of the States and of the Federal Government stand now, would not any court hold that however technical a man might be who held a mortgage, he could not be compelled by law to reduce the rate of interest or to reduce the principal? He has his remedy in the State, provided by law, to foreclose his mortgage. It might be that the State would provide that he could not get a deficiency judgment. Such a law would be all right if passed before the mortgage was given. In that case the mortgagee would take the mortgage with his eyes open; but how can we permit somebody else who has another mortgage, or a judgment creditor, to come in and say?—"This property must be shared with me. I have a lien; and although under the law it is subsequent to yours, I am going to be on an equality with you in the division of this property." Can we provide that if a farmer has 320 acres of land, a homestead of 160 acres can first be set aside and be clear of debt?

That is another thing that the State can provide for. I think all States have such laws. I think every student of the subject will agree that it is wholesome to have liberal homestead laws and exemption laws, providing for certain things that a creditor cannot take; but when the owner of property mortgages it, he takes it out from under the protection that any homestead law would give him.

That is what we are here called upon to do, as I understand this amendment. In my judgment it would not only be illegal and unconstitutional to do it; but if we had no debts now and we were starting anew, and if I were a member of a legislature, I would not vote to provide by law that a man holding a mortgage could be compelled to divide the property mortgaged and be placed on an equality with subsequent creditors. It would mean that the last loan had been made in that State that ever would be made. Nobody would loan money under those conditions.

It might be better if we had a law providing that a homestead could not be mortgaged. There usually are some limitations. Personally, I should be glad if they were greater. I wish no man could mortgage his homestead; but he can do so under the law. He has done so under the law; and I do not think we are even doing a kindness if we pass a law of this kind, which cannot give him relief, and which will be held up. I think, even if such a law were held to be good, it would constitute an injury for all time to come.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Is it the purpose of the author of this amendment that a homestead, even if the exemption be waived, shall be protected?

Mr. NORRIS. There is something in the amendment about a homestead. I do not know what the idea of the Senator from North Dakota was in that regard. I yield to him if he wishes to explain his amendment.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield, as I understand, this amendment does not exempt the homestead if it is mortgaged, because there is a provision here which says that—

> After the value of the debtor's property shall have been fixed by the appraisal as herein provided, the referee shall issue an order setting aside to such debtor his homestead and exemptions, and shall further order that the possession, under the control of the court, of any part or parcel or all of the remainder of the debtor's property, shall remain in the debtor subject to a general lien, as security for the payment of the value thereof to the trustee of the creditors, if a trustee is appointed, such a lien to be subject to and inferior to all prior liens, pledges, or encumbrances.

The condition in that respect is just the same as it is now; but if the Senator from Nebraska thinks that this homestead provision means setting aside a homestead whether it has a mortgage on it or not, I should be perfectly willing to strike out all reference to homesteads here and just say "exemptions".

Mr. NORRIS. In my opinion it would make but little difference, because, in the practical application of this amendment, we all know that homesteads are mortgaged. If there were no mortgages on homesteads, there would not be very many people who would want to have a law of this kind enacted. There would be no objection to judgment creditors who have no liens on property being compelled to divide the returns that may come from that property pro rata in accordance with their debts and being prohibited entirely from getting anything from the homestead.

The point I make, however, is that it is the mortgage we are up against here; and in the practical application of the proposed law we should find, even if it were enacted and held to be good, that in applications under it there would be very seldom judgment creditors and other kinds of creditors. There would be mortgagees. The great difficulty that the farmers of America have now is to meet the increased taxes and the interest on their mortgages; and I know of no way by which Congress could pass a valid law which would bring about a compulsory reduction of interest, or a compulsory reduction of principal.

In the first place, as I said a while ago, 99 percent of all these cases arise under State laws. Even if the Federal Government had a mortgage, it would have it under a State law. The State remedies must be called into force if we undertake to enforce liens by a mortgage. The original mortgage was made under a State law. Congress cannot abdicate and say that in the State of Idaho, for instance, there shall be no more real-estate mortgages, or that, if there are to be any more real-estate mortgages, the rate of interest shall be subject to change at the dictate of Congress through some law it may pass. We would not have any authority to pass such a law.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Is it not also true that corporations are incorporated under State laws, and governed by State laws, and, instead of issuing mortgages, issue bonds? The Senator does not mean to say that a bond issued by a corporation is less sacred as a contract than a mortgage issued by a farmer on his farm. As I understand the Senator, he objects to this amendment on the ground that it would impair contracts. Since the passage of monetary legislation last spring, and the confiscation of gold, and the decision of the Supreme Court sustaining the Minnesota moratorium law, it seems to me it is out of date to talk about the impairment of contracts.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, perhaps I am out of date, perhaps I am old fashioned, perhaps I have not considered this subject at all. The young Senator from Minnesota has more advanced ideas and knows what is what. I do not. I am not going to argue that. I do not think what he has said has any more to do with the question I am discussing than the flowers that bloom in the springtime. [Laughter.] I think it has nothing whatever to do with what I was saying

I have not said what I should like to say. I believe, from my experience, that if I were a legislator in a State, I would vote to make it impossible to have a mortgage given for anything except part of the purchase price of a homestead. I think an enactment to that end would be a good law. I realize, however, that that has not been the law, and that is not the law, and that mortgages are put on homesteads for other than the purchase price. If we passed a law today providing that every mortgage on every farm should be cut down 75 percent, what effect would it have? What good would it do? Would anybody want to vote for that kind of a law? I would not vote for it myself. I think I am just as much interested in the welfare of the agriculturists of this country as is any man on this floor, but I never would knowingly do anything which I thought was dishonorable or illegal in order to help the farming industry out of the dilemma in which it is now placed. In the long run, we would get nowhere by doing such a thing. The real friend of the farmer does not want Congress to pass that kind of law.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. LONG. I have been voting since 1930 for legislation which to my mind was preferential and discriminatory, beginning with the Reconstruction Finance Corporation Act.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I do not want to prevent the Senator from going into that subject, but I am not going to discuss the organization of the different boards and the various lettered corporations. I do not think that has anything to do with what I am now saying.

Mr. LONG. The point I am trying to make to the Senator is that I am of opinion that many of those measures were not constitutional, but I think the Supreme Court is going to hold them constitutional, particularly this municipal bankruptcy measure. I have not a doubt in my mind that it is going to hold to be constitutional, and yet I agree with the Senator from Idaho that it is not, and I cannot see why we draw the line.

Mr. NORRIS. I wish the Senator from Louisiana and the Senator from Idaho were members of the Supreme Court. I should like to submit all these questions to them, and I know that sometimes the cases would not be decided as I think they should be decided, but perhaps in the end we would get very much better decisions than we have sometimes received in 5-to-4 rulings by the Supreme Court.

Judges are men; they are not supermen. We had some experience with a superman, but we got tired of him, and I do not want any more of them. I do not want them on the bench. All judges are human. They are all moved by their viewpoints, their associations, their environment, their experience during life. They consider questions honestly but have different viewpoints and reach different conclusions, honestly, on the same proposition.

The man who always had the viewpoint of the palace, the man who always lived in luxury, who never knew what it was to want, who never came in contact with the poor and the struggling and the suffering—that man would likely, though not necessarily, have a different viewpoint from the man who had been down at the bottom, who knew what it was to feel the pangs of hunger, and to shiver in the cold for want of clothing. The latter would have a different viewpoint. He would have sympathy with struggling mortals and would look upon these questions from a different point of view from that of the other man, though both might be honest.

I should like to have that kind of men on all the courts in the United States, men who have the viewpoint that seems to me to be right, who think that there is something besides money in this life; that gold is made an idol by some; that it is not good to eat; it is not good to wear; it is not good to use, except as money; and it has no other value of any great importance so far as we are concerned. Some people worship at the shrine of gold, and they are honest in their worship. They hide it, they conceal it, they hoard it, and they are happy, even though living in misery, if they are covered up with gold. I do not want that kind of a man to run this Government, to be in the Senate, or to be on the Supreme Court, or even to be a justice of the peace.

There is something better than money. But when there are those who are in distress, as our farmers are, and there are people saying, "We are going to pass a law now which will cut mortgages in two", I cannot go with them. I do not want to advance the interests of the farmers by doing what I believe to be wicked, to be wrong.

Moreover, if there are to be any mortgages given in the future, even if we had the authority to enact such a provision, such action on our part would put an end to mortgages, because nobody would lend money on a mortgage—and there are many people who lend money, and lend it regularly, who are honest.

What the Senator from Minnesota suggested in his interruption about the financial legislation may all be true. I am one who has believed that in the case of people who are in debt—mostly the farmers, but also all the others who have gone into debt honestly, during times when there was a different value to the dollar than there is now; it is not fair to compel them to pay their debts with a dollar that takes twice the labor, twice the effort, to get. I should like to remedy that. That is why I voted for some of the bills presented to us which would have a tendency to increase the circulation.

The wheat farmer, the man who makes his living from raising wheat, who, if he got any profit, would get it out of wheat, may borrow $500 on his farm when wheat is worth $1.50 a bushel, and when the mortgage comes due he has to pay it. He has to pay it in dollars, it is true, but we know that is only a fiction. What he has to pay it in is wheat. He borrowed the money at a time when wheat was worth $1.50 a bushel and is called upon to pay it when wheat is worth 50 cents a bushel. That is an injustice. We will not remedy that injustice by passing this bill. I think we would remedy it by passing some of the other bills which are pending here and without any injustice to the creditor.

I have been one who has been contending for several years that we must do something to help the man who is in debt to pay his debts. If we are to make it possible for the man who is in debt to pay what he owes, we ought to make it easier for him to do it, but we cannot do it by enacting a law which says, "You have agreed to pay $500, and we have cut it down to $250, and we are going to make the other fellow take that." We could not do that if we wanted to, and I would not do it if I could and make it general. There would be some instances where we would be justified in doing that if we could do it legally. But we must be fair. I think we will be fair if we have currency legislation which will enable these people to pay their debts. I think we will have to do it, too. We cannot go on much longer with conditions as they are. But I am trying to point out that this is not the right way out of the difficulty. Those who want to do that ought to do it, it seems to me, in a way that would be effective.

I could not vote for this amendment even if I believed we had the power to enact it. I appeal to those who have the farming interests at heart. I think we would hurt the movement, we would give it a bad reputation, if we undertook to do what I believe this amendment would accomplish if it were held to be good by the courts.

COMMEMORATION OF THREE HUNDREDTH ANNIVERSARY OF THE FOUNDING OF MARYLAND

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MCGILL in the chair) laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 2966) to authorize the coinage of 50-cent pieces in commemoration of the three hundredth anniversary of the founding of the Province of Maryland, which were, on page 1, line 5, to strike out "10" and insert "25"; on page 1, line 5, after "thousand", to insert "silver"; on page 1, line 6, to strike out "silver"; and on page 1, to strike out line 9 and insert "but the United States shall not be subject to the expense of making the models for master dies or other preparations for this coinage."

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. I move that the Senate concur in the amendments of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

CORPORATE REORGANIZATIONS

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H.R. 5884) to amend an act entitled "An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States", approved July 1, 1898, and acts amendatory thereof and supplementary thereto.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. FRAZIER].

OUR VANISHED CONSTITUTION

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I have risen in the Senate today to speak a word for the American farmer. I have undertaken this afternoon, and will undertake again, to lay before the Senate what it knows just as well as I know, that there are in this country today many millions of American farmers and their families who are in want, who have not the necessities of life, who are clamoring and who are fighting for the chance to be restored to the homes which they have the right to possess and which they have lost or are standing in danger of losing through no fault of their own.

I ask for these farmers the same consideration that is being given to the bankrupt municipalities, for which Congress is about to enact legislation. If we are to pass the pending bill, which will permit corporations to free themselves of their debts, we should likewise allow the farmer to be freed of his debts. I ask, if we are to let the railroads wipe off their debts and keep their property, if we are to let the corporations wipe off their debts and to keep their property and municipal corporations to wipe off their debts and to keep their property, in fairness, on the same principle, let the man at the bottom, the farmer, the backbone of our prosperity when we have prosperity, the main sustaining force of our civilization, the class of people who sacrifice the most, who work the hardest, and who have received the least and who expect the least—let that class of people also have the right to maintain the little shelter that is above their heads. Let them be returned to those homes they have recently lost, if we are to give to the bigger interests such privileges as we are giving to them by enactments of the Congress.

Mr. President, I did not vote for the municipal bankruptcy bill the other day. When I was in the Senate Committee on the Judiciary I cast the deciding vote there in the morning. I was willing to have that bill come on the floor of Congress and have it decided.

I voted against reporting the municipal bankruptcy bill unfavorably in order that it might come to the floor of the Senate, stating at the time that I did not intend to vote for that bill on the floor.

When we adopted the municipal bankruptcy bill, Mr. President, we prescribed a policy here for this Congress that we cannot now retract. I will show my friend from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] and the Members of the Senate that we are not doing anything in the way of granting relief to the farmer.

To begin with, Mr. President, the people of this country are loaded down with debt, and the farmer is worse affected by it than anybody else. He has the greatest debt, the most unjust debt, the least chance to pay it, and the heaviest of the burdens. He is yet expected to hold up the country. He is yet supposed to be the cornerstone if there is a survival of any prosperity, and yet I submit to the Congress, knowing what I know from having been a farmer in my early life to a little extent—and I farmed only to such little extent as I had to—that nothing has been done by this Congress yet which is going to mean that the farmer can get from under his debts.

The agricultural bill we passed with respect to cotton has not meant a great deal for the farmers in a few days it has existed as a law. Cotton has gone down 2 cents a pound since we passed the bill. Notwithstanding the fact that we put a processing tax of 3 or 4 cents a pound on cotton, which in the long run is paid by the farmer anyway, cotton is still selling for 2 cents a pound cheaper than it did, which makes a difference of 5 cents a pound in cotton. And today with cotton on the market at 11 cents, if you take off the 5 cents a pound for cotton, it is today bringing about 6 cents a pound.

Take some other commodities, particularly hogs, and the same thing is true. One year ago hogs were selling for more than they are selling for today, with the processing tax put on.

So that the farmer, Mr. President, has not been helped at all in any way that I can see in paying his way out of debts that were contracted in the last few years.

As the Senator from Oklahoma pointed out yesterday, the price of the dollar is still abnormally high. We have tried to get currency legislation to enable the agriculturists to come out of debt, and such legislation has been voted down. We have tried to get the remonetization of silver legislation to put the farmer out of debt, and that has been voted down. We have tried various and sundry expedients, most of which have been voted down, but when one has been favorably voted upon it has been at a time and under such conditions and restrictions that most of us have prophesied on this floor its operation would mean very little in the way of benefit to the farmer.

Now we have started in on the basis of repudiation. We had two ways of going out of debt. We had one way that could have been resorted to in the year 1930, when I first came to Congress—I believe it was early 1932 when I came here, but I was elected in 1930. In the latter part of the year 1931 we had an expedient by which we could have gone out of this economic depression, which afflicts the farmer first, foremost, and worst. We could have adopted what had been proposed by the Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER] and the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. THOMAS], and have afforded a means by which agriculture could have redeemed itself and thereby have helped other business.

But we will not do that. We have given the farmer no greater market than he had. As a matter of fact, Mr. President, the farmer has not as much market for his products today as he had when this depression started in 1929. He has not as much market today. Why?

Mr. President, one American dollar can be exchanged in Mexico for three silver dollars of Mexican money. The European and other currencies of the foreign countries are on such a basis that we cannot go out and compete and expect to dispose of the agricultural surplus. The market has been closed year by year and day by day, steadily grinding against the farmer of this country to the point where today he has less chance to come out of debt than he has had probably at any time during this depression.

I was told by some one who read the newspaper article the other day, that Russia has contracted with Poland to supply Poland's next year cotton demands. Russia is a market which America used to have.

Congress has seen this condition, out of which the debtor class cannot pay. Congress sees it, Congress knows it. The President sees it, the President knows it. Even the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Morgenthau, seems to know it, although when it comes to taking financial advice, Mr. President, I would never think of taking the recommendations which might come from Mr. Morgenthau as compared with the other students who have studied this question, and who have shown their knowledge in this Congress ever since I have been here; I would not think of listening to the nostrums prescribed by Mr. Morgenthau as compared with what is recommended by the Senator from Mantana [Mr. WHEELER] and the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. THOMAS] and the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH], because they have seen this situation long before the necessities were made so patent that our Cabinet members admitted some need of relief legislation of some kind or character.

Now, what are we going to do? If we are going to adopt the Thomas and Wheeler bills, and the bill which I had the honor to offer here this morning, coming from the Committee on Agriculture, of which the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] is chairman, or any of them; if we are going to adopt silver legislation, if we are going to expand the currency, we might stop here; we can afford to stop and say, "An immunity and a bankruptcy provision has been granted only to municipalities in violation of the Constitution"—if we have one. I do not know whether we have one. I may be offending the sensibilities of some of my friends if I mention the Constitution.

Somebody said that to mention the Constitution is like going back to the Mother Goose almanac. Someone said that I would be quoting fairy tales the next thing if I kept talking about the Constitution of the United States.

I am speaking about the Constitution in two ways: One, what the Constitution is, and the other, the way the Constitution is going to be interpreted by the Supreme Court of the United States and the other courts. One is the Constitution which meant something. The other is the Constitution which has been required to yield to the necessities and demands of the conditions and performances now existing.

I do not think anyone is going to stand on the floor of the Senate and tell me that he thinks the legislation we have been passing is in accordance with what his understanding was of the Constitution as it existed before this distressful condition came about. No one is going to stand here and tell me that he thinks the Minnesota case was constitutional, top side and bottom, according to what he understood the law to be 5 years ago.

I remember when I would receive a box of law books, and I would put that box of books up in the bookcase and I would sit down, Mr. President, and read book after book, thinking that I was learning the law that was going to be of advantage to me in later life. I would go over those monstrous court decisions, and read the jurisprudence from Chief Justice Marshall on down to the jurisprudence of Chief Justice White, day by day and night by night, thinking unto myself that I was putting there in my archives volumes, the reference to which would make me a worldly wise man, unthinking of the fact that in time I would have to come to look to the secretaries and bureaucrats and those sent out in the field, to find out what the ruling was and what the law was, and that all those books I had there were not worth the paper they were printed on. They are not worth a tinker's dam today. We all know that.

What is the jurisprudence worth? I have a $25,000 law library, and I had to beg somebody for space in which to put it, and I have a feeling that if I had room I would be glad to put it somewhere else, because it is a worthless possession, notwithstanding the fact that I spent a lifetime of savings and a lifetime in the practice of law to acquire it. But what is it worth?

Do not ever put another law book in front of me while we are running things like we are. Law books are not in the business. Publishers ought to be prosecuted for trying to sell law books. Any time the West Publishing Co., or the American Law Book Co., sends an advertisement through the mail trying to sell some young lawyer a set of books which costs him $150, they ought to be prosecuted for using the mails to defraud, because it does not mean a thing on God's living earth, and they are just taking the man's money and giving him nothing. So I am discarding all these fallacies; I am discarding all these schoolboy tales that I read about.

We will leave the monument to Chief Justice Marshall standing. Some day someone will come in and see the monument that is erected to Chief Justice Marshall because he made the Constitution breathe the spirit of life, and he will say, "What was that all about?" He will wonder why in the world there was not a statue put up for the man who wrote the first Mother Goose rhyme, if a statue is to exist in memory of the man who was honored for expounding the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. GORE. Among my souvenirs.

Mr. LONG. Yes. As my friend the junior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] says, it will be labeled as those things "among my souvenirs."

I want to honor the Supreme Court of the United States as long as it can be honored, and I still honor it. They are worthy men; as good men as I am, and probably better in the places they occupy. They are probably doing the job a great deal better than those who criticize them, for all I know. We hear the harangue one moment that we are restrained from doing something to relieve the people from this deplorable condition on the basis of a constitutional restriction. It is the same as trying to explore the inner recesses of a cave without a lamplight. Constitution? There is nothing to it; it is not there; it does not belong there any more; it does not live in this house any more; we are through with it. Does any lawyer here tell me—and they are all honest men—that he thinks it was an exercise of constitutional power under the theory of interstate commerce to yank up a man who pressed a suit of clothes for 35 cents on the ground that he had violated a code to regulate interstate commerce because the code authority had said that 40 cents had to be the charge for pressing a suit of clothes? Is there anybody here who would say, on his word or off his word, that he thinks that was anything like an exercise of valid constitutional power? Where in the world was there any such thing as interstate commerce, topside, bottomside, inside, or out, in a man having a suit of clothes pressed and charging 35 cents instead of 40 cents? Yet the little tailor who pressed the clothes was sent to the jail for violating an interstate commerce code.

I sat on a public-service commission for 10 years and dealt with many questions as contradistinguished from interstate commerce during that length of time before I was ever governor of my State; and never did I ever hear anybody, topside or bottomside, ever talking about anything like that being regarded as interstate commerce. Nobody believes it is interstate commerce. The Supreme Court does not believe it is interstate commerce. Nobody believes that kind of a thing is constitutional. Yet we sit here, with codes of various and sundry kinds regulating all kinds of domestic business, regulating all kinds of private business, regulating all kinds of public business, regulating all affairs down to the number of eggs that a hen may lay and the number of pigs to be born in a litter; and then we are told that we have got to restrict ourselves because of some constitutional provision, because the makers of the Constitution surveyed things and wrote a document that left it standing for ages to come.

Now, let us get back to the law that we have, having recognized that the Constitution is out of this case. It has been put out by the Supreme Court of the United States; it has been put out by the President of the United States; it has been put out by the United States Senate—and I helped to do part of it—it has been put out by the House of Representatives; it is not here, and we had as well recognize that we have not buried that document, but have forgotten it; that we have left it to wither away, to fade away, to blow away like the mists that were here this morning when the sun rose. It has gone; it might have been here but its effects are not felt. But we have a law left, which I am going to read, a basic, a fundamental law, Mr. President, that supports the amendment of the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. FRAZIER]. The Senator is right; his contentions are based on right fundamentally, legally, and properly, and are grounded on the precedents of the United States Senate and the Congress of the United States.

The Senator from North Dakota is trying to do the only kind of justice for the farmers of the United States that the Congress has said they would let anybody do. He is trying to give the farmers the same shake of the dice that we have declared to be necessary for the railroads. We have said we had to do something to pare down the debts of the railroads. I voted for it. I voted for the railroad bankruptcy bill to allow them to wipe off certain of the debts due their creditors. I voted for certain other bankruptcy bills to allow corporations to wipe off their debts. I either voted or I saw the majority of the Senate vote for legislation to open the Treasury of the United States that it might lend to various and sundry interests funds that came from the general public to pay off their debts and refinance themselves. Now we come to the last bill which we voted.

What did we vote for here the other day, although I voted against it? We voted for a bill under which the sovereign States could set up a political subdivision and that subdivision, created by the State, could issue bonds and then decide that it did not want to pay them and could wipe them out. We voted for a bill that, if a set of politicians obtained control of a city government and loaded it down with every kind of debt and squandered its funds for a number of years, all they had to do was to come into court with a certain percentage of their creditors and wipe out whatever part of those debts they wanted to wipe out.

The bill meant more than the bill said. We said that a certain percent of the creditors had to agree, but there was provided a method by which the municipality could make them agree. All they had to do was to refuse to collect the taxes; all they had to do was to refuse to pay anything; all they had to do was to throw down their arms and refuse to operate as a municipality or to discharge the burdens imposed on them by law, and have the State sit silently by and not do anything to make the local subdivision do what it should do. Then the creditor has got to take anything he can get, on the basis that he will get nothing if he does not take what the governmental subdivision is willing to pay. Every contention made by my friend from Indiana [Mr. VAN NUYS] was absolutely sound and correct along the lines of his argument, but the Senate decided to pass that bill to allow subdivisions of sovereign States to act in that way.

Mr. President, nobody is going to starve whether these political subdivisions go free of their debts or not. It will not put anybody out of a home; it will not make any difference whether we relieve the town of Winnfield, La., from which I come, probably one of the most noted and worthy towns in this country [laughter]—Mr. President, I am grateful for the generous response and appreciation that I get for my old home town, well known as it is—however, it does not make any difference whether that town is relieved of its debts or not; nobody is put out of his home; no farmer is put off the place where he is giving his family something to eat. We did not have to free the corporations or the railroads or the municipalities of their debts on the ground that they would be able to feed somebody if that were done. Acts of that kind did not help anybody so far as the immediate necessities of food, clothing, and shelter are concerned.

But here we come to a bill, Mr. President, after having dealt with these fantastic, artificial creations, some public and others private, and still others quasi-public—after we have decided on the principle of bankruptcy for them, wiping out their debts, under a municipal bankruptcy bill, then we come along to the farmer.

I want to say something to my friend from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS], who has returned to the Chamber. We agreed in the municipal bankruptcy bill that we would allow 75 percent of the creditors or those owning 75 percent of the obligations to agree to wipe out all the debts or whatever proposition they agreed to. If we could make it 75 percent, why could we have not made it 25 percent? I want someone to tell me why, if it is legitimate to let 75 percent of the creditors agree to a cancelation of the obligations of a municipality, we might not have made it 25 percent? Why could we not have made it 10 percent? When we went to the point of stating it was constitutional to wipe out the debts of a municipality, with the agreement of the Court, based upon the petition of 75 percent of the creditors, we might as well have said 51 percent, 49 percent, 43 percent, or 99 percent. The percentage did not make it constitutional. I do not believe any lawyer is going to dispute that the Constitution did not allow us to take 25 percent of the debts away from anybody. We did not have any more right, if a municipality owed $100,000 and I held $25,000 of its debt, to wipe out my $25,000 because the holders of the other three fourths of the debt were willing to do it than if I owned 51 percent of it and the other 49 percent had wanted to wipe out those debts. On the ground of constitutionality, if there is any such thing as confiscation of property without due process of law, there was never a bill that went through the Congress that could have been further away from the principles of the Constitution.

We have gotten away from the Constitution; we have left it; we have quit it; we have forgotten it; but we have a law that is still left, and I am going to read that law in answer to some of my friends who look upon this as being evil.

I read, Mr. President, from the fifteenth chapter of the book of Deuteronomy, verse no. 1—and I want my friend the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH], who knows this verse very well, to bear me out as I read one little verse.

At the end of every 7 years thou shalt make a release.

A 7-year release.

Verse 2—

And this is the manner of the release: Every creditor that lendeth aught unto his neighbor shall release it; he shall not exact it of his neighbor, or of his brother; because it is called the Lord's release.

That is the law of the Scriptures, that every 7 years a release shall be granted.

We have no law left on this subject of debts and credits; it has all been wiped out. We wiped it out under the A.A.A. and the R.F.C. and the other organizations bearing alphabetical names, many of which I cannot remember; but, at any rate, Mr. President, whatever we call the municipal bankruptcy bill, we will be giving it some letters in a few days, because it will then be the President's too.

We have wiped out all such things as laws regulating conduct between debtor and creditor. We have no law left on the subject, so we go back to the law of all laws. We go back to the law that was handed down to man to live under. Before the scientific experts and legal analytics began to tinker with things, we had this as the law. But we have had gentlemen tinkering with the law. They have tinkered with it, and at last have thrown it away. All we have left, if we are going to judge this case on the grounds of good and evil, is the law that was handed down when man was placed on this earth, that every seventh year there should be a release and that debts should not be exacted.

I did not say we had to return to this, but Senators on the Republican and Democratic sides of the Chamber did. I did not say we had to come to this spirit that we are going to dishonor debts, but those Senators did. One of the most conservative men on the Republican side of the Chamber voted for the municipal bankruptcy bill the other day. I nearly fell out of my seat when I heard my friend the Senator from Vermont [Mr. AUSTIN] vote "yea." I did not know whether it was a mistake. I was fixing to walk over to him and tell him we were voting on the bill, but a few minutes later the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. KEAN] voted "yea." Then I understood that I did not understand what the whole thing was about. [Laughter.]

There was not anything left. We were through with the proposition of making anybody responsible for his debts. Why? My friend from New Jersey had a good reason. He said, "They cannot pay them." He is right. They cannot pay their debts. He said, "They cannot pay these debts anyway." That is a positive, honest-to-God fact.

You will not let us make silver money. You will not let us expand the currency. You will not let us bring it down to where there is any such thing as value on what a man has or the things he wants to dispose of.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, just whom does the Senator mean by "you"?

Mr. LONG. Not our family, let me say to the Senator from South Carolina. He and I are holy. I want the Senator to understand that I consider him one of the members of the lodge in good standing. [Laughter.]

Mr. SMITH. To whom does the Senator refer when he says "you"?

Mr. LONG. I refer to the law-making authority of this country, which the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] and I have been trying to get to see the light, those who will not allow us to expand the currency or remonetize silver and give the people something to do business with in this country and to enable them to pay off their debts. It has been a majority of the Senate, not a majority of the Democratic side. We were for inflation of the currency and remonetization of silver. We had a majority of 4 votes on our side of the Chamber before Franklin D. Roosevelt came to be President of the United States. Since he came in as President we have still had a majority of the Members on the other side of the Chamber.

We have a bill that has been brought out of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry—but it is said we are not going to be allowed to pass it—to dispose of the agricultural surplus and to accept silver in payment for it and issue currency on the basis of that silver. If we could have passed that bill earlier, we would not have to be here asking for the adoption of the Frazier amendment today. We would not have had to pass, probably, the municipal bankruptcy bill if we could have passed that bill providing for expansion of the currency and remonetization of silver. But we were not allowed to pass it. We cannot get it done. We are told that if we get it through the Senate it will be killed in the House. We are told that if we get it through both Houses the President will veto it anyway. We are told it cannot be done. We are told we cannot get it enacted into law. So we cannot get rid of what we have in the way of debts, and we cannot pay the debts.

There the farmer stands by his little cabin in which he raised his family. He stands there begging only an opportunity, not to walk the sidewalks, not to go to the moving-picture shows, not to see the world exposition in Chicago, but he stands there asking us to let his wife and three or four children stay in that little hovel he has built for them, to live there off the products that his little piece of land can produce, to give him food for his children when they are hungry and to enable him to clothe them against the winter winds. But we are not going to be permitted to do that for him. The best we can get for him is some nostrum which we know will not do the work.

I admired my friend who interrogated me a moment ago, the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH], when on this floor last year he said he would not tell the American people that the bill which was brought out of his Committee on Agriculture and Forestry was going to give the farmers the relief they were being told they were going to get through the operation of that bill, because he did not believe the bill was going to accomplish that purpose. I knew myself it was not going to do it, but we went ahead and permitted the experiment to be tried. The experiment has been tried and it does not amount to anything.

How are we going to vote down this Frazier amendment? What is the basis for voting it down? I ask the conservative Members of the Senate. Shall it be on the basis of the Constitution? Are we going to vote it down on the ground that we cannot let the farmer go into bankruptcy and have a means by which the home he owns may be saved? We have gone ahead and voted for a corporation bankruptcy bill, a railroad bankruptcy bill, and finally a municipal bankruptcy bill, and yet Senators are going to reject the Frazier amendment on the ground of the Constitution, that it is an evil matter to allow the farmer an opportunity to get rid of his debts. On what ground is that going to be done? Why are we going to do it?

Let me ask the Senator from North Dakota what is the amount of the mortgaged indebtedness of the farmers of the United States today?

Mr. FRAZIER. It is $9,000,000,000.

Mr. LONG. Think of it—$9,000,000,000 of farmers' debts. I think the municipal bonded indebtedness today is about $20,000,000,000. That does not mean Government bonds. I mean to exclude all United States bonds. In round numbers the municipal bonds outstanding today amount to $20,000,000,000, as I understand. The mortgage indebtedness of the farmers amounts to $9,000,000,000, less than one half. As I understand the figures, the municipal bonded debts are $22,000,000,000 and the farmer mortgage debts are $9,000,000,000. The farmers' mortgage indebtedness is only about 40 percent as much as the municipal bonded indebtedness.

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LONG. Certainly.

Mr. MURPHY. I think the farm mortgage debt is nearer $11,000,000,000 than $9,000,000,000, and besides that since 1930 the farmer has accumulated a chattel-mortgage debt of perhaps $5,000,000,000.

Mr. LONG. The municipal debt is about as I stated. All right, let us say $16,000,000,000. It does not make any difference. What is $5,000,000,000 in this day and time? Why quibble over a matter of $5,000,000,000 or $6,000,000,000 difference in figures on a matter of debts? We have not been worrying over any amount like that. We are appropriating this year $10,000,000,000, and it is estimated that we are going to take in $3,000,000,000. We are spending $10,000,000,000 and we are going to collect $3,000,000,000 this year, so we are spending $7,000,000,000 more than we shall get in; so why worry about a mere matter of $5,000,000,000? It is a mere bagatelle. Who is worrying about a little thing like that?

All right, we owe $16,000,000,000, we farmers—$11,000,000,000 of debts in the form of mortgages on our farms and $5,000,000,000 chattel indebtedness. The matter of mortgaging chattels was not allowed in my State until recent years. I knew when we started the Federal land banks that we were not doing a thing in the world but encouraging the farmers to go further and further into debt, and that the day when pay time had come was going to be the day that he could not pay his debts. The money was loaned to him in prosperous times and it came due in depression times.

We have continued to create these debt-making agencies. I do not call them credit agencies. We continued to make it easy for the farmer to go further and further into debt. Now we have $22,000,000,000 of municipal debts. Which is going to do the most good—to help the farmer get rid of $16,000,000,000 of debts or to help the municipalities get rid of $22,000,000,000 of debts? The worst thing that we can say about it is that the farmers owe less than the municipalities owe.

Under the Frazier amendment the farmers' creditors will get $2 where they will get only $1 of the debts which are to be remitted under the municipal bankruptcy bill. I mean by that that from a credit standpoint, as I understand the Frazier amendment, 2½ percent of the principal is payable every year. Under the Frazier amendment the farmer takes bankruptcy. The value of his farm is established by appraisement under order of the court. The farmer who is bankrupt is given the right to repurchase that farm by paying 2½ percent on the principal every year plus 1-percent interest.

In other words, Mr. President, the present value of the farm stands there to be amortized by payments due at the rate of 2½ percent every 12 months, meaning in the long run that every dime of the present value of the farm is going to be paid; meaning that it is going to draw some interest. That is a great deal better than the settlement we made with Italy for the Government of the United States. We did not charge Italy any interest at all, and very little of the principal. That is a better deal than the settlements we have made with England and France and Russia and other foreign countries. That is a great deal better trade than we are making for the municipalities. That is a great deal better than we are going to come out with a whole lot of this other money we have put out.

That is a great deal better value than we are going to get out of a lot of the money we have put out under the E.R.A. and the C.W.A. It will have a great deal better effect on the credit of the United States, because it does not impair the condition of the Federal Treasury to the extent of one 50-cent piece; but it enables the farmer who has no other means by which he can discharge his debt to have the same benefit of the law that we have held to be necessary for corporations, and for railroads, and for municipalities. There is no other way that the farmer can come out. There is no other way that the debtor can come out.

We are told that this means wholesale repudiation. We have already embarked on wholesale repudiation. We embarked on wholesale repudiation when we allowed the European countries to forget $11,000,000,000 that they owed to this country. We embarked on wholesale repudiation when we allowed $22,000,000,000 worth of municipal securities to be wiped off the face of the earth. We embarked on wholesale repudiation when we created the C.W.A., and the E.R.A., and various other alphabetical forms by which Government money was thrown to the winds without getting a fair value for it. We embarked on wholesale repudiation not only of debts but of the constitutional methods that we had understood to be effective in this country when we adopted the N.R.A. and the A.A.A. and various and sundry other things that none of us had ever held to be legal and valid before that time.

Is the reason today for not allowing the farmer a chance to come out, is the reason why we have to defeat farm-relief legislation, to be that suddenly we have been horror-stricken by the midnight sight of the Constitution? Has somebody gone on a somnambulistic performance and in his dreams seen a vision of the Constitution? Has that phantom been thrown back in our faces after this interruption of sinfulness in which we have forgotten that that precious document ever was transcribed for the benefit of our people? Has somebody suddenly got the idea that he has to return to the pages of an instrument which has not touched the Senate top-side or bottom since I have been here, but, instead, we have been operating under the new schemes and new theories that we think are necessary for the American people? Does somebody believe that we are going to resurrect the old document here and have it read in the light of the new order; or are we going to interpret the Constitution along the lines that are necessary for the welfare of the country?

We are told—or, rather, I read that we are told—that under the new interpretations now being made, the Constitution is a reasonable document; that it yields to the necessities of the occasion, and concerns the welfare of the people. In other words, it reads something like one of the poems of Longfellow—one of these things that is all-embracing, and makes a person happy at death. The Constitution, we are told, must be read in the light of the conditions. The Constitution must be considered in the light of what can be done and what cannot be done.

We are not allowed to have constitutional money. We are not allowed to have silver for money. It is known that we could not pay our debts with the money we had. We started out with $7,000,000,000 in currency. How much currency have we today? Two years ago we were bemoaning the inadequacy of $7,000,000,000 in currency. I ask my friend from Oklahoma [Mr. THOMAS], what is our currency issue today? Does the Senator know? Has he read the last Federal Reserve report? I have not looked at it. I will ask the Senator to tell me while I proceed. We started out here and belabored the Republican administration and the Democrats, too, because there was not enough money in circulation. What have we in circulation now?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. LONG. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. On April 25, last Wednesday, we had in circulation $5,324,000,000. That was a decrease from the preceding week of $23,000,000. I might state, in further reply to the Senator, that a year ago, on April 19, 1933, we had in circulation $6,068,000,000. So in a year's time, instead of increasing our circulation as some of us thought we might do, we have lost $744,000,000 in circulation.

Mr. LONG. I might say to my friend from Oklahoma that again has his prophecy been fulfilled. We have decreased the money in circulation, and I notice that commodities are again falling in price. Cotton has gone down 2 cents a pound in the past 20 days, notwithstanding the passage of the Bankhead bill. We have decreased the currency $24,000,000 in a week, and we have decreased the currency supply, as the Senator from Oklahoma informs us, three quarters of a billion dollars; and that does not tell the story. Our present currency is worth only 59 percent of what it was worth last year, on the foreign market at least. So, instead of having five and a half or five and a third billion dollars, we have a little over $3,000,000,000 of value circulating as a medium of exchange in the United States today as against $6,000,000,000 a year ago.

In other words, we have come along here with our nostrums to pay people out of debt, and we have given them a circulating currency, particularly when it meets the foreign exchanges, that is only half what it was a year ago; and even upon any valuation we want to make of the 59-cent dollar, we have today three fourths of a billion less of 59-cent dollars than we had of 100-cent dollars 1 year ago today; and under the recommendations that are being brought in, we stand in a position where we can neither inflate, remonetize silver, expand the currency, nor allow the farmer to decrease his debts. We can go neither to the right nor to the left. We can go neither forward nor back.

We cannot compete with or meet the exchange of Mexico or the Orient. We cannot decrease the debts to meet the actual value of the dollar. Even on a 59-cent-dollar basis, not counting the other 41 cents, we have put through the Congress of the United States a bankruptcy bill to enable the corporations to discharge their debts. We have put through a municipal bankruptcy bill, so that every squandering political government in this country that has loaded itself head over heels in debt can wipe off the debts it has incurred and then go free, just as white as Gabriel's robes. We have come forward and proposed some kind of a bankruptcy bill to put the banks through the wringer; but the farmer cannot pay out of debt because we will not let him have enough money to pay out of debt, and we will not let him write down his debt.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LONG. I yield to the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. In the past week the dollar, instead of becoming cheaper, has started to increase in value.

At the end of March, I think, the dollar was worth $1.35. It is now worth $1.36 plus. So the dollar has increased in buying power during the past week or 10 days.

A short time ago silver was worth about 46 cents on the world market. It is now worth about 41 cents on the world market. In other words, silver has lost 5 cents per ounce in value in the past 10 days because of certain statements made by high officials.

Let me state the result of this fall in the price of silver upon our foreign trade.

About four fifths of the people of the world use silver as money. As silver goes down in value, their money is cheapened in value. As their money is cheapened in value, those countries can produce goods for a cheaper price than they could before the currency fell.

Take the nations of China and Japan and India and Mexico, and other silver-using countries. With a price decline of 5 cents per ounce of silver they can today produce goods 5 cents per ounce cheaper than they could, say, 2 weeks ago. As that affects foreign exchange, it destroys the market for American goods. These other nations can undersell America in the foreign mbarkets by a 5-cent-per-ounce ratio. When they go to buy American goods, their currency having fallen, they have to pay 5 cents per ounce more for American exchange; hence, American goods rise in price.

So the fall in the price of silver operates to the disadvantage of the American farmer, and likewise to the disadvantage of the American manufacturer. If something can be done to raise the price of silver, we shall automatically raise the cost of the production of goods in foreign countries and enable our factories and our farmers better to compete with four fifths of the peoples of the world.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I may say to my friend from Oklahoma that not only will an increase in the price of silver enable this country to compete, but it will enable this country to trade with four fifths of the world with which it cannot trade at present. Sixty-five percent of the people of the world, at least, use silver as the yardstick of money. China and India, with a combined population of some 800,000,000, almost half the world, know no money except silver as their primary money. It is the universal yardstick of money in China and in India. Many other countries, especially South American countries, know only silver as their primary yardstick of money.

With the fall of silver during the past week, cotton was going down, wheat was going down, and hogs were going down. It is not necessary to listen to the statements of the Senator from Oklahoma to know it. It is in the paper. It is there. The prices are down. Why? Because the Secretary of the Treasury and other "experts" who are supposed to be regulating the monetary policy of the present day have said that they are not going to allow any silver legislation to be enacted.

The moment the word went out that there was not to be any silver legislation, down went the prices of commodities, and up went the price of the dollar. The dollar rose from $1.35 to more than $1.36. The currency went down $24,000,000. Silver went down 4 cents on the ounce, or more, from 46 cents to 42 cents. Commodities went down with it. Commodities went down yesterday. I do not know what the stock market will show today, it does not make any difference what it shows, it is more or less a manipulated proposition for a period of time anyway; but it will have to go down. It has gone down. I noticed that the stock of the American Telephone & Telegraph Co. had gone down some 20 points already from the high point it had reached this year.

Why was that? For the simple reason that people cannot pay their debts, for the simple reason that the people of this country cannot sell their commodities, for the simple reason that the country cannot have commercial intercourse with the outside world.

Mr. President, let us see whether this thing is so very bad. This is not the only country which has gotten into debt which it could not discharge, and which just had to repudiate a little.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, I note the Senator is apparently about to read from the Bible. Is that correct?

Mr. LONG. Yes, that is correct.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Then I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. HEBERT. I desire to announce that the senior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] is detained in attendance at the ceremonies in connection with the unveiling of the statue to William Jennings Bryan.

I also wish to announce that the senior Senator from Indiana [Mr. ROBINSON] is detained on official business.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I beg to announce the absences announced by me on a previous roll call, and for the same reasons, and I ask that this announcement stand for the day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Eighty-eight Senators having answered to their names, there is a quorum present.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I had reached the point of reading the law from the Scripture when the Senator from Oklahoma thought there ought to be a quorum present so that Senators might be present to hear it. I might say to those who were not in the Chamber that what I am about to read is in connection with the fact that I had pointed out how the Constitution, from so many constructions of it being made necessary by present-day conditions, has been more or less forgotten. Therefore, I have gone back to cite the fundamental law.

The Senator from Arkansas and the Senator from Nebraska have thought that we are proposing a bad thing because we advocate forgiving interest, proposing to let the farmer wipe out his debts on the basis of bankruptcy, with interest of 1 percent a year for interest and 2½ percent for principal of the present value to be paid each year.

I am going to show the Senate that the Lord has commanded that in times of stress it is necessary to forgive interest altogether. I am going to show that it has been commanded by the supreme law of the world, the only law that has stood for very long. The Constitution has stood for about 125 years, perhaps not quite so long; I have not calculated the time. It was suspended during the World War and then put back on for a little while. [Laughter.] It has actually prevailed for about a century and a quarter, according to my best understanding.

Let me show what has been commanded to be done about interest during times like the present, and let us see whether this amendment of the Senator from North Dakota is to be condemned. I read from the Book of Exodus, the twenty-second chapter and the twenty-fifth verse:

> If thou lend money to any of my people that is poor by thee, thou shalt not be to him as a usurer, neither shalt thou lay upon him usury.

Then a little later on the Scripture defines that, in order to show just what it means. Listen to this, Mr. President and gentlemen of the Senate, you who no longer live under a Constitution, you who have forgotten, and had to forget many of the things you thought were law that we know now are not law, because they cannot exist by reason of necessity, and all law gives way to necessity; listen to what must be done in a time like this. I read from Leviticus, chapter 25, verses 35 and 36:

> And if thy brother be waxen poor, and fallen in decay with thee—

That is the condition that confronts us. If the poor farmer is down and out, the Book says, and has fallen to the point where he cannot pay, this is what the Book says should be done under these conditions, by all of us of the so-called "wise Scribes" who sit here.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. LONG. I yield.

Mr. LOGAN. It seems to me that the Senator from Louisiana is confusing his quotations from the Bible. The fact is that those commandments were given to the Jews, to Jewry, and at the same time they were directed to go out and plow up the fields and destroy the fields of the Gentiles and to kill them with rakes and hoes and cross-cut saws. So I do not think the Senator's quotation is applicable at all to the peculiar conditions which exist today.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, the Senator is wise in many things, but he is not wise in that. The law is for all nations, says the Scriptures. It is said in the Bible that this law is for all nations and for all people; that those nations which observe it shall live and survive, and that those which despise it shall not survive. That is what the Lord says about the law.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, I should be very glad to have the Senator tell me where the Lord said anything like that.

Mr. LONG. I will be pleased to give that to the Senator, for I have all these quotations copied. I do not at this time have all the quotations with me, but I will say to the Senator that I have put them into the RECORD many times.

The law is for all nations. I will say, Mr. President, that the Senator from Kentucky has fallen into error. I will take time on some other occasion to show him his error. I cannot take the time to do so now, for it would take me too long.

I will take the time now to read it—the Lord says in Leviticus, in Book 26——

Mr. LOGAN. Book 26 of Leviticus? There is no such thing as that.

Mr. LONG. The Senator does not know——

Mr. LOGAN. Book 26 of Leviticus?

Mr. LONG. Chapter 26, the Senator might call it.

Mr. LOGAN. Oh, I see.

Mr. LONG. They call it "book" in some places. Chapter 26 of Leviticus:

> And if ye shall despise My statutes, or if your soul abhor My judgments, so that ye will not do all My commandments, but that ye break My covenant:
> I also will do this unto you; I will even appoint over you terror, consumption, and the burning ague, that shall consume the eyes and cause sorrow of heart: and yet shall sow your seed in vain, for your enemies shall eat it.

That is the promise and the threat of the Lord.

Mr. LOGAN. That only applies to this particular people, though.

Mr. LONG. The Senator from Kentucky is wrong.

Mr. LOGAN. It did not have anything to do with the Gentiles.

Mr. LONG. St. Luke, chapter 17, verses 16 and 17, say:

> The law and the prophets were until John: since that time the kingdom of God is preached, and every man presseth into it.
> And it is easier for heaven and earth to pass than one tittle of the law to fail.

St. John, chapter 1, verse 17, says:

For the law was given by Moses, but grace and truth came by Jesus Christ.

And speaking to everybody, Jesus Christ said the following, from St. John, chapter 7, verse 19:

Did not Moses give you the law, and yet none of you keepeth the law?

So the law still exists and is universal.

Mr. President, what did the Lord say to do for the man who has fallen? I quote from Leviticus, twenty-fifth chapter, thirty-fifth verse:

And if thy brother be waxen poor, and fallen in decay with thee; then thou shalt relieve him: Yea, though he be a stranger—

Here it is, my friend from Kentucky.

Yea, though he be a stranger—

And not a Jew—

or a sojourner; that he may live with thee. Take thou no usury of him—

Neither the Jew nor the stranger who has fallen —

Take thou no usury of him—not 1 percent, the rate which the Senator from North Dakota is willing to give him.

Take thou no usury from the fallen farmer who is trying to keep the little shelter above the head of his wife and children.

Take thou no usury of him or increase; but fear thy God; that thy brother may live with thee.

That is the Bible applied to the stranger and applied to the Jew.

Over in Deuteronomy, the twenty-third chapter and the nineteenth verse:

Thou shalt not lend upon usury to thy brother; usury of money, usury of victuals, usury of anything that is lent upon usury.

This is the law of the Scriptures, that in these days, when your brother has fallen, that in these days of stress, that with respect to the stranger and the Jew—the law is made for all nations—you shall not exact interest upon the fallen when he is not able to discharge the principal.

We know the farmer cannot pay this principal. Every man in the Senate knows that the farmer cannot pay the principal. The Lord has told us that it is easier for the heavens and the earth to pass away than for one tittle of the law to fail. He said that no country which refuses to recognize these economic laws can survive. And yet we come here saying that the interest of 1 percent is too little to exact of the fallen.

It reminds me of the old case of the man who was going to take away a sack of gold. He was given all the gold he could take away in a sack on one understanding, which was that he must not put more gold in the sack than he could carry away, and as he put gold into the sack he lifted the sack and decided to put the sack down and put another shovel of gold into it; and then he would lift the sack on his back and start off, and he decided to put it down and put in another scoop of gold; and, finally, Mr. President, he had more gold in the sack than he could carry away, so he had to leave it all.

It reminds me of the man who rides a horse. He spurs it one time and the horse jumps; he spurs him another time and he runs; he spurs him another time and he walks fast; but, finally, he has spurred the horse until there is nothing there that the spur can make respond to suffering.

Today, Mr. President, we have levied upon the American farmer to the point where he is $16,000,000,000 in debt, and he cannot pay the debt; he cannot pay the interest. The Senator from North Dakota comes in here and asks us to pass a bill just like the legislation we passed for the railroads, just like we passed for the corporations, just like we passed for the municipalities, and give that farmer the same right. Mr. President, without exacting all the interest, which he cannot pay, the right to keep the shelter above the head of his wife and his children and himself; the right to have a place whereon he can raise the necessities that are craved to sustain body and soul and life; and we are met at the threshold with the statement that the Constitution forbids the relief that can be given to the farmer, notwithstanding the fact that we could forgive the Government subdivisions of their debts, the railroads of theirs, and the corporations of theirs, and wipe out the outside investors at the same time, forsooth, to say nothing of $11,000,000,000 that we have forgiven which are owed by the foreign powers.

This country is in the condition that another country was in at one time. I am going to show my friend from Kentucky again that this law was for the Gentiles. I am going to read from the fifth chapter of the Book of Nehemiah. Some call it the fifth book of the gospel of Nehemiah. Nehemiah, chapter 5. Let me show to the Senators how the prophet of the Lord went in and redeemed the country when it was paralyzed, as this country is today. I quote beginning with the first verse:

And there was a great cry of the people and of their wives against their brethren the Jews.

This was the cry against the Jews.

For there were that said, We, our sons, and our daughters, are many: therefore we take up corn for them, that we may eat, and live.

Some also there were that said, We have mortgaged our lands—

One would think I was reading about the United States before I get through with this. One would think, Mr. President, that this had been written for the present country, in the present day, before I get through reading to the Senate what the Lord's prophet did under the command of the Lord in carrying out the law as recorded in the fifth chapter of the Book of Nehemiah.

Some also there were that said, We have mortgaged our lands, vineyards, and houses, that we might buy corn, because of the dearth.

There were also that said, We have borrowed money for the king's tribute—and that upon our lands and vineyards.

To pay taxes—

Just like we have done here; we had to borrow money even to pay the taxpayers.

And I was very angry when I heard their cry and these words.

Then I consulted with myself, and I rebuked the nobles, and the rulers, and said unto them—

So said the prophet—

I rebuked the nobles, and the rulers, and said unto them, Ye exact usury, every one of his brother.

He rebuked the rulers and the nobles for allowing this condition to go on which I will show you we have right now, and the Spirit of the Lord ought to rebuke the American Congress for having allowed this condition to come on, and, worse still, to remain.

And I set a great assembly against them.

And I said unto them, We, after our ability, have redeemed our brethren the Jews, which were sold unto the heathen; and will ye even sell your brethren? or shall they be sold unto us? Then held they their peace, and found nothing to answer.

Also I said, It is not good that ye do: Ought ye not to walk in the fear of our God because of the reproach of the heathen our enemies?

I likewise, and my brethren, and my servants, might exact of them money and corn: I pray you, let us leave off this usury.

"I pray you", said the prophet, "let us leave off this interest." And that is not all he said. He went on down and told them what they had to do. He said:

Restore, I pray you, to them, even this day, their lands, their vineyards, their olive yards, and their houses—

Was that all? He did not say, "Restore it and make them pay 2½ percent a year", like the Senator from North Dakota said. He did not say, "Restore it and make them pay 1 percent on that", like the Senator from North Dakota and I are willing to do, if we cannot do better. No. He said:

Restore, I pray you, to them, even this day, their lands, their vineyards, their olive yards, and their houses, also the hundredth part of the money, and of the corn, the wine, and the oil, that ye exact of them.

Why, he said, "Give them back their lands, give them back their vineyards, give them back to them free of debt, and give them some money." That is what he said to do. Any they did it. I will not read the balance. They did it. They forgave their debts. They gave them back their vineyards. They paid out some of their money.

Then said they, We will restore them and we will require nothing of them.

We will require nothing of the fallen people whose farms are mortgaged for $16,000,000,000. We will require nothing of these people who cannot pay their taxes, who have fallen. We will require nothing of them. We will restore it to them and require nothing of them, said they.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LONG. I yield.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Is it recorded whether or not they were called members of the "Demagogic Party"?

Mr. LONG. Well, I think if they lived in this day they would probably be under the leadership of the Senator from Michigan [Mr. COUZENS]—they would at least be under his treasuryship. I will say to the Senator from Michigan that I am glad that he is to be the treasurer of that party. I am glad to surrender the part of the job that I had in that line down in my State. That will make it more easy for me in the future. I think that election is going to be unanimous.

Now, says the Bible:

We will restore them, and we will require nothing of them; so will we do as thou sayest. Then I called the priests, and took an oath of them, that they should do according to this promise. Also I shook my lap, and said, So God shake out every man from his house, and from his labor, that performeth not this promise, even thus he be shaken out, and emptied.

And so the promise was kept, and the country was relieved. They went back to their homes, they went back to their farms; they were given back their homes and were given back their farms, and their vineyards. Their debts were forgiven, and no usury was exacted, and also the hundredth part of the money was given that had been exacted for them. All that was done so the people could get started to going again.

Apparently to us this law of the gospel does not mean a thing on God's earth; but we sit here, when people are starving to death, and say that we are fighting against revolution, when we now have a revolution, and have had it all the time. More people have already died from hunger and from sickness and from injuries done their vitals, going to bed without the food that is required and without the milk and the nourishment that is needed, especially for infants, than have been sacrificed in many a revolution. They have gone to bed in solitude and have awakened in a paralysis. There has been more carnage and more crime and more damage to humanity and to the family than if a revolution had already destroyed the lives of a million people. We would be better off today, Mr. President, even though we had killed a million people, leaving us with only 124,000,000 in this country, than to have living from 60,000,000 to 75,000,000 in the shadow of want and poverty and distress.

You do it for what? For whom? Who told you to do it? Who is telling you to do it now? Oh, the voice of the Constitution speaks; the Constitution comes up as though it were a floating zephyr that has newly made its appearance. Abou Ben Adhem saw a stranger writing in his room. The United States Senate saw the Constitution at midnight.

We have come to a time in the Senate of the United States, after we have declared the bankruptcy policy to be necessary to free corporations, to free the railroads, to free municipalities, when the farmers, who are starving to death, are asking us to invoke the same principle of government that we invoked the other day for the special interests, but suddenly the Constitution arises like Banquo's ghost, threatening fire and destruction, and someone suggests that that cannot be done because of that document that was written in 1789, I believe, which has all been forgotten until it comes down to a point where the man at the bottom is about to be relieved of distress, and still can be ground under and under, as a man lying at the bottom of a sunken road and the army passing over him grinds him farther and farther into the dust, and all he can say is, "But yesterday I was a living man." That is all that is left to him under the forms that we go through.

Why is it? We get somebody to tell us how to get out of trouble; I am glad we get somebody; but we always get somebody I never heard of before in my life, and perhaps it is better than to get somebody I have heard of. The somebody prescribes everything under the sun except something that is found to be fundamentally necessary.

Demagogic they call our party; that is, they form an organization and say it is a party and make some of us members of it. That certainly was a great honor to me. They said I did not belong to any party until they created that last one. I have been turned out of them all, they say. I was always without a party.

We are not allowed to go the road of freeing the people. We adopted a little amendment providing for an addition of 10 percent on the income taxes. That meant that a man paying 4 percent after he made four or five thousand dollars net would have to pay 4.4 percent. It meant also that after a man made over a million dollars he would have to add about 7 percent more to his income tax. It was done with the idea of restoring this Government, in part, to its place from the profits—not from the prophecies but from the profits of the men making the most. It has been pictured that that amendment would grind the people down. It would not do any such thing. It would levy the cost of getting out of this depression on the men whose profits are the biggest. It would not take away even from the biggest anything he had. It would limit his profits so that when he got up into the hundreds of thousands of dollars he would pay a few more thousands, but still have ample profits.

We were not allowed to do that. That could have been done. Nobody need tell me that if the powers had wanted that provision in the other House they could not have had it; the same gag rule that has operated to pass other bills could have operated to pass that provision; but those in charge of operating the machinery over there did not want to put the gag rule in motion. On the contrary, it looked like the gag rule went the other way. Only about 77 out of 435 were willing to allow that amendment to go through in the other House. So we had to back off in the Senate.

Now we come with a silver bill, another means of liberalizing the currency; and we also come with the Frazier amendment, designed to allow the farmers to pay off their debts. We did not establish the principle; we did not make the precedent. We let the leaders on this side of the Senate or on the other side, and the President and all the flower of administration that gathers around it from Florida to Maine, from the cotton fields to the pine forests, from the quagmires and the farms to the march of trade from one side of America to the other establish the precedents. Not until they had established the principle that the only way we could get this country out of the depression was to allow the corporations and the railroads and the municipalities to cancel their debts, did we come here with the amendment of the Senator from North Dakota, intended to give the farmer the same right to write down his debts as has been given to the special interests to write down their debts.

We would not have put anybody out of his home if we had failed to pass the municipal bankruptcy bill; we would not have done any such thing in connection with the railroad bill; but when we fail to adopt the Frazier amendment it means that day after day and month after month and year after year we have got to continue to take more farmers from under the roofs over their heads; we have got to take them away from the places which they need in order to make a living for themselves and their families; and, unless we are going to do something of this kind, I see no relief in sight unless, perchance, we adopt the amendments that have been offered by the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. THOMAS] and myself, and the one which I was inspired through the Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER] and the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] and comes from the Agricultural Committee, on which they serve, but all of which, Mr. President, sprang from the pen and from the mind of the senior Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER], who, day in and day out, has stood on the floor of the Senate and gone to the wide-open spaces and into the crowded cities shouting that if we would restore constitutional silver money and afford a medium of exchange that is used as a yardstick of money by 65 percent of the people of the world, there would be a means of disposing of the surplus and creating the currency necessary to free this country of its debts.

I regret, Mr. President, to see grand old America admittedly slipping from its place of security, day by day. I regret to see municipal bonds no longer backed by the sovereignty and the credit and the stability of the law of any State or any government. I regret to see private bonds no longer protected by the guarantees that we thought existed for property of that kind.

I regret that I saw the day come when the gold that was the property of every man could be commandeered by the Government of which he was a part, brought into the Treasury, and to see him handed back a bill devaluated to 59 cents on the 100 cents of which he was deprived. I regret to see that kind of conditions come about.

I regret even more than that to see laws springing up all over this country under which people are being haled into the Federal courts, which to them are like foreign soil, called upon to stand trial and judgment for walking from one side of the yard to another side of the yard, wholly within one town and one county and one State, as though it were a matter of interstate commerce. I regret to see that where a man presses a little suit of clothes for 35 cents and returns it to his neighbor living 10 yards away, instead of charging him 40 cents, that it is held to be a matter of interstate commerce, so much so that he can be sent to the penitentiary. I regret to see those nostrums prescribed by which I cannot even take a ham after I have taken it from a fat hog over the back of my fence and swap it to my neighbor for a bag of beans. I think it a damnable outrage that I cannot take a sack of peanuts and go cross the street and trade it for a sack of rice or a bucket of cane sirup; but I am not permitted to do it under the existing law.

I am responsible for a little of it, because I sat here for some time and did not say anything, but went on like the chicken that had been pecked on the head so long that it did not know it would do any good to rise up and cackle another time. [Laughter.]

We went along until we got where we are today. Everybody seemed to have lost the courage to shout again against it. When the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. FRAZIER] offered his amendment, I wondered how he had aroused his courage to come back again. He has taken so many beatings in the Senate that I did not see how he could possibly come back again. Talk about the champion prizefighter of the United States coming back after he was knocked down 16 times. We have come back after we have been knocked down 16,000 times in the Senate. We have tried to expand the benefits of the Government honestly and equitably to the lowest as well as to the preferred. Time after time we have come back trying to get away from these fantastic fanaticisms that have been tried and found not to work.

We come now with another little simple expedient to let the people keep their homes, but that sounds like something not to be found in the blue book. We come with a little expedient to pare down their interest a little, but that is not to be found in the Constitution, they say. We come along with a financial proposal which the Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER] and the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. THOMAS] have shouted about to the country, and I joined in their voices to try to make them a little bit louder, trying to tell the country that we had to come back and give the people of the country money to pay their debts and to have an interchange of commodities, not only domestically but even with foreign countries.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma rose.

Mr. LONG. I yield to the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. The Senator from Louisiana has mentioned the question of bonds and the probable result of the bill passed yesterday, I believe it was giving cities the right to file petitions in bankruptcy. If that legislation is finally enacted and signed by the President, it will be possible for cities to go into the Federal courts and file petitions, hoping or seeking to have an adjustment and a reduction of their bonded indebtedness. If the large cities take advantage of that law, and the representatives of the larger cities were sponsoring the bill, does not the Senator from Louisiana think it will follow necessarily that the smaller cities will do likewise?

Mr. LONG. They will have to do it.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Even cities that are solvent, so to speak, will of necessity take that step.

Mr. LONG. They will all take it.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Campaigns will be waged in the smaller cities to force them to take advantage of the law.

Mr. LONG. Certainly.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. If the larger cities and the smaller cities take advantage of bankruptcy, what is the opinion of the Senator from Louisiana with regard to the counties of the Nation?

Mr. LONG. They will have to take it, too, and the States will have to take it, and then the Nation will have to take it. That is what I think.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. That is what I fear, and that is the reason why I voted against the bill.

Mr. LONG. I voted against it for the same reason the Senator from Oklahoma did. It is going to mean that the counties will take advantage of the bankruptcy law. It is going to mean that the States will follow suit. It is going to mean that the United States will have to take bankruptcy. For example, the city of New York owes more money than the State of New York owes. I believe that is the fact. I think I am safe in saying that. If we are going to cancel the debts of municipalities owing more than the States in which they are located, certainly the States will follow suit. That goes as a matter of course.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ERICKSON in the chair). Does the Senator from Louisiana yield further to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. LONG. Certainly.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. If the cities scale down their indebtedness by forced refunding on the basis of a smaller bond issue, and if that wave spreads to the smaller cities and the States, what will be the effect upon those who now hold bonds, such as the life-insurance companies, the savings banks, the trust funds, the endowment funds for colleges, and the individual investors in bonds?

Mr. LONG. They are all going through the wringer. Everyone will go that way, because the life-insurance companies will have to fall if they own municipal bonds which they cannot collect. It will mean that a man's life-insurance policy will be depreciated in its value. It will mean that many men and women back in the country, who have spent every dime they had for a city bond, will wake up and find they have not anything of value. It will mean the constant falling of credit of all those big institutions upon which the Government depends for its financing and upon which the States depend for their financing. The States will not have the insurance companies to call on tomorrow for financing, because the insurance companies are not going to have the money.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. LONG. Certainly.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Is it not a fact that since the depression struck in October 1929 the mass of the little people of the country—and by little people I mean those with small resources—have had their resources depleted, and now the same policy which destroyed the little fellow is reaching the creditor or bondholding class?

Mr. LONG. That is true.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Under the present policy of this Government with regard to money, there is no other policy that can be pursued except the one Congress initiated a few days ago. The people cannot pay their obligations. The farmers cannot pay their taxes. The taxes are not being paid. Yesterday I had a wire from the State superintendent of my State advising me that in Oklahoma there are 1,607 school districts which are not collecting taxes. The teachers in those school districts, 11,000 of them, have had no salaries since February. The money is exhausted, the warrants are held at a discount, and there is nobody to buy the warrants even at a discount; the people cannot pay the taxes because they cannot borrow the money, they cannot sell anything for money, and so they are making an appeal to Washington for funds to keep the schools going.

Immediately I took up the matter with the proper relief organization, and I found that funds are now being made available, not for my State alone but for 29 other States to pay the salaries of teachers.

I submit, if this policy of deflation is to continue, the suggestions I have made in the last few moments and agreed to by the Senator from Louisiana are the inevitable result and a program of Nation-wide deflation, repudiation, and chaos faces us. That is the thing I have taken so much time in the last few years to endeavor to avert. It was clear to me months and years ago, but in some places it is not yet clear. I am afraid it will not be clear until it is too late.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, without any question, what the Senator said is correct. I do not consider myself an economist, but how anyone can figure that we have started anywhere except toward world-wide or at least Nation-wide repudiation so far as the United States is concerned, I cannot understand. By the passage of the municipal bankruptcy law we are going to break down the credit of those municipalities which are solvent. Then will follow the breaking down of the credit of insurance companies, savings banks, and other financial institutions of the United States, and finally and inevitably we will begin the collapse that is bound to come. No one wants to see it, but I am afraid it is coming.

I do not know who is doing the planning. I do not know whose is the wise mind behind a lot of it. But I do know they have been told, if they have read anything at all, by the examples of the past, that we cannot start repudiating an enormous part of the bond structure of this country and of the debts of this country unless we expect it to affect the balance of the business.

I was glad a moment ago, when I was reading the Scriptures to the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. LOGAN], that I happened to read that the law was meant for the strangers as well as the Jews. I had intended, before I took my seat, if I had not been able to turn to the place readily, to read further.

I have read here many times to show that a nation cannot be held in bondage this way, that it has been pointed out through the divine law how a nation should get out of it. I have shown how nations did get out of it and the only way they can get out of it. We know from examples of the last few years, and if we have forgotten the last few years, we know from examples of the last few days, that when we took away the basic money and confined the spirit of our operations, confined the market for the disposal of our products, confined the recourse that we had to the world by not giving an adequate and sufficient currency and money to this country, we made it all the more impossible.

These examples apparently mean nothing. I said the other day, and I repeat, that I read over in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD the other day by accident something I had said here that I had forgotten saying. I said that I had gone out to the worst adversary I had in business, and I had usually been able either to make him see reason or to see reason myself. If we tried something and it did not work, I could always get him to see my way, or I saw his way when he did not, or we mutually saw a way to show the fault of both of us to some extent. But how on earth can anyone figure that the United States of America, a country of States and of people and of law and order and government, can come out with a medium of exchange that has been reduced in 12 months from $6,000,000,000 to $5,300,000,000, with the $5,300,000,000 depreciated 41 cents on the dollar to a point where we have a monetary value of three and a fraction billion dollars today as against $6,000,000,000 a year ago, 50 percent, and we knew we had too little then? How we can expect to bring this country out and to afford the farmers and the debtor class a chance of discharging these obligations I cannot understand.

How a wise man, with enough talent to be in the Senate—and I hope all of us have that much talent—how any man with enough talent to sit in the United States Senate can see that there is a hope in the world of coming out of this condition, I cannot understand.

The Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. THOMAS] asked me a question. I should like to ask him a question, if he will permit me to do so; and I address this question to my friend from Oklahoma. I wish to ask him if he thinks that it is possible, with the money supply we have, that these various and sundry nostrums can possibly afford the farming and debtor class a chance to get into reasonable commerce in this country?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, not a single chance.

Mr. LONG. And we have stated that on this floor for how many years?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. For a good while.

If we are going to keep the monetary situation as it is, the only possible program is to scale down the debts, which means, in my judgment, Nation-wide repudiation.

On the other hand, the price level can be raised. It can be done at any time. Instead of having, as we have now in terms of gold, 49-cent wheat, it can be raised to a dollar by manipulating the money of the country. Cotton can be raised, livestock can be raised, everything else can be raised in price. It is as simple as it can be, and those in authority know that it can be done, but apparently there is an influence in certain places not to have prices raised.

I know there are people in the country who do not want to see prices go up; but no salvation is possible for the debtor class, which includes the vast majority, unless the price level is raised. If we continue on the present policy, a program of repudiation is the inevitable result.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, we have been going along for a good while hoping to see something turn up to correct this condition. There are only two ways to go. I might say that there are three ways to go; but the last two ways might be regarded as one way, and the opposite might be regarded as the other alternative.

There are only two ways to go. One is the old laissez faire route; let things go as they will; let them alone. That is one way to go. That way means rolling over people. It means crushing their bones and their muscles. It means spilling blood. It means, in the final wind-up, the ordinary policy of human carnage that finally works itself out to a point where those who live—"the survival of the fittest", as it is called—own the earth, and are supplied.

That is one way. That way will work, and it will work the way it always has worked, and no other.

There is another way, and that is to work according to the law that is given here in this book. There are only two ways to work. There are only two ways in which we can make this thing work at all. One is to let it alone, to let people starve and let them cry, let them fight and let them die. That is one way—the old laissez faire doctrine. That is the ultraconservative way. The other way, Mr. President, is the way that is laid down by the Supreme Lawmaker of all time to regulate the conduct of one human being toward another among nations and among peoples.

There is the way that leaves people alone to suffer and to starve and to die. There is the way by which man considers himself a part of the family of all humanity; by which one nation's problems become the problems of all its people and of all other nations. That is the way of the law of the Gospel and the law of the Supreme Lawgiver, who says that the nation which observes it shall be a people living in a land of plenty, eating their fill, with no misery and starvation among them. As we are told in the second chapter of the Prophet Joel:

> Behold, I will send you corn, and wine, and oil, and ye shall be satisfied therewith * * *.
> And the floors shall be full of wheat, and the fats shall overflow with wine and oil * * *.
> And ye shall eat in plenty, and be satisfied.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LONG. I yield.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. With the Senator's permission, I should like to make a further observation in his time.

I said just a moment ago that it is possible to raise the price level, which means to raise the price of the things the people produce, not only on the farm but in the factory, in the fisheries, in the lumber camps, and in the mines.

In 1920 we had a very large amount of money in circulation—about $6,200,000,000. Because of this vast amount of money in circulation, placed there by the administration, it was possible to borrow money at the banks. Because of these two things—plenty of money and liberal credits—we had high prices. At that time wheat was selling for $3 a bushel. Cotton was selling for 42 cents a pound. Livestock was high. Everything else was high. Every man had a job. The man who did not want to work had to hide, because the job would pursue him.

In 1920, because of those things, we had prosperity. Everybody was busy. In one of the great political conventions held in 1920 the party that was out of power condemned the party in power, and accused that party of being responsible for the prevailing high prices. In the platform of the minority party at that time it was stated that the prevailing high prices were due to an overexpansion of currency and credit, which meant a depreciation of the buying power of the dollar.

In the same platform the minority party promised that if they were placed in power they would bring down these high prices; they would bring down the price of corn, the price of wheat, the price of cotton, the price of everything which was called "the high cost of living." Our problem today is just the reverse. We are trying to raise prices. At that time the problem was to reduce prices; and the opposition party pledged that if they were successful they would take money out of circulation, and they would curtail credits.

The minority party won in that year; and on the 4th of March 1921, when the new majority party came into power, the first thing that was done was to begin to take money out of circulation. For the next 18 months the party in power took out of circulation $100,000,000 per month, until the circulation had been decreased $1,800,000,000. When this money was taken out of circulation, cotton was not selling for 42 cents a pound. It had fallen to 20 cents. Wheat was not selling for $3 per bushel. Wheat was selling for $1 a bushel. There is positive proof that taking money out of circulation brought down the prices of commodities.

I think no argument is needed to prove that if we should reverse that policy and put money into circulation we could increase the price of commodities. If the economic law works one way, it is certain to work the other way. I suggest that program for the consideration of the Senate. If we want to raise prices, it can be done at any time we see fit by reversing our process of taking money out of circulation and beginning to put money into circulation. That can be done through the purchase of silver and in other ways.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, what the Senator from Oklahoma says is so well known and is so easily understood that I do not even hear it disputed, and I do not think anyone will dispute it.

We were told in 1920 that the party elected in the fall of that year were going to do just what they did. They said they were going to bring down prices by depleting the money supply, and they did. I remember that when Mr. Harding took the oath of office, one of the first things he said was, "Back to normalcy!" He created and coined a new word—"back to normalcy; back to the normal state of things"—and we went back to the condition that had formely existed, if that is what he meant. It did not all happen in his day, but eventually we went back to it.

The return to the former condition was aided by something that was coming on that was still worse. There was a concentration of wealth in the hands of the few. There was a concentration of the money, and not only a concentration of the money but there was a gradual accumulation of the entire property of the country in the hands of a few men, and we saw everything that Oliver Goldsmith had told us about. We saw the princes and the lords beginning to flourish, and we saw the poverty-stricken peasants of the land beginnning to fade. Then it was that his words came true:

> Ill fares the land, to hastening ills a prey,
> Where wealth accumulates, and men decay;
> Princes and lords may flourish or may fade—
> A breath can make them, as a breath has made—
> But a bold peasantry, their country's pride,
> When once destroyed can never be supplied.

The princes and the lords grew; they flowered; they blossomed forth. They took up the game of golf in the afternoon. They took up the bridge party at nighttime. They took up the pastime by which they gathered together and consumed the wines of the Orient that were poured into their goblets of gold. Belshazzar's feast was imitated in every quarter of the globe.

Abundance, splendor, raiment, glory, everlasting for the few, until the carnage that had set in at the bottom for the masses began to spread, until they became homeless and hungry, and as that spiral wave went toward the top, the carnage began to reach up into the realm of the well-to-do, and like cannibals the rich began to eat the flesh of one another, so that one rich man fell and another rich man became richer, and the plutocracy became smothered, the rich became fewer, the middle class began to fail, there was no such thing as the masses at the bottom, the middle structure, and then the top. It became for America only the superrich, at the top, and the pitiful at the bottom.

I am not pleading for discrimination for the farmer; I am pleading for equality for him. I am pleading that he be given what it has already been said should be given to these other interests. I am appealing that he be given what it has already been said should be given to the railroads, and to the corporations, and to the municipalities. I am saying that if it has been decided that it is time to wipe out the debt structure and clear those debtors which happen to be among the railroads and the corporations, then by the same rule it is time to wipe off the debts the farmers cannot pay.

I see no one rising to contradict that statement. I have heard no one say that there is anything in that statement that is not in keeping with the facts. There is going to be no one here who will say that we have not vindicated the principle. We have done so. We are faced with the necessity of adopting a policy. We are faced with making a decision.

Mr. President, I do not suppose it is going to be the purpose to act on the amendment this afternoon. I see nobody here in the leadership on either side. I do not intend to call them in, but they had better come in. I am liable to make a motion to adjourn.

Mr. McKELLAR. We will not adjourn, Mr. President. Notwithstanding what the Senator says, we will go along for the present.

Mr. LONG. I thank the Senator from Tennessee. I am glad he is here. I have had a right nice audience here this afternoon, but I have not had the privilege of talking to the Senator from Tennessee. He is one of the Senators who ought to have been listening to what I have been saying, because he has the kind of heart that would have responded to it.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I heard all the best of it. I heard the Senator's quotations from the Good Book, and that was the best part of the Senator's speech.

Mr. LONG. That is right; I thank the Senator. If he heard me read from Nehemiah, and Deuteronomy, and Leviticus, and Exodus, and if he applies those messages to his heart, in the present conditions, we will have another vote for the Frazier amendment tomorrow morning.

I really feel, Mr. President, that the time has come when we ought to return to the old fundamental law, return to wisdom.

According to the Bible, those who oppress the fallen, the heavy laden, the wage earner, the man who has something to sell, can only expect the visitation of the same kind of disaster upon himself that he brings upon others. Where a nation oppresses its peasantry to the point where they are gradually exterminated, run from their homes, left without shelter, given scant or no food, are scantily clad, the injustices practiced on the people who are left in that state as a result of the activities of the rulers and of the ruling classes must, in the nature of things, be visited upon the classes of people and upon the nations which tolerate that.

How can we go into the next year asking prosperity for business? The only way to secure prosperity for business is to have prosperity for the masses. The only way to get contented business is to have a contented commonry, a contented class of people at the bottom. The only way by which we can start to restore America is to correct the paralysis which exists at the bottom now.

Until we guarantee to the large majority of these people, many of whom live on the farm, that they shall be secure in receiving for their products and for their work the things which give them comfort and convenience in life, until that is done, until those people can start out with hope, with the glamor of promise, there is not a ghost of a show that we are ever going to bring prosperity back to America, or that we are ever going to have a safe ruling class.

Who is there who has read the works of Byron, who is there who has read the works of Milton, who is there who has read the works of Plato, who has read the philosophy of Goldsmith, of Burns, of every leader of Christianity and of every other religion, who has not found the similarity between what they have said and the common thread of thought expressed by Lord Bacon, that when you allow goods and property to be gathered into the hands of the few, there must be a fall for the people at the bottom, and that no nation can live unless it provides first against the acquirements of the few becoming too large and the holdings of the many becoming too small?

Who has not noted the lines of the Greek philosopher, which read:

> Fullness finds more suffering than famine.

Because in the days of fullness, say those philosophers, so many are desirous of having so much more than their share and than their needs.

So much, also, for the doctrine of Confucius. So much for the Scriptures. So much for it being proved today, when all should have enough for the convenience and comfort of everybody, that in the days of fullness, the greed and the avarice and the rascality of some people becomes so rampant that more people are starved in the days of plenty than in days of famine.

In the old days, after Joseph had been sold by his brothers and sent into the foreign land of Egypt, there was a famine in the land, and his brothers had journeyed out of the land over into Egypt, where they had met their brother, the new prophet, where he had stored up plenty in order that all might be able to feed themselves and others in the days of famine which were sure to come in the 7 years—in those days of famine, famished as were those people, barren as was their land, nevertheless they had spread around the products that they had gathered there for the days when there would be nothing grown, so that all might eat and all might rest, even in the days of famine, by sharing things among the people without the god of greed and selfishness controlling them.

And yet we come to these, the days of plenty. It is not a day of famine. It is not a day when the land has not yielded its fruit. It is the day when they have had yielded the pomegranates, the milk, the honey, the cotton, the wool; it is the day when the reservoirs have been opened by the smiles of the Lord, and every natural product that humanity could desire or could consume has come forth in abundance; and with it all we have a great Senator from North Dakota, who has to even ask that the farmers of this country be allowed to participate in this magnificent prosperity to the little extent of being allowed to live on the little farms and in the little houses that they own, but for which their wives and their children must be turned out into the roads and the streets. Yet in the days of fullness we deny them what they would have been granted in days of famine.

Yet we call upon the resurrection of the Constitution, we call upon the sacred elders and the sacred fires! We call back the spirit of the living and the spirit of the dead, that the living may die and the dead remain dead. For what? For peonage? Is it to preserve this peonage and to make it worse?

There is no difference in any State. It is the same in Tennessee as it is in Louisiana, only perhaps worse. The same in North Dakota as it is in Louisiana, only maybe worse.

Thank God for Louisiana. It can get along better than most States. Somehow or other the Lord has been kind to us down there. We have an abundance down there, if only it were shared. Somehow or other the ordinary man can take his share of much of it there without any law to help him. He can fish the year around, and there is plenty of fish. He can find fish, he can find shrimp, he can find oysters, he can find a little land where he can catch a few wild animals, such as the mink and the muskrat and the coon and the 'possum; he can always hoe down and pick up a little corn; he can always find a few tabasco leaves and make up a little pepper, and he can live there and bask in the sunlight of perfection and the splendor of the earth and of the divine realities, Mr. President, whether he has got much or not.

But, unfortunately, the country is not all like Louisiana. And even Louisiana could be so much better, if we followed these sacred rules.

For so much, Mr. President, we appreciate the great help that we have been given, that such a garden spot of the world might remain; we appreciate those two companies of mounted Tennessee riflemen who came down there in the year 1815, that in keeping Louisiana we might make North Dakota and other States members of the American Union; and we appreciate it so much that we would today extend our prosperity, and double it in our own State, and see it extended into Tennessee and into the other States of this country.

We cannot give them our climate; we wish we could. We would if we could. We cannot give them our marvelous and beautiful streams. We would if we could, but we cannot. We cannot give them the smile of the sunlight that comes only from the divinity itself, that is as brilliant there in the month of December as it is in the month of June, but we would if we could. At least we can extend our influences up to the State of Tennessee, and we can say, Whatever we have in superabundance we are willing that it might be shared with you, and whatever you have here among yourselves we want you to enjoy that.

So, Mr. President, it is with an unselfish motive and an unselfish purpose that we undertake to extend such an accommodation. And with the knowledge which I think that I have undertaken to spread here today, as it has been illuminated by the remarks of my friend from Oklahoma, who is there who will stand in the way, who is there who will throw the rock that will keep the sunlight of the splendor from all lands and all climes that is a part of these famous United States? Who is there that would have the American Congress stand in the way of breaking down the fetters and the shackles and artificial restraints that keep the people here, standing in the midst of all splendor, from sharing that magnificence among themselves and enjoying the abundance which has been made possible through the blessings for which we are altogether to be credited?

I submit that we should go home now and sit down and give some thought to this problem. I believe that we ought to return to our respective places of abode now. I do not believe we should remain here longer this evening. We should take these propositions which have been presented to us today, hoping for the change that may help a suffering and struggling, but a mighty and worthy, people.

Mr. McNARY rose.

Mr. LONG. Does the Senator wish me to yield?

Mr. McNARY. If the Senator desires to discontinue, the Senator from Pennsylvania should like to have the floor for a short time, and then a motion would be made to recess until 12 o'clock tomorrow.

Mr. LONG. I will yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania.

ONE HUNDREDTH ANNIVERSARY OF THE DEATH OF GILBERT DU MOTIER, MARQUIS DE LA FAYETTE

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I ask the Chair to lay before the Senate a concurrent resolution coming over today from the House of Representatives.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LEWIS in the chair) laid before the Senate the concurrent resolution (H.Con.Res. 37), which was read, as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That in commemoration of the one hundredth anniversary of the death of Gilbert du Motier, Marquis de La Fayette, the two Houses of Congress shall assemble in the Hall of the House of Representatives at 11 o'clock a.m. on Sunday, May 20, 1934.

That a joint committee consisting of five Members of the House of Representatives and five Members of the Senate shall be appointed by the Speaker of the House of Representatives and the President of the Senate, respectively, which is empowered to make suitable arrangements for fitting and proper exercises for the joint session of Congress herein authorized.

That invitations to attend the exercises be extended to the President of the United States and the members of his Cabinet, the Chief Justice and Associate Justices of the Supreme Court of the United States, the Diplomatic Corps (through the Secretary of State), the General of the Armies, the Chief of Staff of the Army, the Chief of Naval Operations, the Major General Commandant of the Marine Corps, and the Commandant of the Coast Guard, and such other persons as the joint committee on arrangements shall deem proper.

That the President of the United States is hereby invited to address the American people at the joint session of the Congress in commemoration of the centennial anniversary of the death of General La Fayette.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration and adoption of the resolution.

There being no objection, the concurrent resolution was considered and agreed to.

RECIPROCAL TARIFF AGREEMENTS

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, our desire to be neighborly with all the nations of the world must continue in the future as it has persisted in the past. The United States has always used its greatest power in a practical way to be helpful to all the people of the world. We cannot do so by encouraging legislation which will do much to undermine the living conditions of our own people. One of the greatest contributions which the United States has made to all the world is our example of high wages, improved working conditions, and standards of living, which example has set the pace for working people everywhere. To lower our living standards will not aid the working people of the countries which compete with us, but rather they will be further crowded down on the economic scale.

Today, when drastic legislation has been introduced dealing with every phase of our contemporary life, we need, more than ever, strong legislation which will firmly and permanently safeguard the interests of American labor and industry. In the interests of justice and brotherhood our highest duty is now performed by protecting ourselves.

I have long believed that it would be much better for us to maintain the competitive American markets for our own products and thus suggest to foreign competitors that they increase the wages of the foreign workmen who produce their competitive products to a parity with our own. This will result in a world-wide improvement of living standards, and an increase of purchasing power throughout the world. No successful substitute other than good wages has ever been found as the basis for purchasing power, and this is just as true in Europe and in Asia as within our own borders. We cannot hope to compete with our own products in world markets as long as the cost of production by reason of higher wages is greater in America than in any other country.

Moreover, we dare not lower our wage scales if we hope to maintain our purchasing power. The only alternative in a competitive world—and we have plenty of competition—is a firm and just tariff legislation which will safeguard American industry and thereby help maintain our example of good wages and decent living standards to the rest of the world.

Although the basic principles of tariff legislation are the same today as they have always been, their application has been changed to some extent by new conditions of living. This is particularly true of our own country. The standards of living in the United States for the workingman are higher than those of any other people. It has long been recognized that other countries with whom we compete in the world market have not measured up to us in this respect. I fully realize it is more or less true that when we raise our tariff barriers to protect our workers European and Asiatic employers, to enable them to make our tariff inoperative, have cut their cost of production by reducing wages, thus decreasing their buying power and also their standards of living, in order that they may undersell us, not only in the markets of the world but also in our very own market.

We know, too, that if they fail to achieve their end by reducing wages and living standards, they resort to monetary inflation, for which we in the end pay. Therefore, shall we step away from our own rigid economic nationalism which, it is claimed by our international enthusiasts, lowers the living standards of the workers in foreign lands only to bring American living standards down to theirs? In other words, we are confronted with the question, Shall we destroy our own buying power, which makes the American market equal to the combined markets of all Europe, by lowering our wages and our living standards? My answer is "No."

Mr. President, the administration has insisted that the salvation of the United States and of the world depends upon the reduction of tariff rates on certain stipulated competitive articles. I would not wish to assent to this principle before the people of this country shall have had a full opportunity to know what such procedure will cost us in closed factories, increased unemployment, and the further impediment of American industry. I am unable to comprehend how we can expect to keep our factories open, many of them now only working part time, by lowering the tariff, thus giving our foreign competitors the American market. How can we hope to increase employment in this country by encouraging Americans to buy foreign competitive products at this time when even in normal times many of our own factories and mills operate not more than 7 months in each year?

Steel is a well-known index of American prosperity. Steel not only in itself is a great industrial field, but sympathetically affects the economic health of coke, coal, oil, ore, limestone, and practically all kindred industries. Again I ask how can we hope to increase employment in the United States by removing the protective safeguards of American industry and agriculture and thus encourage our countrymen to buy foreign competitive textiles, glass, coal, lumber, and steel, together with many other manufactured and agricultural products? The American people are now sufficiently alert to the precarious conditions of labor and industry that they will not support legislation which will result in reducing their standards of living.

We must defeat all proposals that do not openly protect the American standard of living and wages. We must increase rather than destroy the purchasing power of our American worker. I propose a plan that will not only protect the buying power of America, but increase the buying power of the people throughout the world.

I say now without fear of contradiction that if the workers of foreign lands had the same standards of living and wages that we have, they would have the same buying power, and with such buying power sufficient work would be provided to consume what agriculture produces, and keep the mills, shops, and factories busy for the next quarter of a century.

Therefore, I present an amendment to the bill (H.R. 8687) to amend the Tariff Act of 1930. The amendment is designed to maintain the buying power of the 50,000,000 gainfully employed in America, as well as to serve notice on foreign employers that if they want a share of our competitive market, they in turn must increase the buying power of their own people.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the amendments intended to be proposed by me may be printed in the RECORD and lie on the table.

The amendments intended to be proposed by Mr. DAVIS to the bill (H.R. 8687) to amend the Tariff Act of 1930, were ordered to lie on the table, to be printed, and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

On page 3, after line 16, to insert the following:

"(b) No agreement under the provisions of this act shall be concluded with any foreign country with respect to articles in the production of which labor standards, as reflected in wages, living scales, and labor costs, are lower than those which obtain in the production of the comparable articles in the United States.

"(c) The United States Tariff Commission shall determine in each instance whether the specified conditions have been met."

On page 3, line 17, strike out "(b)" and insert "(e)."

On page 2, line 9, after the word "whenever" insert "after investigation by the Tariff Commission and conferences by said Commission with parties in interest."

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

THURSDAY, MAY 3, 1934

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D.D., offered the following prayer:

Heavenly Father, we praise Thee that in Thy presence there is fullness of joy, at Thy right hand there are pleasures forevermore. Only as we cherish high and holy thoughts of Thee do we find a permanent rest to our souls. We thank Thee for Thy brooding love and care. Forbid that we should look on a daybreak without it quickening us to new endeavor; let it always mean to us a new-born opportunity. "Holy, Holy, Holy, Lord God Almighty!" We rejoice that this is the song of the angels, of archangels, and of all the heavenly hosts, the song of the hovel and palace, the theme of mighty anthems, the prayer of inspired masses and of the hearts of Thy appealing children. We entreat Thee, Eternal One, to hold before us this vision of a holy God and crown our souls with that unmatched power that makes for righteousness. Through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Horne, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate agrees to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H.R. 7835) to provide revenue, equalize taxation, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the Senate recedes from its amendment no. 13, and agrees to the amendment of the House to the amendment of the Senate no. 1 to said bill.

THE NEW MOTHER'S STAMP

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD on the subject of Mother's Day.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Speaker, mother is by all odds the sweetest word in the English language. Around it cluster precious memories of swings and trundle-beds; of rolling hoops and patched pantaloons; of the pucker of green persimmons and the paralyzing smell of asafetida bags; of orchards full of blooms; of delightful excursions with joyful little companions through the woods down to the brook; of fishing all day long with bent pins when the largest victim was a solitary minnow of infinitesimal proportions; of mud squashing between bare toes; of contact with the business end of bumblebees; of loud wails on our part and of her whom we remember as being, of all persons in the world, most kind and sympathetic and true, telling us not to cry while she kisses our tiny wounds to take away the hurt.

There is no language known to men that can describe a mother's love. Of all emotions that influence the human mind it is the sweetest and the best. The bitterness and sorrow that would be the common lot in this vale of tears if it were not for mother love melt into happiness and joyous inspiration in the radiance of its tender flame.

Mother love has no yesterday and no tomorrow, but reigns eternally. There is no limit to its bounds. There is no plummet that can sound its depths. It reaches all the way from earth to heaven. With ineffable tenderness it leads the tottering infant past the dangers and pitfalls of life and guides him through the struggling years of childhood and maturity so that when the miracle we call death ends his earthly journey he is fit to take his place among the stars by the side of his Creator.

No tongue can explain mother love or trace its origin. The least we can say of it is that it is one of the mysteries that spring from God. We know that it is something real because there is no sacrifice too great for it to make.

From the time of Eve, who laid her very own on the altar of grief, down through the ages to Mary, who witnessed the unspeakable Tragedy of the Cross, and on and on, century after century, the word "mother" has always been the symbol of devotion, every age presenting in myriad repetitions and varying forms the solicitudes and sacrifices of mother love.

For the first time in the history of America, Mother is being recognized by the issuance of a special postage stamp in her honor. With the near approach of Mother's Day this stamp has just been placed on sale in all of the post offices of our country. It is a proper tribute and a beautiful recognition of Mother. Artistically, in its conception and in its design, the new stamp is next to perfection and is one of the most striking stamps ever issued by any government. Credit for the idea of issuing this very unusual stamp belongs to the American War Mothers. At the head of that national organization is a splendid Indiana war mother, Mrs. William E. O'Chiltree, who has made unsparing use of her magnificent talent and tireless energy in the successful promotion of this stamp.

The War Mothers are sponsoring an official cachet for this new stamp, the cover of which shows a special two-color border of carnations and a design symbolic of Mother's Day, in harmony with the stamp itself. A filler carries the sentiment of Mother's Day. The retail charge for these covers is 15 cents for singles and 25 cents for blocks of four suitable for air mail. The profit realized from these specially designed envelops, or cachets, will be used to carry on the work which has been undertaken by the American War Mothers since 1917, under a congressional charter, and in cooperation with the American Legion, the Disabled Veterans, Veterans of Foreign Wars, their auxiliaries, and similar organizations. This work consists in giving relief to needy veterans, their families, and especially to dependent mothers of the World War, a work which is more necessary at this time than ever before.

Orders sent to Mrs. William E. O'Chiltree, national president American War Mothers, Washington, D.C., will receive, prompt attention. The historic value of this cachet, with its tribute to the motherhood of the country, will make it a possession of intrinsic worth in the unfolding future, but its great appeal is not to our selfishness but to our humanitarianism, for who in all the world has more claim on our hearts than a dependent mother, and especially the mother of a veteran who offered his life that civilization might not perish from the earth?

SECURITIES EXCHANGE BILL

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H.R. 9323) to provide for the regulation of securities exchanges and of over-the-counter markets operating in interstate and foreign commerce and through the mails, to prevent inequitable and unfair practices on such exchanges and markets, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H.R. 9323, the securities-exchange bill, with Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

MARGIN REQUIREMENTS

SEC. 6. (a) For the purpose of preventing the excessive use of credit for the purchase or carrying of securities, the Federal Reserve Board shall, prior to the effective date of this section and from time to time thereafter, prescribe rules and regulations with respect to the amount of credit that may be initially extended and subsequently maintained on any security (other than an exempted security) registered on a national securities exchange. For the initial extension of credit, such rules and regulations shall be based upon the following standard: An amount not greater than whichever is the higher of—

(1) Fifty-five percent of the current market price of the security, or

(2) One hundred percent of the lowest market price of the security during the preceding 36 calendar months, but not more than 75 percent of the current market price.

Such rules and regulations may make appropriate provision with respect to the carrying of undermargined accounts for limited periods and under specified conditions; the withdrawal of funds or securities; the substitution or additional purchases of securities; the transfer of accounts from one lender to another; special or different margin requirements for delayed deliveries, short sales, arbitrage transactions, and securities to which paragraph (2) of this subsection does not apply; the bases and the methods to be used in calculating loans and margins and market prices; and similar administrative adjustments. For the purposes of paragraph (2) of this subsection, until July 1, 1936, the lowest price at which a security has sold on or after July 1, 1933, shall be considered as the lowest price at which such security has sold during the preceding 36 calendar months.

(b) Notwithstanding the provisions of subsection (a) of this section, the Federal Reserve Board may, from time to time, with respect to all or specified securities or classes of securities, or classes of transactions, by such rules and regulations (1) prescribe such lower margin requirements for the initial extension of credit as it deems necessary or appropriate for the accommodation of commerce and industry, having due regard to the general credit situation of the country, and (2) prescribe such higher margin requirements for the initial extension of credit as it may deem necessary or appropriate to prevent the excessive use of credit to finance speculative transactions in securities.

(c) It shall be unlawful for any member of a national securities exchange or any broker or dealer who transacts a business in securities through the medium of any such member, directly or indirectly to extend or maintain credit or arrange for the extension or maintenance of credit to or for any customer—

(1) On any security (other than an exempted security) registered on a national securities exchange in contravention of the rules and regulations which the Federal Reserve Board shall prescribe under subsections (a) and (b) of this section.

(2) Without collateral or on any collateral other than exempted securities and/or securities registered upon a national securities exchange, except in accordance with such rules and regulations as the Federal Reserve Board may prescribe (A) to permit under specified conditions and for a limited period any such member, broker, or dealer to maintain a credit initially extended in conformity with the rules and regulations of the Federal Reserve Board, and (B) to permit the extension or maintenance of credit in cases where the extension or maintenance of credit is not for the purpose of purchasing or carrying securities or of evading or circumventing the provisions of paragraph (1) of this subsection.

(d) It shall be unlawful for any person not subject to subsection (c) to extend or maintain credit or to arrange for the extension or maintenance of credit for the purpose of purchasing or carrying any security registered on a national securities exchange, in contravention of such rules and regulations as the Federal Reserve Board shall prescribe to prevent the excessive use of credit for the purchasing or carrying of or trading in securities in circumvention of the other provisions of this section. Such rules and regulations may impose upon all loans made for the purpose of purchasing or carrying securities registered on national securities exchanges limitations similar to those imposed upon members, brokers, or dealers by subsection (c) of this section and the rules and regulations thereunder. This subsection and the rules and regulations thereunder shall not apply (A) to a loan made by a person not in the ordinary course of his business, (B) to a loan on an exempted security, (C) to a loan to a dealer to aid in the financing of the distribution of securities to customers not through the medium of a national securities exchange, (D) to a loan by a bank on a security other than an equity security, or (E) to such other loans as the Federal Reserve Board shall, by such rules and regulations as it may deem necessary or appropriate in the public interest or for the protection of investors, exempt, either unconditionally or upon specified terms and conditions or for stated periods, from the operation of this subsection and the rules and regulations thereunder.

(e) The provisions of this section or the rules and regulations thereunder shall not apply on or before January 31, 1939, to any loan or extension of credit made prior to the enactment of this act or to the maintenance, renewal, or extension of any such loan or credit: Provided, however, That the Federal Reserve Board is authorized and empowered to prescribe such rules and regulations with respect to such loans, extensions, maintenance, and renewals as it may deem necessary to prevent the circumvention of the provisions of this section or the rules and regulations thereunder by means of withdrawals of funds or securities, substitutions of securities, or additional purchases, or by other device.

Mr. BULWINKLE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I rise to say that the title given this section, "Margin Requirements" is a misnomer. In truth and in fact this entire section should be entitled "Limitation of Credit Union Listed Securities."

Much has been said about the 45-percent margin requirement, but this section provides only that there shall be a loan on these listed securities not exceeding 55 percent of their value. It has nothing to do with margin except that the Federal Reserve Board by appropriate regulations may make provision with respect to the carrying of undermargined accounts. References are made to margins on page 14, line 16, "Special or different margin requirements"; page 14, lines 19 and 20, "to be used in calculating loans, and margins and market prices"; on page 15, line 5, "prescribe such lower margin requirements"; and line 9, "prescribe such higher margin requirements."

I am doing this merely to call the attention of the House to the fact that this section does not provide margin requirements; it provides a limitation of credit which can be extended upon listed securities.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BULWINKLE. I yield.

Mr. BRITTEN. I do not know that I fully understood the gentleman's statement. Did the gentleman say this section provided limitations on loans to be made on listed and unlisted securities?

Mr. BULWINKLE. On listed securities.

Mr. BRITTEN. Does it not go much further than that?

Mr. BULWINKLE. I am talking about this particular section.

Mr. BRITTEN. Section 6?

Mr. BULWINKLE. Yes.

Mr. BRITTEN. That is what I am talking about, too.

Mr. BULWINKLE. It is a limitation upon listed securities.

Mr. BRITTEN. Is it not also a limitation upon unlisted securities?

Mr. BULWINKLE. No. Now, as to the provisions of the bill that a borrower must put up in cash 55 percent of the total value of the securities to be purchased means that one who desires to buy securities of the value of $25,000 may borrow under the provisions of the act $13,750, and must put up the remaining $11,250 himself. The excess value of the collateral over the amount owed is approximately 82 percent of the amount owed. This is the universal method of calculating margins by banks and other lenders of money. The required margin is thus 82 percent, and to say that it is 45 percent is misleading. If this fact is borne in mind, it is believed that the discussion of the so-called "margin requirements" will be better understood.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment.

Mr. Chairman, as a member of the Ways and Means Committee, I find my time so much taken up with the work of the committee that I seldom rise when measures are before the House not directly connected with that committee.

I feel, however, that the present bill is such an extremely important one that I wish to take time very briefly to explain why I shall vote against it.

A great deal has been said on this floor about where the bill originated, who its parents are, and remarks of that kind. It seems to me all this is of very little importance, although I admit that I greatly prefer to follow the advice of men experienced in business affairs rather than that of young theorists. The main object is to measure results.

As nearly as I can ascertain, the bill fails to separate the regulation of Wall Street and speculation from commercial industry. I know nothing of Wall Street speculation from personal experience, but there seems to be no denial that speculation in big exchanges has had free rein. The people who want to speculate or gamble will find a way to do so, and we cannot legislate against the instincts of human nature. I am for control and regulation of unfair practices in Wall Street or in any other speculative market, and will vote for any fair control of this nature. Since this bill has been before the public, like every other Member of Congress I have had extended correspondence with constituents about it. To the best of my recollection, not a letter has come into my office favoring this measure, so it would seem to me that the regulatory powers contained therein were born not of a public demand but in the impractical brains of those whose views seem to be ace high with this administration.

Industry needs a breathing spell. It needs reestablishment of confidence, and it needs a permanency that has been unknown for the past year. This bill in its entirety is not a stock-exchange control bill but a business control bill in line with the program which has been in progress for a year, namely, centralization of authority and regimentation of industry to bring about dictatorial evolution. Congress has delegated its authority over all industry to officials not responsible to the electorate. Today by this bill Congress is asked to delegate its penal authority to a board controlled by the administration. Since when did the Federal Trade Commission become a judicial and respected organization? It is but a few years since there was a decided movement in Congress to appropriate no money for carrying on the work of the Federal Trade Commission. Since its inception the Commission has been severely and rightly criticized both on this floor and in the other body as well as by citizens. Its origin to a certain extent was to hamper industry, and today we are asked to place in its hands the right to make regulations under which business shall be conducted and the right to clothe business with a criminal status if it fails to live up to such regulations. I want to say here and now that the industrial companies and corporations which I represent, and I know many of my colleagues represent similar ones, are not criminals, do not carry on their business in a criminal way, and I protest against a regulation being written law which can make criminals out of them by enforcement of an arbitrary rule.

If the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce can devise a bill to protect the public against the unfair and improper practices of Wall Street and associates, I will vote for it, but I will not, under the cloak of control of Wall Street, vote to make criminals out of the kind of business that wants a chance to furnish the bread and butter for the citizens of this country. [Applause.]

Mr. KENNEY. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. KENNEY: On page 14, line 5, strike out the figures "55" and insert in lieu thereof the figures "60."

Mr. KENNEY. Mr. Chairman, this amendment is offered so that credit may be extended initially to the purchaser of a security to the extent of 60 percent of the purchase price. Today, as in the past, we have a liquid market in securities. We ought to keep that market liquid, because it is upon the ready market for stocks and bonds that the great industries and enterprises of this country have been built. We ought not to make it too difficult for a purchaser of securities to acquire them. The credit situation generally, as has been explained by the gentleman from North Carolina, has been taken care of by this bill. The arm of the Federal Reserve Board has been extended, not only to its member banks but to all other banks and every stock broker and dealer in the country, so that the credit problem is well taken care of. There should be no initial margin requirement which would interfere with the ready marketing of securities.

I hold no brief for the corporations of this country, but I do know that many of them listed on the stock exchange are as progressive as the new deal itself. A great many of these companies are far ahead of us. We are planning various things here, but we forget and are unmindful of the fact that many of these listed companies have provided for minimum wages, retirement funds, old-age pensions, health insurance, and group life insurance for their employees. We do not want to do anything in this bill which will cut off the ready market for securities and keep the investor from standing behind the industries of our country which have done so much for a great many of the employees of this Nation. We want the employees themselves and the man of limited means to be in position to buy these securities, should they desire to do so.

We have taken care of the credit situation. The margin standard will have nothing to do, in my opinion, with the question of credit, because that is fully in the hands of the Federal Reserve Board, which is not bound by the standard set up in the bill; and today, after the passage of this bill, if it passes, a purchaser of securities upon credit or margin can only do so with the approval of the Federal Reserve Board, no matter what the standard which the Federal Reserve Board has the right to disregard in fixing margins and regulating credit.

I submit that we ought to provide for a sound standard. The Senate in its bill has set no standard. If we establish a standard, we ought to make it reasonable, one that will be lived up to, one that the Federal Reserve Board will follow, one that the Senate will adopt. I submit that this amendment should be adopted.

Mr. BRITTEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KENNEY. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. BRITTEN. As I understand the gentleman's amendment, it provides for a 60-percent credit and 40-percent margin?

Mr. KENNEY. Instead of 55-percent credit and 45-percent margin; yes.

Mr. BRITTEN. My feeling is that this is not low enough. I would be willing to support an amendment for a 66-percent credit and a 33⅓-percent margin.

Mr. KENNEY. If the gentleman will offer that amendment I will be glad to vote for it.

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment and ask unanimous consent to proceed out of order during these 5 minutes on what I consider an important matter. I may say that this is something I want to speak on at this moment. I am for this bill, and this is something to which I want to call the attention of the House.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Chairman, I apologize to my friend Mr. RAYBURN, Chairman of the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee, for taking time at this moment. I am for his bill and intend to vote for it.

What I wish to say at this time is that I understand the gentleman from Washington [Mr. ZIONCHECK] has caused a petition to be placed on the desk to discharge the Rules Committee on the Connery 30-hour week bill. May I say to the House that I asked my friend the gentleman from Washington not to file this petition?

The reason is that President Green of the American Federation of Labor, Miss Perkins, the Secretary of Labor, Mr. Richberg, and I have been in conference yesterday and are going into further conference with the idea of seeing if we cannot get together on some amendments which may secure Presidential approval for the 30-hour week bill. May I make it plain to the Membership of the House that I asked the gentleman from Washington [Mr. ZIONCHECK] not to file the petition for the 145 names in connection with the 30-hour week bill?

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, it has been the custom in many of our industries of this country to sell to their employees stock in their own company, and on a very easy payment plan. It has occurred to me that possibly this margin requirement, whether it be on listed or unlisted stock, might prevent those corporations from selling the stock of their own company to their own employees unless they were able to furnish a suitable margin or collateral.

I should like to ask the chairman if this custom would be interfered with in any way so far as any of the provisions of this section of the bill are concerned.

Mr. RAYBURN. If the corporation is doing it as a regular course of business it would apply.

Mr. GOSS. Yes; but I want to call attention to the fact——

Mr. RAYBURN. You cannot make too many exemptions if you are going to attempt to stop so much of the money of the country going into the speculative market.

Mr. GOSS. However, I want to ask the chairman if it would be at all possible under the provisions of the bill for these employees to buy the stock without any security being put up, as has been the custom in the past, and I am sure the gentleman is very familiar with the custom in industry——

Mr. RAYBURN. To buy a stock listed on the securities exchange?

Mr. GOSS. It may be listed or it may not.

Mr. RAYBURN. If it is not listed, this would not apply.

Mr. GOSS. We may take the United States Steel Corporation as an example. They have sold, we will say, to their employees, stock in that company in the past and the employees have not had to put up collateral, perhaps. They sell them on an easy-payment plan and in some instances the money is taken out of their pay.

Mr. RAYBURN. If it is not in the ordinary course of business the rules and regulations adopted by the commission could not apply; but if it is in the regular course of business or if they are making a regular business of doing it, the rules and regulations would apply. This is covered by clause (A) of subsection (d).

Mr. GOSS. Would it be a part of their regular business if this was a custom of the concern involved?

Mr. RAYBURN. The board can make an exemption under clause (E) of subsection (d) and, furthermore, as I said, if it is not in the ordinary course of business, it is also exempt. The regular business of a steel corporation is making and selling steel, not selling securities.

Mr. PEYSER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOSS. I yield.

Mr. PEYSER. I believe the answer to the question the gentleman has asked is that it would not come under the terms of this bill. If a concern acquired stock for distribution to people in their employ, that is a transaction between the industry and the purchasers of the stock.

Mr. GOSS. Well, they do not do that. They sell this stock out of treasury stock, in most instances, to the older employees.

Mr. PEYSER. In my judgment, that is a private transaction.

Mr. GOSS. And in the past they have not had to put up any collateral. They may have to stop the practice if they are required to put up collateral.

Mr. PEYSER. I may own 100 shares of my own industry, and I can sell that to my bookkeeper or secretary if I so desire.

Mr. GOSS. I understand; but this is a different procedure and one that the gentleman must be familiar with. The corporation sells its own treasury stock to its employees, perhaps, at a little below the market.

Mr. PEYSER. That is not an exchange transaction.

Mr. GOSS. And the employees pay for it out of their wages on easy terms without having to put up additional collateral, and sometimes they deposit the security, if they have taken it in their name, before it is all paid for; and I am fearful this section may interfere with this type of stock transactions, which is very much in the interest of the employee.

Mr. PEYSER. In my judgment, that would be construed as a private transaction and would not come under the provisions of this bill.

Mr. GOSS. The chairman of the committee has not quite satisfied me on that point.

Mr. LEA of California. Will the gentleman yield?

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Connecticut may proceed for 5 additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. GOSS. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. LEA of California. As I understand the situation, the greatest reliance you could have for the situation you have described being taken care of is on page 17, under subdivision (e), which gives the Federal Reserve Board power to make rules and regulations governing such transactions as the gentleman has discussed.

Mr. GOSS. Then I would say to the gentleman that if they are given that broad power and it is the custom today, they might, by a whim, do away with that custom. In other words, if they have such broad power, as the gentleman from Illinois calls to my attention, it amounts practically to a control of industry under paragraph (e).

Mr. LEA of California. The committee gave a great deal of attention to the policy that should be pursued in reference to margins. We finally concluded that in the main we must rely upon the commission to adjust margins to conditions, because we realize there is a constant necessity, perhaps, for changing margins in order to adopt them to so many variable conditions. It is impossible to take care of them by fixed, inflexible rules.

Mr. GOSS. If this is to be on the basis of the Commission issuing rules and regulations with respect to margins, the Federal Trade Commission or whatever commission finally handles these matters under this bill, might go so far as to say that a company could not issue any stock.

Mr. LEA of California. No; I think that would not be within their power.

Mr. GOSS. According to the gentleman's intepretation of this provision, they might even stop the flow of credit to industry.

Mr. LEA of California. It is not within their regulatory powers to deny margins, but they can regulate them.

Mr. RICH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOSS. Yes.

Mr. RICH. If we are going to place all the power in the hands of this Commission that may be formed to handle this transaction, and if we, as the Congress, are going to delegate this power to the Commission, does not the gentleman think we are doing the wrong thing?

Mr. GOSS. Why, certainly; that is what I am on my feet for. I want to call attention to the fact that the Federal Reserve Board is authorized to prescribe such rules and regulations—any rules and regulations—and after they decide on something they can change it overnight.

Mr. RICH. That is all wrong.

Mr. GOSS. I am fearful that that is going to work a handicap on industry and the pleasant relationship between employer and employee; because we have thousands of qualified men running our industries in this country only too glad to give employees a chance to share in the profits through this old custom.

Mr. MAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOSS. Yes; I yield.

Mr. MAY. Suppose I am a bookkeeper for the United States Steel Corporation and they are about to issue stock.

Mr. GOSS. They do not have to have it in the treasury. It is the custom to sell stock to enable employees to share in the profits, and in many cases they sell the stock a little below the market price.

Mr. MAY. Will the gentleman let me state my proposition?

Mr. GOSS. Certainly.

Mr. MAY. This is a kind of transaction that is being carried on by thousands, where the bookkeeper of a corporation wants to buy a share of stock, par value $100. It sells the stock to the bookkeeper, who pays $20, and then they take out of his salary $20 a month for 4 months.

Mr. GOSS. That is true, and he will have to put up a margin or even collateral under this plan.

Mr. MAY. I do not think so under the provisions of this bill.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment. I am of the opinion that the gentleman is unduly alarmed as to the question he has raised. All such stock sold to employees remains in the treasury of the corporation, and there is no loan required; the stock is not delivered to the purchaser until it is paid for in full. Therefore there will be no need for any loan on the part of the purchaser, because the corporation retains the stock in its treasury until it is fully paid for.

Mr. Chairman, ladies and gentlemen of the Committee, personally I am not so much interested in aiding people to buy stocks on margin, as I know what happened to all of them before and what is liable to happen in the future, if we permit still more liberalized requirements. Surely we do not need to fear that the corporation issuing the stock and disposing of it to their employees will not be able to find a way even under this bill to obtain loans, because I feel that these provisions will not apply to the treasury stock of these corporations. Henceforth, in view of this legislation, stocks issued in the future will represent real values. This legislation will in no way restrict them, but in view of the past, when nearly every corporation issued additional millions and more millions of shares of stock, unloading them upon the American people and even their own unfortunate employees, who lost not only the amount they invested, but even the amounts that they borrowed from their friends, and many of them are still paying for the worthless securities that they were made to purchase on a so-called "easy payment plan" and for which they made themselves liable to these heartless corporations and manipulators.

I am of the opinion that, in view of the fact that we cannot, as the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY] states, prohibit speculation or gambling, that it is our duty to see that the investing public, or rather the "lambs", be protected by this Government so that their investments shall not be wiped out even before the receipt of the stock certificates issued to them. I think this legislation is in the right direction. I congratulate the committee, and I hope that we will not in any way weaken the bill. If there is any way possible, we should strengthen it in the interest of the investors. Mr. Chairman, we should not take into consideration the interest of a few speculators and stock promoters who brought about the destruction of the entire Nation. It seems to me that some of my colleagues on the other side are much more interested in these corporations and houses of issue, in the stockbrokers and the manipulators, than they are in the public. I feel that had it been possible to consider this legislation in 1930, 1931, or 1932, or before the election of President Roosevelt and before conditions started to improve, very few of you would have dared to interpose objections to this bill. However, I realize that there are some Members on that side who are not familiar with the tactics and vicious and misleading propaganda that has been carried on in the past 3 months against this legislation. Fortunately, or unfortunately, this is not a new question to me. I had ample opportunity to learn of the intrigues and conniving influence used to mislead the Membership of the House, and therefore, feel it is my duty to warn you against this vicious, highly organized propaganda, as I know that most of you are honest and realize that this legislation is in the interest of legitimate business and will make possible the return of confidence.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, there is a great deal of misapprehension about this particular section of the bill. It gave the committee a great deal of concern. As originally introduced the bill contained several very rigid requirements. It contained a rigid maintenance requirement for loans after they were once made. It seemed to some members of the committee that it was unfortunate to provide for a maintenance requirement under conditions such as the country has been going through in the past few years, when there has been an utter collapse of the economic structure, and that there ought not to be any rigid requirement in the law for the maintenance of credit after it has once been granted.

There was also objection to any rigid standard being fixed. There has been a great deal of criticism about the discretion lodged in the Federal Trade Commission in the administration of this law. A great many of the discretionary provisions put into this bill were put in at the request of the representatives of the stock exchanges and of business, because they said that Congress did not have sufficient information to justify putting too rigid requirements into this act. This section is one of the concessions made in this bill to that thought. I say to those who want to oppose this bill, oppose it, but do not deceive yourselves in doing so. The business of stock exchanges is a very intricate and variant business, and to put rigid requirements into the law in some instances might be very unfortunate. The committee has all the way through conceded to the thought that the law should not be too rigid for the purpose of making it possible, if any requirement or rule or regulation of the Commission proved unfortunate and unworkable, to change it without going through the slow process of amending a law.

Mr. Chairman, this marginal requirement is not rigid. Some people would have it left entirely to the Federal Reserve Board. It is almost left to the discretion of the Federal Reserve Board as it is. The only legislative standard, the only suggestion made in this bill to the Federal Reserve Board is on an initial loan on a listed security. In effect the bill says to the Reserve Board, we think you should require a man who wants to purchase listed securities for speculation or who wants to invest in corporate securities, under your rules and regulations, to put up 45 percent of the current market price of the listed security. But we say to the Federal Reserve Board in the same breath, if you think for the accommodation of industry and commerce, you should allow a lower margin, or if you think in the interest of the public—if there is too much speculation in corporate securities—the margin should be increased, then you have the power to do that. That is all this provision does.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 5 additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAPES. Yes.

Mr. COX. While it is perfectly clear to me that the law does not apply in cases similar to the situation raised by the question of the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. Goss] I think it would be unfortunate to leave the record in its present shape, because as yet I have heard no satisfactory answer to the question.

Mr. MAPES. What is the question?

Mr. COX. Does the law apply to a case similar to that raised in the question of the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. Goss]? That is, where a company desires to distribute its stock to its own employees—purely a private transaction as between the two—would the regulations provided for in this section of the act apply?

Mr. MAPES. Of course not. These regulations apply more especially to loans to and by brokers and to transactions on stock exchanges.

Mr. COX. Purely exchange transactions?

Mr. MAPES. So far as this marginal requirement is concerned, it is almost an exclusive regulation of "brokers' loans", so-called, because it exempts all loans to individuals who want to borrow money for the purpose of putting it into their own individual business or into their local companies, to buy homes, or to do anything, except to speculate in the stock market, and then only on stocks that are listed on stock exchanges; not on ordinary bonds, not on municipal bonds, not on so-called "exempted securities" at all. There is a distinction here between the individual and the broker, but as far as individuals are concerned, it applies only to loans on stock listed upon stock exchanges, where the proceeds are to be put back into other stocks listed upon stock exchanges, and it has no further application to them at all.

Now, those Members of the House who want to regulate stock exchanges and who do not want to hurt business, will have an opportunity to get back of this marginal requirement provision, because the people who are chiefly interested in the marginal provision are the brokers and dealers and members of the stock exchanges. They are opposed to marginal requirements being written into this bill. They do not want their business curtailed by any such limitation. They do not want anything done that will prevent the little fellow, the fellow who is in and out of the market, from carrying on and having unlimited opportunity to part with his savings. They are the ones who are particularly interested in these marginal requirements, not business, nor individuals, and not the banks.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. MAPES. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. COX. This is an exchange control bill. The Congress is undertaking to regulate, through the exercise of its powers under the commerce clause. Now, if it has the power to touch private business, it is only that business whose operations have a direct effect upon interstate transactions, and it is not intended to touch private business insofar as it is altogether intrastate and not related to interstate.

Mr. MAPES. Not at all.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has again expired.

Mr. McGUGIN. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

The country is greatly in need of fair and effective control over stock speculation. Stock speculation has not only swindled the American people out of billions of dollars, but in addition to that it has impoverished millions of people who have never invested a dollar in stock. Stock speculation monopolized and absorbed the banking credit of this country. Throughout the country local banks in the latter part of the twenties closed out sound lines of credit for local business—agricultural, industrial, and commercial. These local banks then took this money and sent it in to New York for call money, where fabulous rates of interest were derived from stock speculation. In the end, this meant that credit was taken away from honest, productive business and given over to speculation.

The orgy of stock speculation in the latter twenties was a swindle upon the people and an economic outrage upon the country. All of this should be corrected, and every right-thinking person in the country favors sound and constructive legislation which will save the people of the United States from a repetition of the ghastly conduct growing out of speculation in the latter twenties.

However, there is a swindle being worked upon the people in 1934 in the name of the stock exchange. That swindle is this bill. Everyone refers to this bill as the stock exchange bill. The people think this is a bill to correct these wrongs which must be corrected. The people have been deceived. The people do not know that that is but a small part of this bill. The people do not know that control over the stock exchange is merely the excuse and title for this bill, while the real reason for this bill is to gain complete governmental control and domination, not alone over speculation in the stock exchange, but over legitimate industry in this country.

The bill itself, upon its face, proves the deception and hypocrisy of the claim that it is a stock-exchange control bill. It contains 61 pages. It does not require 61 pages of law to control speculation. It does require 61 pages insidiously to work into this law complete control and domination over all industry in this country.

The first nine sections of this bill might be accepted as a fairly respectable piece of legislation. Practically all of the remaining 25 sections are insidious, tyrannical control of industry by government. Among the victims of this bill will be the millions of people who are entitled to the opportunity to make a living in industry, but who will be denied that opportunity because this bill, with its control of industry, will only lead to a drying up of the channels of commerce.

I should like to vote for a bill which would control speculation on the stock exchange, but such control as this bill gives over the New York Stock Exchange is a small part of the control which has been written into the bill.

What is more, the 61 pages of this bill will in the end be a small part of the law which will grow out of this bill. Section 10 sets up a commission and authorizes that commission to issue such rules and regulations as it deems necessary or appropriate. In the fullness of time, those regulations will be far more voluminous than these 61 pages of congressional legislation. In the fullness of time those regulations will be the tail which will be wagging the dog. I cannot see where the bill would be materially affected whether this commission is a new commission or the Federal Trade Commission. In any event, it is a commission which will be issuing regulations and rules with the force and effect of criminal law, the violation of which by any citizen will mean that that citizen is on his way to the penitentiary.

Section 32 provides in part:

> Any person who willfully violates any provision of this act or any rule or regulation thereunder * * * shall, upon conviction, be fined not more than $10,000 or imprisoned not more than 2 years, or both.

Thus, citizens of America will be sent to the penitentiary for the violation of regulations which can only be found in some pamphlets issued by some commission and not in the statutes of the United States. In this respect, this bill bears the same tyranny which is found in much of our so-called "emergency legislation." Russia, Germany, and Italy are not the only countries in which citizens are being imprisoned for the violation of edicts. The United States is such a country under this act and other emergency legislation which has been enacted. Stalin issues the edicts under which Russians are sent to prison, Hitler the edicts under which Germans are sent to prison, Mussolini the edicts under which Italians are sent to prison, Secretary Wallace the regulations under the Agricultural Adjustment Act and Bankhead cotton bill under which American farmers can be sent to prison, and some commission of three men will issue the regulations under this bill under which American citizens will be sent to prison. American citizens under this bill, under the N.R.A., under the A.A.A., and under the Bankhead Act, are to be sent to prison for committing crimes, which crimes have no more been decreed by a representative legislative body of the people than are crimes in Russia, Germany, and Italy prescribed by representative legislative bodies.

I want regulation and honest and effective regulation of speculation and credit, but I will not vote for such tyranny as is found in this bill.

Another fraud which is being perpetrated on the people is the very title of this bill. It is referred to as the Fletcher-Rayburn bill. It is not the Fletcher-Rayburn bill; it is the Corcoran-Cohen bill. These gentlemen are a couple of self-styled intellectuals, a couple of Felix Frankfurter's protégés, a couple of men who do not have and could not obtain the support of any congressional constituency in the United States, yet they can write the bill, sit in the galleries, and watch Congress move while they crack the whip.

Mr. McGUGIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 2 additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. McGUGIN. Of course, personally, they have no whip to crack. The truth is, Congress detests following their dictation, but Congress does not have the courage to say no and perform its constitutional duty to protect the liberties of the people. The reason Congress has not the courage is because Congress is afraid the President will go on the radio, lead the people to believe that this bill is exclusively a control over the stock exchange, and then lead the people to believe that he who voted against this bill has been the tool of a band of Wall Street pirates. For my part, I am not going to be intimidated by any such political character assassination. I am going to draw about me the cloak of truth and take my chances on that cloak's being a sheet armor of political protection. I am going to vote against this bill unless by amendments it is pared down to the point where it is an honest and exclusive stock-exchange control bill.

As proof that this bill is more nearly the Corcoran-Cohen bill than the Fletcher-Rayburn bill, I cite the incident which occurred in the House yesterday. The chairman of the committee did not feel exactly sure of himself in leading this bill through the House, so he insisted on having by his side Mr. Cohen, the real author of the bill. This bill is not a tariff bill with hundreds of complicated schedules, or a revenue bill with complicated rates. It requires no experts to supply the chairman with the facts. All that it requires is a knowledge of what is in the bill. Of course, the real author of the bill has a better knowledge of what is in it than one who is merely the sponsor of the bill.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, I did not intend to stoop to reply to some things that have been said on this floor, which are a reflection not only upon myself but on the 24 other members of this committee. I thought that on yesterday we had enough of this little red house stuff; and it is stuff. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BRITTEN], always alert and alive to what will give him publicity, coined the phrase "the little red house in Georgetown." I did not object to his playing that at all. It is perfectly legitimate and perfectly correct. But every time a Member of this House gets up here and says that he is for legislation for the control of the stock exchanges, he winds up saying that this is not the medicine which the exchange needs.

The same talk was made before our committee by every man who appeared before that committee, who was trying to chisel and defeat stock-exchange legislation. [Applause.] Every man who has written a letter here, who has a reputation to guard, has begun his letter by saying just exactly what the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MCGUGIN] has said: that he is for stock-exchange regulation; but he always winds up by saying this is not the proper bill. Every member of this committee is convinced that, with the ingenuity of the 25 men upon that committee, we have done our best to bring forward a bill that would be helpful to the American people, to the investors in securities, and not injurious to business. We could not do it without the advice of experts. The members of the committee have done their best, yet the same complaint lodges against the committee, the same chiseling amendments will be offered upon this floor to this bill that would have been offered to the original bill.

Now, our committee sits year in and year out considering the most technical problems of any committee in this House—railroads, transportation of all sorts. We are laymen. We are not experts. We do not arrogate to ourselves all the knowledge in the universe. If we were as able as some people in this country think they are, and as some Members of this House think they are, we would feel so self-sufficient that we would have to call in no experts. We have to sit and listen to men who have specialized in transportation for 40 years; men who have been hired for that time in order to make a case for their people. They are paid salaries for representing them. Special privilege always has counsel in the committees of this House. Now, because we call in Mr. Cohen and Mr. Corcoran, two of the ablest young men that it has ever been my privilege to know—and I think that is the unanimous consent of the other 24 members of the committee—young men who have appeared, not representing institutions that have robbed the investors of this country, but who have appeared there in the capacity of people's counsel; they are held up by men who are really opposed to this bill, but who are not going to have the "guts" to vote against it when the roll is called, as being somebody from Russia or being tainted with socialism or communism. [Applause.]

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 5 additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. RAYBURN. It rubs a pretty sore place on us, who have for 9 weeks been charged with this duty, who have considered every proposal from every section and from every person, Republicans and Democrats alike, to have even the gentleman from Illinois, if not even the gentleman from Kansas, come to us, in the face of the statement of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MAPES], his own colleague, and the statement of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. COOPER], and other members of the committee on that side of the House, and say that even though we listened to those suggestions—and we were glad to have them from any source—it was the duty of the committee to write, and it did write, its own bill.

The committee stands here today practically solidly behind this bill; and we are going to fight down the people who, while saying they stand for legislation to regulate the stock exchanges, yet intend to offer chiseling amendments and make speeches in opposition to the bill.

The first chiseling amendment that was offered was offered by my genial colleague here to my right, my coworker on the committee. In the first instance the bill provided for 60 percent margin requirement. I did not think it was too high myself, because I have seen the lambs shorn for many, many years simply because they got in on a narrow margin and were shaken out sometimes between the hour the stock exchange closed in the afternoon and the hour it opened the following morning. I do not want such a condition to obtain if I can help it. Then in the subcommittee I proposed a 50-percent margin and 50-percent loan value. In order to help the committee along I agreed to a 45-percent margin and a 45-percent original loan value. Had we come in here with a 50-percent margin requirement an amendment would have been offered to reduce it to 45 percent. We have come in with a 45-percent marginal requirement and an amendment has been offered to reduce it to 40 percent; and had our original proposition been 40 percent, an amendment would have been offered to make it 35 percent; and so on down to nothing. So we brought in what we thought was a reasonable provision for the Federal Reserve Board. We made it flexible. We did not fix a rigid margin requirement; but, as I said, in my address the other day, we raised a flag, we drew a white line, and said to the regulatory authority, which is the Federal Reserve Board, that we believed—and it was the expression of congressional will—that somewhere around 45 percent should be the original margin requirement.

Some people said the provision with regard to margin should be flexible. We have set up this standard, this basis; but we have provided that the Federal Reserve may, if it finds it to be in the interests of trade and commerce—I believe that is the expression used—to change that original margin. We go further and say there shall be no rigidity whatever about maintenance and that the Federal Reserve may fix that. Yet we find people who have been so written to and talked to, to whom the provisions of the bill have been so misrepresented, that they say that even this is not flexible enough.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, I dislike to do so, but because I believe this section is the very heart of the bill, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for an additional 5 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. RAYBURN. The President of the United States thinks this bill should be passed; and I agree with him.

The margin requirements, so far as I individually am concerned, are not as high as I would have made them, but in order to meet objections I have agreed to a lesser requirement; and we have in the bill a reasonable margin requirement.

If we have safe and definite provisions in this bill to prevent manipulative practices, and then give to the enforcing authority enough power under the legislation to make it effective, we have a good bill. If, however, we adopt amendments that will weaken the margin requirements section, that will weaken the manipulative section, that will rob this board, authority, or whatever you choose to call it, of power to make this law effective, then we might as well strike the enacting clause out of the bill. This bill is 60 pages in length. It has been worked out, we believe, scientifically and sanely. If you begin allowing those who want to chisel this bill, those who at heart—and I do not put my friend from New Jersey in this class—want to weaken this bill, who want to vote against it but many of whom will not vote against it; if you begin adopting amendments offered to tear up the framework of this legislation, you might as well strike out the enacting clause and do nothing about this matter, but let the riots and the disgrace again come as it did in 1929 culminating that orgy of speculation. I trust that friends of this measure, friends of legislation to provide some sort of control of the practices on the stock exchange, will stand behind the members of the committee who are for regulation in voting down these amendments that would draw a knife under the chin of the bill. [Applause.]

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAYBURN. I yield.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I may say to the gentleman that I am for his bill very strongly as far as it goes, but I should like to have him take notice of the statement made by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. BULWINKLE] a few minutes ago to the effect that this bill does not provide for any marginal requirements whatever but provides merely a limitation on credit.

Mr. RAYBURN. It can be called either one or the other. It can be said that a man can borrow 55 percent of the stock when he buys it or that he cannot borrow more than 55 percent of the market price when he buys the stock originally; or it can be said that when a man went to buy the stock originally on the New York Stock Exchange he must put up 45 percent of the market price and that the broker can lend him 55 percent in order to maintain it.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. What would be the objection to including in the bill language in substance as follows:

Provided, That the purchaser of any listed security under this act shall deposit not less than 45 percent of the current market price of the security at the time of the purchase.

Mr. RAYBURN. That would be perfectly all right, but we think our language is a little more scientific.

Mr. COLE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAYBURN. I yield to the gentleman from Maryland.

Mr. COLE. So far as the margin requirement is concerned, with little, if any, strings tied to the Federal Reserve Board, 5 minutes after the passage of the bill if they find the formula prescribed by Congress is not broad enough, they can change it?

Mr. RAYBURN. Exactly. I stated in my remarks awhile ago if they found it was in the interest of trade and commerce they could change it at any time they pleased.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that debate under the rule has been exhausted.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment, and that has not as yet been done.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, I rose in opposition to the amendment. I thought I made myself clear that I was opposed to the amendment.

Mr. SABATH. And so did I.

Mr. BRITTEN. I did not hear the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH].

Mr. CLAIBORNE. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry. What is before the Committee at this time? Is it an amendment or otherwise?

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment of the gentleman from New Jersey is before the Committee. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] makes the point of order that all debate has been exhausted on the amendment. The Chair sustains the point of order.

The question is on the adoption of the amendment of the gentleman from New Jersey.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. TABER: On page 17, after line 25, insert a new subsection, as follows: "(f) The provisions of this act shall not apply to any loan unless at the time it was or is hereafter made the proceeds thereof were or are used for the purchase of securities."

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I suppose that this labels me as a chiseler. The only argument so far presented against amendments has been that Wall Street is the bugaboo which is trying to spoil this bill. We have not had straight-out or square-toed assertions or explanations of the provisions of the bill.

May I give you an illustration of how this bill would work. Suppose a clothing merchant in your town wanted to go to a bank and borrow $10,000 and the bank loaned the money to him and he put up $10,000 worth of securities. Just as soon as that was done this provision here would apply to him. There is no definite exception which excepts business loans; therefore I have drawn this amendment which does.

May I read to those of you on the committee a few words from this bill:

SEC. 6. (a) For the purpose of preventing the excessive use of credit for the purchase or carrying of securities.

Such a business loan would be the carrying of securities as soon as it was made. If it is not in its inception a business loan, something of this kind perhaps should apply; but if it is a business loan in its inception and is not used for the purchase of securities, it ought not to be burdened with the provisions of this act. If you do not want to tie down business and make business subject to all sorts of burdens, you do not want to pass the bill unless you have an absolutely clear and definite exception.

That is what this amendment that I have offered provides, and I hope that the committee will adopt the amendment in order to protect the business man who wants to do business and is willing to gamble his own securities in order to do it, and not require him to put up that margin which is required for a speculative loan.

Mr. GOSS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. I yield to the gentleman from Connecticut.

Mr. GOSS. In the debate I had a few minutes ago with the gentleman I think the gentleman from California brought that out very clearly. I will admit mine was on a different subject, but somewhat related to the gentleman's amendment; and, I think, unless the gentleman's amendment is adopted, business under the system that he has just mentioned here would be greatly penalized if not altogether stopped, particularly the small merchant.

Mr. TABER. If we are not going to protect the small merchants and small manufacturers in our home towns when we get up such a bill as this, we ought to quit. I am in favor of protecting them.

Mr. REED of New York. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. I yield to my colleague from New York.

Mr. REED of New York. The loans of the merchants who had borrowed money before this act went into effect would be called?

Mr. TABER. This bill would not apply to them until 1939.

Mr. REED of New York. There would be a general calling of the loans of merchants all over the country.

Mr. MILLIGAN. It does not apply until 1939.

Mr. TABER. The provisions do not apply to business loans heretofore made until 1939, but it would apply to current loans.

Mr. MILLIGAN. It would not apply to renewal loans, either.

Mr. TABER. It would not apply to renewal loans that already exist; but if a man who is running a business today borrows $10,000 after this act is passed and puts up his own securities, this bill applies to the transaction.

Mr. MILLIGAN. It does not.

Mr. DUNN. May I ask the gentleman what the bill does require in that respect?

Mr. TABER. It requires them to carry a margin at the bank of whatever the Federal Reserve Board might require, not exceeding a 45 percent margin, if I remember rightly.

Mr. MILLIGAN. That is, if they are going to use the proceeds of the loan to purchase other securities.

Mr. TABER. The provision in here that I have read does apply to a business loan. I refer to page 13, section 6 (a). After this act takes effect, where they are carrying securities, unless it is a loan that has been made previous to the passage of the act, this applies.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may proceed for 5 additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Connecticut?

There was no objection.

Mr. BULWINKLE. May I call the gentleman's attention to page 13, section 6, which reads as follows:

For the purpose of preventing the excessive use of credit for the purchase or carrying of securities, the Federal Reserve Board shall—

And so on. The gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. TABER. May I call the gentleman's attention to the fact that I was not mistaken? I read that section over very carefully, and I explained to the House just how that section would work out. Probably that was the intention of the committee, but it is not the wording of the language, nor is it the effect of the language.

I want to fix it so that these things only apply to speculative loans. These loans, if they were made for other purposes than speculation, to enable the manufacturer or the merchant to have $10,000 to operate his business, would have to comply with these margin requirements as long as the loan was carried. I want to get away from this.

Mr. BULWINKLE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. I yield.

Mr. BULWINKLE. I want to call the gentleman's attention to the fact also that I think hereafter when a man would go to the bank to borrow money, if this bill were to become law, he would have to sign an application and state in the application that it is or it is not for the purpose of buying securities.

Mr. TABER. That is perfectly all right; but I do not want it fixed so that a man is going to be obliged to put up this margin on nonspeculative loans because the banks, very generally, are accustomed to being exceedingly liberal in business loans.

Mr. RAYBURN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. I yield.

Mr. RAYBURN. I may say to the gentleman it has been stated many times that this does not apply to that situation. The committee report says it does not apply to a transaction like that, and I think that is the clear language of the bill.

Mr. TABER. I appreciate the committee report said that, but the language of the bill itself is not that way. That is the trouble.

Mr. RAYBURN. The language of the bill is, "for the purpose of preventing the excessive use of credit for the purchase or carrying of securities." This is the plain language of the bill.

Mr. TABER. Purchase or carrying; yes.

Mr. OLIVER of New York. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. I yield.

Mr. OLIVER of New York. The gentleman from New York does not define carrying of securities as meaning borrowing money on securities which a firm owns for the purpose of carrying on its business?

Mr. TABER. It would be interpreted as meaning the carrying of securities.

Mr. OLIVER of New York. Oh, no.

Mr. TABER. And that is what I want to get away from, and that is what I should think the committee would want to get away from.

Mr. OLIVER of New York. No; the language is, "purchase or carrying of securities", and it would not be carrying of securities to borrow money for the purpose of carrying on your business on a security which you already have.

Mr. TABER. If I may have a moment of your attention, I think I can demonstrate just the opposite of what the members of the committee have said.

After this loan comes into existence and it is carried along from time to time, it will be interpreted as a loan for carrying securities, and I think we ought to distinguish with respect to the inception of the loan so as to protect our business people and not have it construed by bureaucrats or by courts that have not taken these things into consideration, as placing an additional and an unwarranted burden on our people.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

I am sorry that the distinguished, and always polite, great chairman of this important committee has seen fit to adopt the tactics of Gen. Hugh Johnson in "cracking down" upon Members of Congress and their so-called "chiseling" amendments. The word "chisel" is an old one, but it was made famous by General Johnson when he "cracked down" on the industries of the country.

The amendment before the committee when the distinguished gentleman was speaking was one which provided for a 60-percent credit and a 40-percent margin and had been presented by the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. KENNEY]. What did that amendment provide in money? It provided that upon the purchase of a $10,000 security the buyer put up $4,000 and borrowed $6,000. There is nothing like chiseling in connection with a loan of that kind when you put $4,000 on a $6,000 credit. That is 75 percent.

I hope the gentleman or no other Member of this House will "crack down" on Members of equal standing. Every man is equal to every other man on the floor of this House, and I hope amendments will not be referred to as chiseling amendments and that no Member will be "cracked down" on for offering amendments. We do not deserve that, because we are trying to perfect a bill which has been written by a couple of youngsters—Cohen and Corcoran—who are sitting back here in the gallery—a couple of baby faces. [Laughter.] From here they look like fine, young, upstanding boys of 18 to 21 years of age.

Mr. BULWINKLE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRITTEN. Not now.

I want the House to know the type of young man that abounds in all of the important departments of the Government. They are brainy; they are good in principle; their character is all right. I have no complaint to make about that, and I had no objection yesterday to Benjamin Victor Cohen sitting on the floor with the chairman of the committee and the other members of the committee to advise them on the technicalities of this bill, which the members themselves did not understand, but which this young boy did.

Mr. OLIVER of New York. Then why are you always screaming about them?

Mr. BRITTEN. I am not screaming about anything.

Mr. OLIVER of New York. You are always screaming and screaming about them.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Chairman, I decline to yield.

Every department of this Government is honeycombed, let us say, with fine, young men, like these boys; but they are only boys. They have had no political experience and not the slightest legislative experience. Perhaps they may have an ax to grind. They may not like the stock exchange. They might feel happy if the stock exchange, which is a great medium of business, were closed completely. This might be pleasing to one of them, at least.

But the reason I rose was not particularly to call attention to them—they are undoubtedly very good boys, but they are boys, and I object to having their legislation before us and be refused the privilege to amend that legislation. There are men on the floor of the House who have vast legislative experience in drafting legislation.

These young men happen to have come from the "little red house" in Georgetown. [Laughter.] The distinguished chairman should not object to me because I happened to have referred to the "little red house." It is there that these men gather every night, and I am told by people who go there that they are a very charming set of young men, exceedingly bright, and that one of them tickles the piano keys like nobody's business. [Laughter.]

I like that type of young men, but if they write legislation for the floor of the House, I want the right to amend it or to offer an amendment if I feel that way; and I do not want my very dear friend—and he is a very dear friend of mine—I do not want him to crack down on his old friend FRED BRITTEN because he offers an amendment to improve this revolutionary piece of legislation. [Laughter.]

Mr. BULWINKLE. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment. I hope the House will let the bars down for me as it has for the gentleman from Illinois. I feel sorry for the gentleman from Illinois, for no matter how much anybody tells him, the gentleman is so obsessed with the idea that Mr. Cohen and Mr. Corcoran are doing this nefarious work that he cannot sleep at night.

Mr. BRITTEN. The gentleman never saw me sleeping. [Laughter.]

Mr. BULWINKLE. No; I admit that; and am thankful that I have not. But it is pitiful to see the gentleman here talking about the "little red house." Has he ever been there? No; of course he has not. I stated to you yesterday, as well as to other Members of the House, that on the first bill that was drawn they—Mr. Cohen and Mr. Corcoran—did have something to do with it.

I also stated to you that the bill that is before the House now for consideration was drafted by the subcommittee. I do not agree with the subcommittee in all that they have done; but let us be just and let us be fair. It is the most important bill that has passed this session and the most far-reaching of any bill we have ever had before us. It is idle to spend 5 minutes talking about the "little red house" and the two boys.

By the way, I want to tell you that they are about as smart youngsters as you can find anywhere.

Mr. BRITTEN. They are too smart.

Mr. BULWINKLE. No; they are not. Just right.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BULWINKLE. I yield.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Is not the gentleman of the opinion that the reason the sensitive nerve that has been touched in the gentleman from Illinois is because these gentlemen are so intelligent, so capable, and know so much about the nefarious practices of the New York Stock Exchange, and that they have had brains enough to lay their hands on some of the evils, and capacity enough to suggest a correction of them?

Mr. BRITTEN. The gentleman admits that they had hands on the legislation?

Mr. BULWINKLE. They have had their hands on the legislation in the first bill, and they know what they are doing.

Let us quit this kind of talk. Let us introduce our amendments to this bill, if we want to, and vote on them and argue the bill; but, in all seriousness, in all candor, it does not make any difference to me now who drafted the bill; let us give very careful consideration to the amendments introduced. The bill is here before us for consideration, and you and I and every Member in this House have a duty to perform in passing upon it; and all I say to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BRITTEN] is, do not let your obsessions weigh upon you, because when they become too strong they eventually drive you to a mental illness.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. TABER) there were—ayes 46, noes 102.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MAY: Page 13, line 22, after the word "prescribe" and before the word "rules", insert the word "reasonable."

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, I do not know what the gentleman's amendment means. Of course, he may understand it. If it means anything, it would bring about confusion. I trust the Committee will vote down the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

At the end of line 10, on page 14, strike out the period, insert a comma, and add: "Provided, The purchaser of any listed security under this act shall deposit not less than 45 percent of the current market price of the security at the time of purchase."

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, when I interrupted the chairman of the committee a few moments ago with reference to the matter concerning which I have offered an amendment, and which I read at the time, I stated that I was very strongly in favor of the bill, as far as it goes. The reaction that I noticed on certain faces was interesting and enlightening, and if those gentlemen were to ask me how far I would be willing to go on a bill of this kind, I would have to answer them at this time in the language of one of the Two Black Crows, "I'd hate to tell you."

Two schools of thought have been developed by the pending bill to regulate stock exchanges. One school holds the view that they should be thoroughly regulated and controlled along the lines of the bill, the other would merely give the exchanges a slap on the wrist, a Scotch verdict of "not guilty, but don't do it again." This last school recognizes the need of a gesture, they favor regulation, but not in the way prescribed in the bill.

There is another very general thought in the country regarding stock exchanges, not to be defined as a school, that these exchanges are gambling institutions, gambling in the wealth of the Nation, and mainly responsible for the disaster of 1929, which engulfed half the wealth of the Nation, and that they ought to be abolished. So strong and general is this view that if the proposition were to be submitted to a national referendum it would throw a scare into the stock exchanges compared with which the pending bill is a very mild sensation. The exchanges are lucky that Congress and not the country is regulating them.

The stock exchanges themselves are responsible for this state of the public mind. Originally, they were founded to facilitate the exchange of commodities, then of securities, but with the tremendous growth of commerce and industry, reflected in corporate stocks and bonds, they have been transformed into Monte Carlos on a planetary scale.

People do not go into the stock exchange to sell and buy things, they merely bet on what a security or a commodity will be quoted at tomorrow or some other day or maybe at a later hour the same day. All over the country, in all the cities and towns, are people playing the market, seated before blackboards or stock tickers, watching the figures and betting on them, and collecting their winnings and paying their losses, just as in any other game of chance. They do not own what they sell or get what they buy. It is not a business transaction at all, just gambling.

Mr. Chairman, I undertake to say that the New York Stock Exchange, for example, could not stay open one day on legitimate exchanges of securities. No commodities exchange could operate on bona fide transactions. And yet so strongly entrenched is this institution that many good people, who would fine or imprison a cigar-store dealer or druggist for running a nickel trade slot machine, petition Congress against the rigid regulation of a system which permits a man to draw out his bank savings, mortgage his home, and hand over the proceeds to a broker he never saw to bet on a game he knows nothing about. Such is its hold on the people that a man of the cloth may hand over in this way the funds of a trust in his hands to bet on the market and nothing is said about it.

Will Rogers related his single experience on the New York Exchange. At the solicitation of his friend, Eddie Cantor, he bit on a sure thing. After putting up margin two or three times he went over to the broker and cashed out, not in. His friend Cantor stayed in until his loss is said to have been millions. Yet this is the game an unprotected public is permitted to buck and which it bucked to such an extent that it not only bankrupted America, but was drawing in the cash reserves of Europe. Gambling in the wealth of others, gambling in the necessities of life. Instead of stabilizing the economic life of the country, it frenzies it. Instead of building up an honest commerce, it converts business into a game of chance under a code of tricks and practices which would be permitted by the authorities in no gambling house.

This bill is not going to suppress gambling. It is only designed to keep it within bounds to the end that it may not again destroy the prosperity of the country. And the institution, foreseeing that the country may soon again be worth plucking, wants no burglarproof contraptions. Coming to the amendment I have offered, it wants no fixed marginal requirements. It may again need to divert the bank reserves into channels of speculation to finance the sale of $2 stocks for $60 and all the other nefarious practices which blew the biggest bubble in history. Having to put up a 45-cent margin may limit the sucker crop. It looks too much like business, too little like gambling, so they want no marginal requirement, and especially no fixed requirement.

They have help here from gentlemen who are very vocal when some poor little rich boy is going to get stepped on. It may be disclosed that the poor little rich boy is paying no income taxes, and they are silent. It may be disclosed that some poor little rich boy has spent a billion dollars to fictitiously kite his stocks on the market, which billian dollars was collected from the people of the country by an army of high-powered salesmen, and they are dumb. But when it is proposed to make the poor little rich boy at least play the game squarely, they have brainstorms about "little red houses" and "brain trust boys" down in the Departments. Some congressional districts in the United States seem not to be very particular about who represents them in Congress.

Mr. Chairman, I think it is dangerous for any Member to offer an amendment to this bill unless he is fairly grounded. He ought to know this bill thoroughly, and he ought to know stock exchanges thoroughly. Very few of us know either thoroughly. I am not among the few. A great deal of what I know about this bill I have read in the newspapers, but I have read both the bill and the report. The chief controversial feature of this bill is the marginal requirement. I have read much in the newspapers about that. If I recollect right, it was stated that one of the original drafts of this bill, although this is the only draft of it I have seen, carried a 60-percent marginal requirement. It was stated in the papers that the Senate would not stand for any such high provision as that and might scale it down to 45 percent.

The very able chairman of the committee, Mr. RAYBURN—and I am sure his handling of this bill has raised him in the estimation of this House, whether they are for the bill or not—says he thinks the language of the bill as it now reads is a more scientific phraseology to attain the desired end of the 45-percent marginal requirement, than the amendment I have offered, which provides in plain English that the purchaser of a security must deposit 45 percent of the current market purchase price at the time of the purchase. I will concede the gentleman may be right, and I would have accepted his answer and would not have offered this amendment had it not been for the fact that at the opening of the debate this morning the very able gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. BULWINKLE], a member of the committee, rose in his place and stated that the title to this section "Marginal requirement", was misleading or a misnomer; that there was no marginal requirement whatever in the section and that it was simply a limitation of credit.

When a Member of this House as able and experienced as the gentleman from North Carolina, himself a member of the committee, assumes responsibility for such a statement as that, it is small wonder that some doubt might exist in the minds of some lesser Members as to what is in that section and what will be the construction placed on it.

The chairman of the committee said he could see no objection to this language in my amendment, except that he believed the language of the bill as it now reads is more scientific and desirable phraseology. I realize that this amendment presents embarrassing aspects. If this amendment shall be voted down it will undoubtedly be construed as a rejection by this House of the requirement of putting up 45 percent of the purchase price of the stock upon the purchase of it. It will be a rejection of the requirement of a 45-percent margin or any other margin. I would not want to be responsible for any such embarrassment as that. My amendment may be inartificial. It is a sort of spur-of-the-moment idea, although I want to say that I have given enough attention to this legislation to have been impressed by the same thought voiced by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. BULWINKLE] this morning, and prior to his statement, that there are no marginal requirements in this bill. If we want marginal requirements in it, we should adopt this amendment, or have it explained plainly to the House that it is unnecessary and superfluous.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. MARTIN] has expired.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment. In answer to the gentleman, I said that is what we tried to do in the bill. I hope the gentleman did not get the impression that I endorsed the language of his amendment. We have it not only in (1) on page 14 with reference to 55 percent, but we go on in paragraph (2) and have another standard. Now, I fear that if the gentleman's amendment is adopted, we might as well strike out paragraph (2), because it would certainly make it confusing and would go right in the face of it, because it would not be an alternative proposition. As the language in these two paragraphs has been so thoroughly gone over, we certainly feel that we have covered the proposition with reference to what the margins are in the bill. I think it would be dangerous to adopt the amendment.

Mr. BRITTEN. Will the gentleman yield for a question, on condition, of course, that I refrain from referring to the little red house?

Mr. RAYBURN. Oh, no, no; but if the gentleman will not say again what he said yesterday and then took out of the RECORD, that these boys wrote this bill, I will yield to him.

Mr. BRITTEN. What I said yesterday was that they wrote every word in the bill, and then I changed that by merely saying that they wrote the bill.

Mr. RAYBURN. I did not hear the gentleman say the word "nearly", but it is all right. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. BRITTEN. I should like to ask the gentleman seriously about this section 6, on page 15, line 13. That is subsection (c). Then going down to line 14, my impression of that language is that unless the security is listed or unless it is particularly exempted, no one can make a loan upon it as collateral.

Mr. RAYBURN. That is only brokers.

Mr. BRITTEN. It says "directly or indirectly." I am thinking of this situation: Many bank stocks are not listed; many bank stocks may not be exempted. There are certain joint stocks of insurance companies which may not be listed and may not be exempted. They may be very high character stocks, paying dividends; but, as I understand the language under the terms of this bill, unless the stock were particularly exempted by this commission, through its rules, it could not be used for borrowing money at a bank or from anyone having direct or indirect connection with the stock market. Is that right?

Mr. RAYBURN. I think the gentleman is entirely in error. If the gentleman will read paragraph (c), of which (1) and (2) are subparagraphs, he will find this:

It shall be unlawful for any member of a national securities exchange or any broker or dealer who transacts a business in securities through the medium of any such member, directly or indirectly to extend or maintain credit or arrange for the extension or maintenance of credit—

And so on. Then (1) and (2) certainly are controlled by that, because they are subsections of subsection (c).

Mr. BRITTEN. That is true; that is the way I read it; but I must state that in the opinion of myself and others on the minority side the language appears definitely to take the stock I am talking about out of the field of use for collateral purposes.

Mr. Chairman, one of the most serious objections of section 6 is the clause on page 15 of the bill, lines 24 and 25, which prohibits anyone loaning on any collateral other than an exempted security or a security registered upon a national securities exchange. This prohibition against loaning on unlisted securities is going to seriously impair the collateral value of millions of dollars worth of good, substantial dividend-paying stocks. For example, it makes it impossible for a broker to loan any money on national-bank stocks. There are hundreds of millions of dollars worth of national-bank stocks that are dealt in over the counter and are just as good, if not better, than many listed stocks. What the object is in trying to destroy their collateral value seems obscure. In addition to the bank stocks there are the joint-stock life-insurance companies, the fire-insurance companies, many local securities of any name and nature. It is a financial crime to injure the collateral value of stocks of this sort owned by millions of investors in this country. If a margin must be fixed by statute—and it should not be fixed by statute, because a margin which is adequate today may be entirely inadequate a year hence—but if a margin must be fixed by statute, it should be a reasonable margin. It should be high enough to keep the small speculator from overspeculating; it should be low enough to permit a distinct market in securities and to avoid freezing the market.

Mr. RAYBURN. That is not the intention; and we think we have covered it pretty well.

Mr. BRITTEN. That was not the intention.

Mr. RAYBURN. Not at all.

Mr. BRITTEN. The gentleman does not think the bill does that?

Mr. RAYBURN. I do not.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, after the explanation of the chairman of the committee, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Colorado?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

RESTRICTIONS ON BORROWING BY MEMBERS, BROKERS, AND DEALERS

SEC. 7. It shall be unlawful for any member of a national securities exchange, or any broker or dealer who transacts a business in securities through the medium of any such member, directly or indirectly—

(a) To borrow in the ordinary course of business as a broker or dealer on any security (other than an exempted security) registered on a national securities exchange except (1) from or through a member bank of the Federal Reserve System, (2) from any nonmember bank which shall have filed with the Federal Reserve Board an agreement, which is still in force and which is in the form prescribed by the Board, undertaking to comply with all provisions of this act, the Federal Reserve Act, as amended, and the Banking Act of 1933, which are applicable to members banks and which relate to the use of credit to finance transactions in securities, and with such rules and regulations as may be prescribed pursuant to such provisions of law or for the purpose of preventing evasions thereof, or (3) in accordance with such rules and regulations as the Federal Reserve Board may prescribe to permit loans between such members and/or brokers and/or dealers, or to permit loans to meet emergency needs. Any such agreement filed with the Federal Reserve Board shall be subject to termination at any time by order of the Board, after appropriate notice and opportunity for hearing, because of any failure by such bank to comply with the provisions thereof or with such provisions of law or rules or regulations; and, for any willful violation of such agreement, such bank shall be subject to the penalties provided for violations of rules and regulations prescribed under this act. The provisions of sections 20 and 24 of this act shall apply in the case of any such proceeding or order of the Federal Reserve Board in the same manner as such provisions apply in the case of proceedings and orders of the Commission.

(b) To permit in the ordinary course of business as a broker his aggregate indebtedness to all other persons, including customers' credit balances (but excluding indebtedness on exempted securities), to exceed such percentage of the net capital (exclusive of fixed assets and value of exchange membership) employed in the business, but not exceeding in any case 2,000 percent, as the Commission may by rules and regulations prescribe as necessary or appropriate in the public interest or for the protection of investors.

(c) To hypothecate or arrange for the hypothecation of any securities carried for the account of a customer under circumstances that will permit the commingling of his securities without his written consent with the securities of any other customer.

(d) To hypothecate or arrange for the hypothecation of securities carried for customers' accounts under circumstances (1) that will permit such securities to be commingled with the securities of any person other than a bona fide customer, or (2) that will permit such securities to be hypothecated, or subjected to any lien or claim of the pledgee, for a sum in excess of the aggregate indebtedness of such customers with respect to such securities.

(e) To lend or arrange for the lending of any securities carried for the account of any customer without the written consent of such customer.

Mr. STOKES. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I desire to call attention to the fact that Wall Street is not made up of that group of men who happen to own seats on the exchange in New York City, but it is made up of that large group of people all over this country who buy and sell stocks and securities on the New York Stock Exchange. Probably at some time in their lives 50 percent of the Members of this Congress find themselves in this group and thus can be said to represent Wall Street. We can, therefore, hardly blame Wall Street for all the breaks and advances in the stock market. As pointed out by the minority report, it is estimated that something like 26,000,000 people in this country own stock holdings.

In a huge speculative market such as we had in 1929, when Pennsylvania Railroad stock, for example, sold at $130 a share, when brokers' loans amounted to $8,000,000,000, compared with the current price of $30 a share for Pennsylvania Railroad and $1,000,000,000 for brokers' loans, there was a greater need of rigid margin requirements. I think, therefore, that margin requirements should be flexible and should be controlled by some board such as the Federal Reserve Board, composed of men experienced in financial affairs. In fact, in times like 1929, when we had such a great speculative boom, it is better not to have any stocks bought on margin; they should be paid for in cash and cash alone.

The Securities Act of 1933 has unquestionably retarded business. It has retarded the flow of money into industry, both large and small, because of the civil and criminal liability linked inseparably with new securities issues. I have asked the Chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency, the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. STEAGALL], to act in concert with the chairman of this committee, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN], to request the Federal Reserve Board to make a study of this act and to make such recommendations as they deem best toward encouraging business by the amendment of the Securities Act of 1933 before this Congress adjourns.

Mr. HOLMES. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HOLMES: On page 18, line 20, after the comma, insert the following: "from a savings bank not doing a commercial banking business."

Mr. HOLMES. Mr. Chairman, as I look over this bill I am quite convinced that it is going to injure seriously many manufacturing concerns in the United States. It will also take away from savings banks an avenue which they have always considered a secondary reserve for investment.

I find on page 63 of the Federal Reserve Act, section 2, the following language:

SEC. 2. That section 11 (k) of the Federal Reserve Act be amended and reenacted to read as follows:

"(k) To grant by special permit to national banks applying therefor, when not in contravention of State or local law, the right to act as trustee, executor, administrator, registrar of stocks and bonds, guardian of estates, assignee, receiver, committee of estates of lunatics, or in any other fiduciary capacity in which State banks, trust companies, or other corporations which come into competition with national banks are permitted to act under the laws of the State in which the national bank is located.

"Whenever the laws of such State authorize or permit the exercise of any or all of the foregoing powers by State banks, trust companies, or other corporations which compete with national banks, the granting to and the exercise of such powers by national banks shall not be deemed to be in contravention of State or local law within the meaning of this act.

"National banks exercising any or all of the powers enumerated in this subsection shall segregate all assets held in any fiduciary capacity from the general assets of the bank and shall keep a separate set of books and records showing in proper detail all transactions engaged in under authority of this subsection. Such books and records shall be open to inspection by the State authorities to the same extent as the books and records of corporations organized under State law which exercise fiduciary powers, but nothing in this act shall be construed as authorizing the State authorities to examine the books, records, and assets of the national bank which are not held in trust under authority of this subsection."

The Federal Reserve Act recognizes the sovereign right of a State to deal with its own State banks. The Banking Act of 1933 contains several references to previous legislation recognizing the sovereign right of the States to control and regulate their own banks.

That portion of section 7 of the bill under consideration, appearing on page 18 of the print, makes it unlawful for any member of a national securities exchange or any broker or dealer: First, to borrow other than through a member bank of the Federal Reserve System; second, from any member bank which shall have filed with the Federal Reserve Board an agreement which is still in force.

I shall not read the balance of the paragraph.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOLMES. I yield.

Mr. MAY. Does the gentleman think a man could borrow from a State bank which was not a member of the Federal Reserve System?

Mr. HOLMES. It would be unlawful for a member of a national securities exchange or any broker or dealer to borrow money.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Massachusetts may be permitted to proceed for 10 additional minutes. The gentleman is a member of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, and did not take any time during general debate.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

Mr. HOLMES. I may say to the gentleman from Kentucky that under this section of the act it is made unlawful for any member of an exchange, any dealer, or broker to borrow money from any bank unless it is a member of the Federal Reserve System.

Mr. MAY. That would undoubtedly have a serious effect on nonmember banks should it become effective.

Mr. RAYBURN. On nonmember banks, that is true.

Mr. HOLMES. Besides, it places them at a very great disadvantage unless they file an agreement, get a license, and are willing to conform with the Federal Reserve Act and the Banking Act of 1933, which acts have recognized the sovereign right of the State to control and regulate its own State banks and do not compel them to be members of the Federal Reserve System.

I have a report here of 567 mutual savings banks in the United States. They are not commercial banks. These savings banks are just the custodians of the depositors' money, and they will be prevented from making loans to a member, broker, or dealer under the terms of section 7. This also applies to trust companies and other nonmember banks which have been chartered by any State in the Union.

In Massachusetts alone the records I have received show that during the past 5 years $121,000,000 has been loaned to brokers and dealers, and during this whole period of 5 years the loss has been less than one half of 1 percent on those loans. Naturally the savings banks in my State—and I think this is true of other States, according to the brief filed by the Association of Mutual Savings Banks of the United States—want to preserve that market as a secondary avenue for investment of surplus funds where they may have a ready yield and get a quick turnover in case their depositors need the money. The resources of these combined 567 mutual savings banks amount to $10,856,000,000. Naturally they complain because this avenue of investment is going to be taken away from them.

In my own State, in establishing the savings-bank law the legislature has prescribed what investments these mutual savings banks may make. They cannot buy speculative securities, and they cannot buy speculative stocks, because they have to comply with the legislation passed by the legislature governing the savings banks of my State. They have to confine their investments to the highest type and the highest grade of securities.

I believe it would be a crime to deprive these banks of the privilege of investment as prescribed by their own legislatures. I personally have had a good many sleepless hours over this legislation as a member of the committee, because I realize its far-reaching effect, not by what the terms of the bill set forth but by what the Commission may do by its rules and regulations. That is the feature which worries me.

Mr. RICH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOLMES. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. RICH. If a bank, then, is not a member of the Federal Reserve, it would be unable to loan to an individual on stock deposited with it even though the stock might have been bought through a broker and deposited with this bank in order that the individual might transact business with the bank?

Mr. HOLMES. If he is dealing in securities, they are prohibited by law from making any loan whatsoever on the stock.

Mr. RICH. Then, as a member of the committee, the gentleman is offering an amendment here?

Mr. HOLMES. I am offering an amendment to the bill which would permit members of the exchange, brokers and dealers, to borrow from the mutual savings banks of the United States on securities.

Mr. RICH. Is the gentleman going to be considered a chiseler for offering this amendment?

Mr. HOLMES. I might be, but I do not believe so.

May I further augment my statement, because I have not taken any time on the bill previously. The reason I have worried about the legislation is because I have here a census report taken in 1929, and naturally I am more interested in the statistics from New England's point of view.

I find the statistics for Connecticut show that in 1929 there were 3,129 industries in that State. They employed 36,155 salaried employees. They also employed 251,861 wage earners.

The record for Rhode Island shows that that State has 1,701 industries, employing 14,048 salaried employees, and 126,068 wage earners.

Vermont has 927 industries, with 3,119 salaried employees and officers and 27,421 wage earners.

New Hampshire has 1,075 industries, employing 5,722 salaried officers and employees and 65,511 wage earners.

Maine has 1,565 industries, employing 6,640 in salaried officers and employees and 70,159 wage earners.

Massachusetts, my State, had 9,872 industries, which employed 81,670 salaried officers and employees and 557,494 wage earners.

In my own county I have over 1,100 different individual concerns, and in my own city alone there are nearly 600 different manufacturing concerns. Naturally I have been seriously troubled. The far-reaching effect of this bill will be such as to affect thousands of people employed in my State, in my county, and in my own district. The same is true of other States.

Mr. MALONEY of Connecticut. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may proceed for 5 additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Connecticut?

There was no objection.

Mr. HOLMES. I just desired to give you that little picture of the employment situation in New England, but the same thing is applicable to every other section of the United States.

The statistics show that there are in American business today 1,313,000 retailers, 258,000 manufacturers, 112,000 wholesalers, and 31,000 banks, so that the illustration I gave for the little area of New England, as I said, is applicable to every other section of the United States.

As I said previously, I do not worry so much over what is in the bill. That is not what is troubling me; but if you read through the bill you will find that practically every section will say that it is unlawful to do this and that, and you will find in almost every section that the Federal Trade Commission may, by rules and regulations, go far beyond the scope of this bill as presented here. Of course, an appeal may be taken from these rules. There is no limit to what they can do under the act. That is the element of danger that I see in this legislation.

I am for just as strict control of the stock exchange as any man that ever walked on two feet, but I do not believe we can afford to take a chance to cripple thousands and hundreds of thousands of concerns that are furnishing daily employment to our people dependent upon them merely for the sake of getting at the medium of stock-exchange control. I think there are many amendments that could be submitted to this bill which would actually take the fear out of the hearts of industries now afraid to go ahead because of the far-reaching effect that this bill has upon the control of corporations, which corporations do not have their stock listed on any exchange in the United States.

They can, under this bill, not only control listed stocks, but they can govern and control unlisted stocks of corporations in the United States and make it more difficult for them to continue to do business. We are discouraging industry to continue to go forward and to eventually get us back into the realms of prosperity where we may again see the American family happy.

Mr. HOEPPEL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOLMES. I yield to the gentleman with pleasure.

Mr. HOEPPEL. Will this bill prevent Morgan and others from handing marked stocks under the table to their friends in political life?

Mr. HOLMES. No. It is my personal opinion it will not stop any of that type of business at all.

Mr. DUNN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOLMES. I yield.

Mr. DUNN. Is it not a fact that if this bill becomes law any man or woman desiring to invest money will know if they invest their money that it is in a safe place?

Mr. HOLMES. It may be true that this bill provides a medium where they can do that, but on the other hand, the Securities Act that we adopted last year, if it is of any value whatever, on any issue put out in the future, there must be the sanction and approval of the Federal Trade Commission before it can be put on the market.

Mr. DUNN. Does not this bill go a little further than the Securities Act that we passed in the special session and is it not more drastic?

Mr. HOLMES. I am not objecting to that feature of the bill. I am in favor of that particular part. I think proper light and information should be thrown around every security that has been issued.

Mr. DUNN. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. LEA of California. Mr. Chairman, if it were only a personal matter I should be very pleased to give support to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts. He is deeply interested in his local affairs and it would be a pleasure to conform to his desire if that could be done consistent with the policy of this bill.

However, I think it is very important that we do not create any exceptions in this attempt to preserve control of credit.

This section refers to loans by members of the exchange, brokers, and dealers. There are three sources of loans which will be principally used in purchasing securities listed on the exchanges. One is the member bank of the Federal Reserve, another is the nonmember bank and the third is the broker's loan.

The gentleman from Massachusetts proposes that an exception shall be made in the case of mutual savings banks. It is probably true at the present time that the mutual savings banks are not lending a great amount of money to brokers for the purchase of stock, but if you should grant them that privilege, under credit conditions that will arise under this bill it would furnish a means of evading the control that this bill attempts to establish by placing in the hands of the Federal Reserve Board complete control over the credit that shall be used for the purpose of purchasing and carrying securities.

Mr. HOLMES. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEA of California. In just a moment.

It would establish a special class of banks that would have the privilege of ignoring the rules established by the Federal Reserve for the purpose of preventing speculation or whatever may be the object in purchasing or carrying these securities on loans.

I now yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. HOLMES. I want to call attention to the fact that any mutual savings bank can enjoy the provisions of this bill if it is willing to accept a license and enter into an agreement with the Federal Reserve Board that they will comply with the various provisions I have mentioned. However, there is a grave question in my mind whether the State savings banks of Massachusetts or any other State will have permission to accept such license or grant without enabling legislation from the State giving them that privilege. This was true in the matter of taking advantage of the guarantee-of-deposits provision which we passed last year. Our savings banks could not take the benefit of that unless special legislation was passed to do it. Therefore they established their own guaranty fund, and, as I recall, would not allow the savings banks to join the Federal Reserve System to get the benefit of the guarantee provision. This affects also cooperative banks, insurance companies, and building-and-loan association groups that do somewhat of a banking business. All these interests are absolutely deprived of investing any money in securities under this act, and I maintain that this privilege should not be taken away from these institutions and that they should be allowed to invest their money in this way.

Mr. LEA of California. As the gentleman has stated, this privilege may be granted to nonmember banks. It is not necessary that they shall become members of the Federal Reserve System to get that privilege.

This section, in line 16, provides that they may borrow—

From any nonmember banks which shall have filed with the Federal Reserve Board an agreement, which is still in force and which is in the form prescribed by the Board, undertaking to comply with all provisions of this act, the Federal Reserve Act, as amended, and the Banking Act of 1933, which are applicable to member banks and which relate to the use of credit to finance transactions in securities, and with such rules and regulations as may be prescribed pursuant to such provisions of law—

And so forth.

So these mutual savings banks have the same privileges as other banks. In most instances, no doubt, a mutual savings bank would have the right to file and get this permission. If there be some case in which they do not under a State law have this right, then, of course, it would require permission, through the State law under which they are organized, to qualify them for making such loans. We must remember, however, that these brokers' loans covered by this section are made only for the purpose of purchasing and carrying stock, and this restriction does not interfere at all with the ordinary private business transactions where stock is put up as collateral to secure money for ordinary commercial purposes.

Mr. DUNN. Mr. Chairman and Members of the Committee, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman who just offered the amendment no doubt is very conscientious and sincere in his remarks on the bill before the House. I asked the gentleman, who just spoke, a question which I asked yesterday. This was the question: If the Fletcher-Rayburn bill is enacted into law, will it protect the people who desire to invest their money?

He admitted that it would. That is all I need to know about this bill.

I introduced a similar bill in the first session of the Seventy-third Congress.

Mr. Chairman, I live in one of the biggest manufacturing districts in the United States. I have received many letters and telegrams from the officials of the various industries desiring to impress upon my mind that if I support this legislation it means that I will be killed politically.

When I was a member of the Legislature of Pennsylvania for 6 years I always did what they did not want me to do, and yet I landed in Congress. [Laughter.]

I want the people of my district to know that if by voting for this real progressive, humanitarian piece of legislation is going to defeat me politically for the balance of my life, I am willing to be defeated, because I believe it to be one of the greatest bills ever presented in this House or in any legislative body in the world.

Now, I want to call attention to one thing more. In a Washington newspaper yesterday my secretary read to me where a man and his children were evicted from their home because he was unable to pay his rent. This condition is prevailing throughout the whole United States.

Ladies and gentlemen, I think the time has come when this Congress should enact a law which will prevent real-estate owners from putting people out of their homes, especially when they are out of work. We know that in the United States today there are thousands of men and women out of work, not because they want to be but because it is impossible for them to get employment, and they are unable to pay their necessary expenses.

It is a fact that women and children are being put out into the streets. It is true that many real-estate men are not able to pay their taxes. I think it is the duty of the Government to come forward and see that the rents of those people are paid; and also not permit utility companies, to turn off the water, light, and heat in the homes of these people because they cannot pay their bills.

Mr. HOEPPEL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DUNN. I yield.

Mr. HOEPPEL. Is it not true that the Government ought to pay the depositors in closed banks, and also to relieve these monopolists of complete control of utilities?

Mr. DUNN. I agree with the gentleman. I do not hesitate to say that the progressive Democrats and progressive Republicans have done a great deal in the Seventy-third Congress in behalf of our citizens. However, before we adjourn let us enact legislation which will provide the necessities of life for the unemployed men and women of our country. [Applause.]

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

FRAZIER-LEMKE BILL—MOTION TO DISCHARGE COMMITTEE

Mr. Chairman, rule 27, section 4, of the House of Representatives provides that a Member may present a motion in writing to discharge a committee from the consideration of a bill which has been referred to it 30 days prior thereto; the motion shall be placed in the custody of the Clerk, who shall arrange some convenient place for the signature of Members. A signature may be withdrawn by a Member in writing at any time before the motion is entered on the Journal; when 145 Members have signed the motion it shall be entered on the Journal and printed with the signatures thereto in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

WHEN MOTION IN ORDER

The motion may be filed in 30 days, as the rule provides, but if the committee has not had an opportunity to pass on the legislation that fact should be taken into consideration. The author of any measure should want it fully discussed and considered by a committee. A committee can function much more easily and better results can always be obtained before a committee in the effort to discover the good and bad of a measure than in the House of Representatives. In the House the Members are bound by more rigid rules, a large number is present, and it is expected that a number of Members will know all about the measure and can answer questions in regard to every section of the bill, as well as to different amendments that may be proposed. Usually such amendments have been proposed before the committee, fully discussed, and the arguments in favor and against them well known.

BILL HANDICAPPED

A bill that comes before the House under the discharge rule is very much handicapped for these reasons, and the impatience of the Members caused by a general lack of understanding and cooperation may result in a very meritorious measure getting defeated. If it is defeated, no other motion for the discharge of a committee for that measure or a similar measure is in order during that session of Congress.

Therefore the proponents of any measure should seek a committee hearing and should only resort to a discharge motion as the last resort.

FRAZIER-LEMKE BILL

On the 1st of May 1933 a petition was filed to discharge the Committee on Agriculture from the further consideration of H.R. 2855, known as the "Frazier-Lemke bill" to refinance farm mortgages, to purchase farms, and extend credit to farmers on livestock at a very low rate of interest. It is a very important bill; it deals with one of the greatest problems we have to deal with. It involves a complete change of many major policies of government. Certainly such a measure should be fully considered by a committee and all the facts obtained, printed, and made available to all the Members of the House.

COMMITTEE ON AGRICULTURE FRIENDLY TO FARMERS

The Committee on Agriculture has demonstrated its sympathy, interest, and loyalty to the people engaged in agricultural pursuits. No other committee of Congress has ever at any time in the history of this Government done more for the farmers than this committee has done the past 12 months. Every member of this committee should be pleased with their great accomplishments in behalf of agriculture. The farmers of this Nation owe them a debt of gratitude.

HEARING REFUSED BY AUTHOR

I wanted the Frazier-Lemke bill brought before the House for consideration, although I was not committed to it in its present form, and believing that the committee would not grant a hearing on the proposal I signed the petition. Later I discovered that a hearing had not been refused but had been granted. It is my understanding that about 2 months ago the author of the bill in the House approached Congressman JONES, of Texas, chairman of the committee, and requested a hearing; Chairman JONES told him that just as soon as the committee finished with the administration bills a hearing would be granted; about 2 weeks ago Chairman JONES announced that he was ready to grant a full and complete hearing on the Frazier-Lemke bill; the author of the bill refused the hearing. My name was withdrawn from the motion when I learned that the committee would consider the bill. I think it is unfair to try to force consideration of a bill in the House without a committee hearing, when the committee is ready and willing to grant a hearing. In fairness to the Members of the House all available information should be certified to them in printed hearings and be at their disposal when a bill is being considered.

PROPOSALS IN BILL

This bill will have to be materially changed before it can be enacted into law. It contains one great principle that I am intensely interested in, the principle that the farmers, home owners, producers, and wage earners should be permitted to use the credit of their Nation, within reasonable bounds and limitations, for a very low interest rate.

EFFECT OF FRAZIER-LEMKE BILL

Let us suppose the Frazier-Lemke bill as it is has been enacted into law. The following program for its enforcement will be adopted:

First. The Federal land banks will give public notice to the farmers of each county of the time of holding the first county convention which shall be held at the seat of government of each county. They shall at the same time give notice of the first convention of the State delegates, to be held at the State capital of each State.

Second. The farmers in each county will meet in mass meeting; only those who are indebted and declare an intention to take advantage of the act will be allowed to participate. Delegates to the State convention will be elected.

Third. The first convention of State delegates will be held at the State capital of each State. A member of the board of agriculture is selected from each State at the first convention, who shall receive $15 a day and necessary traveling expenses while on official business.

Fourth. The conventions held in each county and each State will make rules and regulations for their procedure and make arrangements for future conventions; they shall at all times cooperate and assist in liquidating and refinancing farm mortgages and farm indebtedness.

Fifth. The board of agriculture will meet in Washington, elect a chairman, secretary, and make such rules and regulations as they deem necessary and expedient to carry out the purposes of the act; they shall elect an executive committee of three, none of whom shall be members of the board of agriculture, who shall receive $7,500 annually and 5 cents per mile for traveling expenses.

Sixth. The members of the board of agriculture shall, (a) keep in touch with and report to the executive committee the progress of liquidating and refinancing farm mortgages and farm indebtedness in their respective States, (b) cooperate with county and State governments, (c) cooperate with all farm and cooperative organizations within their respective States to speedily bring about the liquidation and refinancing of farm mortgages and farm indebtedness.

Seventh. The executive committee of the board of agriculture shall, (a) advise with and supervise the work of liquidating and refinancing farm mortgages and farm indebtedness by the Federal Farm Loan Board and the Federal Reserve Board, (b) cooperate with said boards, with county and State governments, various farm organizations, and agricultural colleges of the Nation, in order to bring about a just and speedy liquidation and refinancing of farm mortgages and farm indebtedness.

Eighth. The executive committee of the Board of Agriculture shall report any member of the Farm Loan System or the Federal Reserve Board who neglects, hinders, or delays the carrying out of the provisions of the law, to the President of the United States, and it shall be the duty of the President, upon cause shown, to remove any such officer and appoint some other suitable person.

Ninth. Applications will be made by farmers to refinance their farms, purchase farms, or to obtain loans on livestock.

Tenth. Farm mortgages will be taken up to an amount equal to the fair value of such farms. If the farm has on it insurable buildings and improvements, 50 percent of their value may also be included. If there is a debt on any such farm in excess of these amounts, then such indebtedness shall be scaled down through the use of the Bankruptcy Act.

Eleventh. Who eligible to apply? Any owner of mortgaged farm, regardless of size or value; any farmer or member of his family who lost his farm through indebtedness since 1919, and who desires to purchase the farm lost or another farm; any tenant, or member of his family, who desires to purchase a farm, provided he has lived on and operated a farm as a tenant for at least 3 years prior to the enactment of the law.

Twelfth. How much interest will farmers pay? One and one half percent interest and 1½ percent on the principal will be paid each year until the debt is liquidated; at least 3 percent will be paid each year.

Thirteenth. Where will Government get the money? Farm-loan bonds will be issued which shall bear interest at the rate of 1½ percent per annum and offered for sale. If they cannot be sold, then the Federal Reserve Board shall cause to be issued Federal Reserve notes—currency—to an amount equal to the par value of such bonds as are presented to it, farm bonds to be held as security. The available surplus and net profits of Federal Reserve banks shall be invested in these bonds, and they may be purchased by the Treasurer of the United States. There will not likely be a market for bonds due in 47 years drawing 1½-percent annual interest.

Fourteenth. How much in Federal Reserve notes may be issued in this way? Until the amount of money in actual circulation shall exceed $75 per capita. This will increase our precent per capita circulation almost $33, or about $4,000,000,000 in all. I understand the author of the bill is advocating restricting the amount to $3,000,000,000. The per capita circulation of money at this time is about $42.

Fifteenth. The same kind of credit may be extended to farmers on livestock for breeding or agricultural purposes to an amount equal to 65 percent of the fair market value thereof, such loans to run for 1 year and bear 3-percent interest.

Sixteenth. In case of crop failures and other meritorious cases, the time of payments due on loans may be extended for a period not exceeding 3 years, provided the mortgagor pays the taxes. This extension may be granted by the executive committee of the Board of Agriculture.

FACTS COMMITTEE SHOULD ASCERTAIN AND REPORT ON

Since it is evident that all farmers eligible to apply for the benefits contained in the act cannot be accommodated, but only a very few of them, some consideration should be given to distribution of the benefits among the most worthy. In other words, tenants should not be denied this credit because the big landowners who are engaged in farming for speculation and profit, and not for a livelihood have already gotten commitments sufficient to absorb all the credit that will be extended; or to allow one person to buy 1,000 acres and deny 20 farmers the privilege of buying 50 acres each. Another question: Should credit to the amount of the fair value of the property be extended? Should a board elected by a mass meeting of interested parties be given supervision over such loans and the power to extend payments that are due? What effect will such a law have on the other credit operations of the Government?

It was estimated in 1932 that approximately $12,000,000,000 of mortgage debt was outstanding on all farm property, including chattel mortgages.

NUMBER OF FARMS AND FARMERS

The 1930 census discloses that we have 6,288,648 farms in this country, that 2,911,644 full owners operate 372,449,683 acres, 656,750 part owners operate 245,926,107 acres, 55,889 managers operate 61,985,902 acres, and 2,664,365 tenants operate 306,409,324 acres.

All the 2,911,644 full owners of farms, except 184,618, furnished information which disclosed that 53.9 percent of the full owners did not owe anything on their farms. The other 46.1 percent had their farms mortgaged for a total of $4,080,176,438.

The full owners of mortgaged farms, representing less than 20 percent of all farms, owe an amount sufficient to absorb the $4,000,000,000 authorized by the Frazier-Lemke bill.

TOTAL VALUE, ALL FARMS, $57,000,000,000

The 1930 census further disclosed that the total value of all farm land, not including buildings, implements, machinery, and livestock, amounted to $34,929,844,584; the buildings were valued at more than twelve billions; implements and machinery, more than three billions; and livestock at approximately $6,000,000,000, making a total valuation of more than $57,000,000,000. This is about 14 times the amount allowed in the Frazier-Lemke bill.

TENANT FARMERS OPERATE FARMS WORTH $16,000,000,000

The 1930 census discloses that 2,664,365 tenants operated farms valued at $16,381,557,526; this amount is about four times the amount allowed in the Frazier-Lemke bill. Every tenant farmer will desire to take advantage of this act; it will be very much to his advantage to do so. Will there be any requirements as to his ability to operate the farm after it is purchased or the size and value of the farm that may be purchased? If he lost a 20-acre farm in Texas, will he be permitted to buy a 1,000-acre farm in Iowa? Many such questions arise in the consideration of this legislation and should be thoroughly investigated and reported on by the committee.

ABOUT 200,000,000 ACRES IN FARMS OVER 500 ACRES EACH

Eighty thousand six hundred and twenty of the farms listed in the 1930 census contained more than 1,000 acres each and 159,696 of them contained more than 500 acres each but less than 1,000 acres.

LIBERAL CREDIT POLICIES OF PRESENT ADMINISTRATION

One of the happiest days of my legislative service was the day the Government invoked the policy of extending direct credits to the farmers of this country. Much has been done the past 12 months in that direction. Farmers are now able to obtain money from Government sources for 5½-percent annual interest to enable them to carry on their farming operations. As a tenant cotton farmer I paid as high as 24-percent annual interest for credit to conduct farming operations. In many places in the South it is customary for 10-percent interest to be charged for the whole year, although the credit is used by the farmer only a few months. The present administration has stopped such indefensible practices; it has also given the death blow to old 10-percent interest in any form. Interest rates to farmers are cheaper today than they have ever been during our entire national existence.

LANDOWNERS BENEFITED

Farms are being refinanced at a low rate of interest; the Government is guaranteeing the payment of bonds that are secured by mortgage loans on farms and homes. Farmers' debts are being scaled down.

TEXAS FARM-LOAN RATES REDUCED

An analysis of more than half the loans closed in Texas by the land bank and bank commissioner from June 1, 1933, through March 31, 1934, the administration has reported, shows that interest charges which formerly ran from 5 to 9 percent now carry a maximum interest rate of 5 percent, with a large proportion on a 4½-percent basis. Second mortgages are included in this analysis. It cannot be said that nothing is being done toward helping the farmer scale down his debt and interest burdens. Much is being done, substantial progress is being made in that direction at this time, and we hope it continues.

COMMITTEE ACTION NECESSARY

For the reasons I have endeavored to point out, the Frazier-Lemke bill should first be thoroughly considered by the Committee on Agriculture and a full report, along with printed hearings, should be made to the House before the bill is brought up for final passage in that body. I am hoping the bill will be considered by the committee at an early date.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. I suppose that long after the names of the alleged authors of this bill are gathered unto obscurity, the provisions of the bill will continue to go marching on. I am, therefore, not concerned as to the authorship, but rather as to the merits or soundness of the present proposal. I am not going to hide behind any fancied amendment. I am going to defer to the wishes of the chairman of the committee and help him vote down all amendments that are offered, and then I intend to vote against the bill. Reasons for voting against a measure of such importance as this should not be founded on mere trivia. There ought to be some vital consideration for voting against this measure. I feel that the chairman of the committee is fundamentally correct in resisting all amendments, because that committee has spent 9 or 10 weeks on the bill. To permit Members of this House, without reference to some of the text that appears in some later sections of the bill, to tear it apart, is one of the distressing things about parliamentary procedure in this body. We had an experience with the District of Columbia liquor bill. I was a member of that committee, but when we got through with the carpenter work on this floor we made a mess of the bill. Consequently, I am going to abide by the thing that the committee has presented to this House, and then vote against or for the bill as its provisions appeal to me.

Now for the reasons on which I predicate my intention to vote against the bill. In the first place, I believe the philosophy of this bill is a good deal like the so-called "political party" they had immediately after the Civil War, which was called the "Barn Burners." You may remember the name of that party, named after the experience of a gentleman down in one of the Carolinas, who had a barn that was infested with rats, and who, in order to get rid of them, burned down the barn. I am fearful that perhaps we may be doing the same thing here in burning down the barn of incipient bank-credit recovery if we pass a bill of this kind, simply to kill a few rats in the form of abuses. I do not have to apologize for my attitude on this matter by saying that I am in favor of regulation, because I do favor regulation and control of the exchanges. It seems to me that everybody who came to the well of the House stated that he was in favor of regulation and control of stock exchanges, but many were afraid that perhaps this bill went too far. I have not heard anyone as yet raise the question as to whether there is an impelling need for this bill at this time. The question in my mind is whether there is a single sound reason for a bill that goes far beyond regulation of the exchanges now. Why such legislation now?

An examination of the report on member banks of the Federal Reserve System, issued last week by the Federal Reserve bank, is rather illuminating. Do you know that according to the Federal Reserve Reporter, which reports for one half of all the banks in the country that are members of the Federal Reserve System, commercial loans this week are $19,000,000 less than last week, that last week they declined $75,000,000 after an advance in the previous 3 weeks of only $55,000,000. All the gains that were made in the 3 weeks prior to the last 2 weeks have been wiped out by the decline in credit expansion. We had hoped that there would be a large expansion in bank credit as seemed so necessary to recovery, so that home building, factory operations, and other activities might gain momentum, but seemingly those hopes have been dashed.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 5 minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DIRKSEN. We are toying now with a credit industry bill, and they are talking about a Glass bill to pump credit into the economic life-stream of this Nation, while the very avowed purpose of this bill is to control credit, and put it in a strait-jacket at the very time when recovery seems to be more or less precarious, so far as industry and business are concerned.

Mr. CROSS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. Will the gentleman excuse me for a minute? Commercial loans have declined, security loans have declined, and on the 25th of April 1934 the Federal Reserve System reports that the ordinary loans are $99,000,000 less than they were 1 year ago, and that security loans are $122,000,000 less than they were a year ago. You get the full implication of those figures when you realize that we were almost at the very bottom of national despair a year ago, and now come figures from the Federal Reserve System stating that commercial loans and security loans are over 100 million less than they were when somehow the life stream of business and industry was at the very lowest ebb. Are we going to load additional impedimenta, additional obstacles, additional burdens upon the slim thread of recovery at the present time?

I recently received a verbal report from my district showing that the relief roll has ascended in my county from 500 to 1,200 in the last month. I have received other reports about recessions in business; about these declines in the grain market, where corn has lost 14 cents of the gain it made since last October. I am alarmed about that sort of thing. Farmers are alarmed; business is alarmed, and the unemployed are concerned. Frankly, I am laboring at the present time under fear and apprehension that if I vote for this bill I may be adding weight to the recovery burden, and that we may somehow start further disastrous declines that may add to the unemployment rolls, that may add to the difficulties which business has encountered, and ultimately set up a grave barrier and obstacle to recovery. Nobody has shown in argument, either in general debate or otherwise, that there is an impelling reason for this bill now. Why can it not be deferred a little while, instead of tampering with the confidence that has been slightly reinduced in business and industry in the country? That is what concerns me. I never bought a share of stock in my life. I never sold a share. I never bought or sold a bushel of grain in my life. If they want to tar me with the pitch of the stock exchange, well and good, but the fear under which I am laboring at the present time is entirely self-induced, and I am afraid we are going to load the last straw upon the camel's back that will ultimately send us down hill instead of continuing on that long, slow, tedious climb up the hill.

My objections to the bill are largely found in sections 6 and 7, although there are others. I have not heard any satisfactory explanation as yet about loans on unlisted collateral. Going back to section 6 on page 15, subsection (c), if you will scrutinize it, this is what you will find: That—

> It shall be unlawful for any member of a national securities exchange or any broker or dealer to advance or maintain a line of credit upon any other security except a registered security or an exempted security, with this condition——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has again expired.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to continue for another 5 minutes.

Mr. RAYBURN. Well, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman has been speaking out of order most of the time.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I tried during the general debate to get a little time on the bill, and the gentleman knows how difficult it was. I ask indulgence to speak to sections 6 and 7.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. RAYBURN. We have passed section 6.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I am reading it in connection with section 7, which we are discussing at the present time. When we consider section 6, that it is unlawful for a broker or a member or a dealer to loan on anything except a registered or exempted security, with some condition that shall be written into it by rule or regulation of the Federal Reserve Board——

Mr. DUNN. Will the gentleman yield for a brief question?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield.

Mr. DUNN. Why does the gentleman object to that part of the bill? I think that is the most important part of it.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Let me continue, please, and we will get to the point. Now, that brings to mind all that other class of securities known as "unlisted securities", which are the securities of some of the corporations in my district and in every other district in the Nation. In other words, by this section, no member's, dealer's, or broker's loan on those unlisted securities shall be made, except in accordance with the provisions of this act. Is that a correct statement, Mr. Chairman?

Mr. RAYBURN. Well, for the purpose of buying other securities.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Yes; for the purpose of carrying or buying other securities.

Mr. RAYBURN. If the gentleman will allow me, that goes to the very heart of the act, for the simple reason that we do want in some way to restrict speculation.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Very well. Now, that comes to what I want to discuss. When you consider section 6, which lays restrictions on the borrower from any other institution except Federal Reserve banks, when you interpret the borrowing provision in section 7 of this bill, you must read it in connection with other restrictions that have been placed upon banks. There is the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation. Here are the restrictions imposed by the Treasury. Here is the banking act, the R.F.C., and a great many other things that will make it difficult for you to take even sound investment security and get money on it at a bank. Moreover, that is controlled now by the Federal Reserve Board under the provisions of this bill. The result is what? An investor would like to go to a broker or a dealer and take unlisted security that is sound in every sense, that is a part of his investment portfolio as one of the durable, long-term investments, and this bill says he cannot do it; it is an unlisted security. It may be the security of some good, sound corporation in your district or mine, and because of the combined restrictions in sections 6 and 7, here is the ultimate effect: You are going to disturb the marketability of unlisted securities. Let me say to you that the value and the current price of the unlisted security is largely determined by three factors: First, the safety of the principal; second, the income; and, third, the marketability. If you destroy or disturb the marketability you disturb the value. The reason I am going to vote against this bill is because I am afraid it will disastrously affect the security value of those corporations in my district that have at some time in the past issued unlisted securities. That is the reason for it, along with the fact that I am not ready as yet to put any further load upon the recovery which we are experiencing at the present time. There is no particular mystery about those objections. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment.

Mr. Chairman, at this particular moment I want to report that on yesterday afternoon a few of us attended the meeting of the Chamber of Commerce of the United States. We were particularly interested to know what that large body of the business men of the country gathered here in Washington might be saying as to the effect of the Securities Act and the pending bill. While the speakers were very restrained in their language, they were none the less very insistent in their statements that the Securities Act had had a very ill effect on recovery.

Many of us feel compelled to vote against this bill because we are convinced that it will retard recovery.

Reform seems to be more important than recovery to this administration. We all desire to stop the manipulation of securities on the stock market; everyone is agreed as to that; but at this particular time, with conditions as they are and business afraid to go ahead, recovery should come first. As was said yesterday at that meeting, some instrumentality must underwrite the securities necessary to be issued to continue business. Must it be done by more agencies of the Government itself? Private capital will not assume the risk under the Securities Act. Had I not been a mere Member of Congress—and I can well imagine how those business men probably feel about a mere Member of Congress—I would have perhaps suggested that if this act passes, taken in conjunction with the Securities Act, the Government, of course, will be expected to create many more lending agencies, because of the failure of banking facilities, whatever may be the reasons. Whether more direct and more liberal loans are to be made by the Federal Reserve Board or by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, it now seems that industry will have to be financed generally through governmental agencies; and the banks will be left with about the only business they are now doing, buying and selling the bonds that the United States Government sees fit to issue; and they necessarily must buy them all, no matter how many may be issued, because the United States Government credit must be preserved at all hazards. When the question is asked how many can or may be issued, the answer is that there seems no limit to the amount with conditions continuing as they are. Thus the banks will finance business indirectly.

I think we have gone far enough in the matter of reform for the immediate present, and that the matter of recovery ought to be most persuasive in our minds at this particular time. Is Congress going to pay no attention at all to the voice of the business men of this country?

Have you read the morning papers, which seem to show that business is practically unanimously against this and other legislation of this character and wants to be let alone for a little while? The passage of this bill can wait a little upon recovery. Its passage at the present time is not absolutely necessary. Why not enact into law that portion of this bill which prevents manipulation and then stop? But do not change the relationship of the bankers and their customers, who may be still willing to risk continuance of their business.

It has been stated on the floor of the House many times recently that there is very little business paper being presented for rediscount and that the Federal Reserve has an insufficient amount to issue Federal Reserve notes needed. Why do we not attempt to help and not retard business? Why do we not do something to regain the confidence of those on whom we depend to do business and furnish employment? This is a long and most difficult bill to fully comprehend the effect it will have, but certainly business men are generally fearful of it.

I repeat: Pay more attention to recovery. Do nothing at this critical time to further retard business. [Applause.]

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, the speech of the gentleman from Massachusetts is not very alarming to me. I have heard similar speeches for 12 months. I think the gentleman from California answered the argument of the gentleman from Massachusetts on his amendment. I call for a vote on the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. HOLMES].

The question was taken; and on the division (demanded by Mr. HOLMES) there were—ayes 38, noes 83.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 8. (a) It shall be unlawful for any person, directly or indirectly, by the use of the mails or any means or instrumentality of interstate commerce, or of any facility of any national securities exchange, or for any member of a national securities exchange—

(1) For the purpose of creating a false or misleading appearance of active trading in any security registered on a national securities exchange, or a false or misleading appearance with respect to the market for any such security, (A) to effect any transaction which involves no change in the beneficial ownership of such security, or (B) to enter an order or orders for the purchase of such security with the knowledge that an order or orders of substantially the same size, at substantially the same time, and at substantially the same price, for the sale of any such security, has been or will be entered by or for the same or different parties, or (C) to enter any order or orders for the sale of any such security with the knowledge that an order or orders of substantially the same size, at substantially the same time, and at substantially the same price, for the purchase of such security, has been or will be entered by or for the same or different parties.

(2) To effect, either alone or with one or more other persons, any series of transactions in any security registered on any national securities exchange, for the purpose of raising or depressing the price of such security.

(3) If a dealer or broker, or other person selling or offering for sale or purchasing or offering to purchase the security, to induce the purchase or sale of any security registered on a national securities exchange by the circulation or dissemination in the ordinary course of business of information to the effect that the price of any such security will or is likely to rise or fall because of market operations of any one or more persons conducted for the purpose of raising or depressing the price of such security.

(4) If a dealer or broker, or other person selling or offering for sale or purchasing or offering to purchase the security, to induce the purchase or sale of a security registered on a national securities exchange by making a statement of any material fact regarding such security which he knows or has reasonable ground to believe is false or misleading; but any such statement, insofar as it is limited to facts set forth in any application, report, or document filed pursuant to this act, shall not be deemed false or misleading unless the person making such statement knew or had reasonable ground to believe that it was false or misleading.

(5) For a consideration, received directly or indirectly from a dealer or broker, or other person selling or offering for sale or purchasing or offering to purchase the security, to induce the purchase or sale of any security registered on a national securities exchange by the circulation or dissemination of information to the effect that the price of any such security will or is likely to rise or fall because of the market operations of any one or more persons conducted for the purpose of raising or depressing the price of such security.

(6) In contravention of such rules and regulations as the Commission may prescribe as necessary or appropriate in the public interest or for the protection of investors, to effect either alone or with one or more other persons any series of transactions for the purchase and sale of any security registered on a national securities exchange for the purpose of pegging, fixing, or stabilizing the price of such security.

(b) It shall be unlawful for any person to effect, by use of any facility of a national securities exchange, in contravention of such rules and regulations as the Commission may prescribe as necessary or appropriate in the public interest or for the protection of investors—

(1) any transaction in connection with any security whereby any party to such transaction acquires any put, call, straddle, or other option or privilege of buying the security from or selling the security to another party to the transaction without being bound to do so; or

(2) any transaction in connection with any security with relation to which he has, directly or indirectly, any interest in any such put, call, straddle, option, or privilege; or

(3) any transaction in any security for the account of any person who he has reason to believe has, and who actually does have, directly or indirectly, any interest in any such put, call, straddle, option, or privilege with relation to such security.

(c) It shall be unlawful for any member of a national securities exchange directly or indirectly to endorse or guarantee the performance of any put, call, straddle, option, or privilege in relation to any security registered on a national securities exchange, in contravention of such rules and regulations as the Commission may prescribe as necessary or appropriate in the public interest or for the protection of investors.

(d) The terms "put", "call", "straddle", "option", or "privilege" as used in this section shall not include any registered warrant, right, or convertible security.

(e) Any person who willfully participates in any act or transaction in violation of subsection (a), (b), or (c) of this section, shall be liable to any person who shall purchase or sell any security at a price which was affected by such act or transaction, and the person so injured may sue in law or in equity in any court of competent jurisdiction to recover the damages sustained as a result of any such act or transaction. Every person who becomes liable to make any payment under this subsection may recover contribution as in cases of contract from any person who, if joined in the original suit, would have been liable to make the same payment. No action shall be maintained to enforce any liability created under this section unless brought within 3 years after the violation upon which it is based.

(f) The provisions of this section shall not apply to an exempted security.

Mr. KOPPLEMANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

Mr. Chairman, my advocacy of legislative control of our stock exchanges and its affiliated business did not begin with the crashes of 1929. Years before that when I was a member of the Connecticut State Legislature I pleaded for such laws in my State. The bills failed because the brokers and a highly paid lobby saw to it.

The practices of these same brokers which led me to urge corrective legislation then are the same practices which brought to a head the public demand for the bill we are today considering. I am proud to be a member of this Congress which is attempting now—and I pray our efforts will be successful—to enact laws which aim to end the crimes which have been permitted under our financial system. I am happy that I am once again in a position to support a measure which has for its purpose the protection of those millions of small investors who confidently entrust their savings to the commercial and industrial enterprises of this country in the belief that these are safe for investment.

The stock of the strongest company was not immune from the avalanche when the bubble of gambling prices burst and billions of dollars disappeared in the thin air, leaving in their place despair, hunger, homelessness and hopelessness. You and I took our losses too.

The public is easily swayed by smooth salesmanship. The public does not look deeply into a situation. There is no point in arguing that human nature will gamble, regardless of laws promulgated to make gambling illegal. There is such a thing as laws which will prevent robbery committed because of the guilelessness of people. The public must be protected.

Until a generation ago financial panics hurt men and women of means, and no legislation was needed to regulate the exchanges. Those people knew what they were doing and took their chances. But today the activities of the stock exchanges are not confined to persons of wealth. Every banker, industrialist, tradesman, shopkeeper, stenographer, housewife, laborer, and maid-of-all-work either has owned or is putting aside for a day when they may have money enough to buy stock.

For these people protection is needed, and that is what this bill will give.

If the stock market were a separate institution apart from any other activity of our economic system, the restrictions brokers place upon themselves would be sufficient. But it is not. The stock market is intertwined with every industrial, financial, commercial, economic, even intellectual, pursuit. It is because of the enormity of its influence that its activities must be absolutely above reproach.

I do not have to go into the financial piracies committed by brokers which contributed so drastically to the horrors of the depression from which we are only just emerging. This bill seeks to correct and eliminate those practices.

I come from a financial city. My mail is flooded with protests to any regulatory legislation of the stock exchanges. I have asked these people how many securities houses have closed their doors because of the difficulties of operating under the Securities Act. I have asked them also how many new investment houses have opened up since the enactment of the Securities Act. But when I ask specific questions of this nature they do not answer. They seem to have forgotten that during the days preceding the fall of 1929 money, instead of going at legitimate interest to the aid of industry, went, instead, to the financial marts, where it was loaned at an interest of 20 percent and higher for the purpose of enabling the public to purchase securities, many of them out-and-out fakes.

Industry has been begging for years for the help which is due it. And suddenly the bankers and the brokers discover that they are afraid to help because the law is strict. Where were they when the laws were loose?

When the opponents of this bill say that this legislation will impair our personal liberty and our rugged individualism, I ask them, What personal liberty, what individual rights would a stockholder possess who never could find out what the companies in which he was investing were earning, whose directors and officers used inside information for their personal gain? What individual liberty did the employees of the National City Bank possess when they were sold out while the bank's officers were loaned money—oftentimes at no interest charge? What individual liberty would the investor in Brooklyn-Manhattan Transit Co. have when that stock was sold short by officers knowing that dividends would be omitted at the forthcoming meeting?

Brokers and bankers have themselves to blame for this legislation. They cry about radicalism. The stanchest friends the Communists had were Wiggin, Mitchell, and Insull.

You know the details of this measure. You know what each of its provisions aims to do. Let the opponents of this bill protest the infringement of their rights with weak voices. The people are with us, and so is every honest broker.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KOPPLEMANN. I yield.

Mr. RICH. If an industry in the gentleman's district should go to a bank in the gentleman's district to borrow money with which to conduct its business and find that because of this bill it could not borrow the money, would the gentleman still consider this a good bill?

Mr. KOPPLEMANN. On account of this bill?

Mr. RICH. Yes.

Mr. KOPPLEMANN. No.

Mr. RICH. Then the bill is not good.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. KENNEY. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment.

Mr. Chairman, some time ago the President of the United States sent a report to the Congress having to do with stock-market regulation. The report was prepared by the Assistant Secretary of Commerce, John Dickinson. It dealt with various matters relating to the stock market and concluded with the following statement:

> It must always be recognized that the average man has an inherent instinct for gambling. If abolished in one form, it seems always to crop out in another.
> In America the man of average income has, perhaps, turned to the stock-market exchange because of the prohibition of various forms of gambling. If the speculative tendencies of our people could be turned into other channels, this instinct might be satisfied without far-reaching economic consequences.

We have heard from the distinguished chairman of our committee that there has been some chiseling going on. I think by the provisions of this bill there will be chiseling. You are going to chisel the little fellow out of the stock market. Where is he going to turn? The President himself has warned you that he is going back to some other form of gambling. He will undoubtedly look about to spend a small sum or sums for a chance to improve his condition. Shall we allow him to enter upon the practice of the old gambling evils with all the vices to which all straight-thinking men are opposed? We can prevent this by furnishing a wholesome way for him to give vent to the inborn speculative urge.

There is, if we are to be guided by the President's report, a salutary piece of legislation now pending in the House of Representatives. It is the bill introduced by me providing for a national lottery. I cannot but perceive—and I hope most of you with me perceive—that a national lottery conducted by Government for public benefit is not gambling. [Applause.] Rather it would tend to control and eradicate gambling. It would at the same time provide sorely needed funds which hosts of citizens, many thousands of persons, would cheerfully and gladly contribute in small sums of gift money.

That it would be a means of controlling if not a cure for gambling, I would here quote a noted reformer on the subject:

> I see that Representative KENNEY, Democrat, from New Jersey, has introduced a bill to create a Government lottery in the United States to provide funds for the Treasury and for veterans' benefits. * * *
> As a moral principle, gambling of any kind is a waste. It has no basis as an economic measure. It is pitiful to find how plentiful the fish swarm about the thinly baited hook. * * *
> I repeat, I'm against it as a matter of policy; but a lottery, Government-directed, that would assure veterans having their pensions restored by the profits, is better than having gambling wide-spread with private persons reaping the harvest. At least the people who make the profits would get something from their investment and they'll never do it by any other means. It would be a sort of salvage from wrong.

I have another expression from a distinguished clergyman down in Richmond, Va., who a few days ago said:

The new morality does not frown on games of chance, but it asserts that only fools play for money in games that are rigged against them. * * *

Most reformers and clergymen seem to hate games of chance, matrimony being the only game of chance favored by most of the clergy. But some of them are coming to see that all life is a game of chance, and we develop skill at it only at life's long last.

It is a good thing that the instinct to take a chance is a part of human nature or we would never get anywhere at all.

A federally conducted and operated lottery would do more to control the gambling evil than the bill now before the House.

[Here the gavel fell.]

The Clerk read as follows:

REGULATION OF THE USE OF MANIPULATIVE DEVICES

SEC. 9. It shall be unlawful for any person, directly or indirectly, by the use of any means or instrumentality of interstate commerce or of the mails, or of any facility of any national securities exchange, to effect a short sale, or to use or employ any stop-loss order in connection with the purchase or sale, of any security registered on a national securities exchange, in contravention of such rules and regulations as the Commission may prescribe as necessary or appropriate in the public interest or for the protection of investors.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. WHITE: Page 24, line 22, after the word "devices", insert a semicolon and the following: "sales of securities."

In line 23, before the word "it", insert "(a)".

On page 25, after line 7, insert the following new subsection:

"(b) It shall be unlawful for any person, directly or indirectly, by the use of any means or instrumentality of interstate commerce or of the mails or any facility of any national securities exchange to sell any security registered on a national security exchange or any security not so registered, without having made available to the purchaser thereof before the sale is effective a description of such security which shall include the serial or certificate number thereof or similar mark of identification, the name of the person and such other information identifying such security as the commission shall by rules and regulations prescribe as necessary or appropriate for the protection of investors."

Mr. WHITE. Mr. Chairman, I believe this is the most important feature that is before us in connection with this legislation, and I hope that the members of this committee will very carefully consider the proposition as embodied in this amendment.

It is one that has been under consideration and given a great deal of thought. I do not think any man should be allowed to sell something which does not exist. We do not permit anyone to offer under rules and regulations now in effect under the Securities Act a misrepresented security, but we are still allowing them to sell just thin air or nothing at all under short selling.

If the gentlemen of this committee will recall the attacks that have been made in the past on good legitimate enterprises by short selling and the destruction of credit, I think they will give this amendment due consideration. I hope the committee will not just vote this amendment down perfunctorily but will give earnest thought and consideration to the fact that we should stop short selling.

Mr. PETTENGILL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WHITE. I yield to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. PETTENGILL. Do I understand that under the gentleman's amendment before a seller can sell a security he must tell the buyer the number of the security?

Mr. WHITE. He must positively identify the thing offered for sale by its description and number.

Mr. PETTENGILL. As a practical matter, let us assume the following circumstance: Here is a sale order which comes in from a broker in Indiana for execution in New York to sell 10 shares of steel. There is a buy order that originates somewhere in the United States—Colorado, Texas, California, Florida, or some other State. How, as a practical proposition, can the seller in Indiana, operating by telegraph to the New York Exchange, notify the possible purchaser of the stock as to the number of the certificate? He does not even know, or ever will know, who the buyer it.

Mr. WHITE. When he offers to sell 10 shares, it is mighty easy for him to identify those shares by certificate number. He will use the certificate number or serial. He has no more right to offer for sale 10 shares of a company than you have a right to offer for sale 10 lots on Pennsylvania Avenue down here without giving a description of the lots.

Mr. DONDERO and Mr. DARDEN rose.

Mr. DONDERO. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WHITE. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. DONDERO. What difference would it make as to what the number or the serial on the stock was? It is all the same.

Mr. WHITE. It would operate to prevent the short selling of something which does not exist. Let us confine our sales to things that exist rather than to the sale of things which do not exist. If the gentleman is conversant with what happened to Mr. Saunders in the Piggly Wiggly transaction and the ruin that was brought about to business concerns and individuals by the short selling of securities, he would know the damage and destruction that has been brought to the business of this country.

Mr. DONDERO. The furnishing of the number would not make any difference.

Mr. WHITE. Men who were engaged in worthy enterprises were ruined by short selling and the damaging of credit and market value of securities.

Mr. DONDERO. It would not make any difference whether it was A or Z, if it is the same kind of stock and in the same corporation.

Mr. WHITE. Let the seller identify it by certificate number, as provided in this amendment.

Mr. DARDEN. Would not that entail endless litigation?

Mr. WHITE. How would it? If you offered 10 lots on Pennsylvania Avenue, lots nos. 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, and so on, in block 7, that would not entail any great amount of work.

Mr. DARDEN. That is true, but it would be very difficult, with the large number of issues of legitimate securities now on sale on the stock exchange, to describe them minutely in a telegraphic order.

Mr. WHITE. Is it the gentleman's contention that we should not identify what is offered for sale?

Mr. DARDEN. Generally, that is true, and that is done under the rules in effect on the exchanges, but under this amendment you would not only stop short selling, you would stop all selling, because you would make it so cumbersome that people could not engage in the business.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. WHITE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 5 additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. WHITE. We who have studied the financial situation and short selling in this country know that business has been ruined and various enterprises have been destroyed by piratical attacks of unscrupulous dealers. We know that something should be done to curb this practice. Anybody who is conversant with what happened to Stutz Motor Co. knows how young Ryan cornered Stutz stock on the exchange and caused them to change the rules in order to avoid responsibility. We know what happened to Saunders in Memphis, Tenn., when his business was ruined by short selling.

Let us carry out the intention with which this bill was drawn and make it effective by the adoption of this amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Idaho.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. SABATH: Page 25, line 1, after the word "sale", insert "or offer to sell short."

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, ladies, and gentlemen, I hope the committee will accept this amendment. The intent of the provision is to prevent short selling by giving the commission the right to regulate. All I desire to do is to make this clear.

The bill, as it is written, restricts or prevents short selling, subject to regulation by the commission, and I know it has been the practice to offer short sales for the purpose of hammering down prices. I think the words "or offer to sell short" should be included, and I think this will make the bill more effective.

Personally, of course, I voted for the amendment of the gentleman from Idaho, and I have favored such an amendment, because in the fall of 1929 I started a crusade against short selling. I have done everything humanly possible to have the stock exchanges stop short selling, if not for the country's sake, then for its own sake, but they refused to listen to reason. Naturally, if I could absolutely restrict or prevent short selling, I would be extremely happy; but I have enough confidence in the commission to believe they will restrict and preclude any of these pool operations and short selling that brought about the destruction of the market in 1929.

Mr. Chairman, being extremely anxious and desirous for early passage of this bill, and realizing what this committee has been subjected to, and feeling that they have done the very best they could in formulating this bill—though I had intended to offer several amendments in the hope of strengthening and clarifying some of the provisions, I shall refrain from doing so, as I do not wish to give the enemies of this legislation a chance or opportunity to delay its consideration and final passage.

It is not by any means a perfect bill. It does not go as far as I should like it to; but, as I have stated, I feel it is the best bill the committee was able to agree upon during the long weeks the committee has had it under consideration. Having studied these abuses ever since the fall of 1929—having drafted many resolutions to investigate the stock exchange and its many ramifications and the causes and those responsible for the criminal conditions, and then the inevitable crash that was bound to follow; having also drafted and introduced in 1930, 1931, 1932, and 1933 several bills to restrict these abuses—in the first place, short selling, the floor traders, the specialist, match sales, sales against the box, the pool operations, I fully realize the tremendous task of the gentleman from Texas, the chairman of this committee, and its members in reaching a final agreement on the bill before the House.

My last bill, which I introduced on February 10 and which I felt would receive favorable consideration, was the work of many weeks, and I thought that I actually had a bill that would eliminate all the vicious practices and protect the public, but I am obliged to concede that the committee's bill before us today is much more comprehensive than mine, though not as restrictive. Therefore, I can appreciate the task of this committee, composed of 25 members, most of whom must have fully utilized their knowledge and ability, which I know are greater than mine, in accomplishing this task.

Mr. Chairman, ladies, and gentlemen, it is easy to criticize and tear down, but it is much harder to construct and perfect, and I, therefore, congratulate the committee that they have had the assistance of two expert draftsmen—that is, Mr. Crawford and Mr. Cohen—as they were familiar with the workings of the stock manipulations and with the technical terms, and in that way were able materially to aid the committee in its tremendous task. For that reason I do not blame the chairman of the committee for resenting the insinuations of my colleague [Mr. BRITTEN] in his aim to popularize the "red house", in view that the Dr. Wirt bubble had been so completely exploded. My colleague, though admitting that he does not know anything about a "red house", if there is one, I feel would have been more at home and in sympathy with a "green house" and its environments.

Personally, I feel that the committee has performed a great service to the country and are entitled to thanks, and I hope their wonderful services which they have rendered to the country will be appreciated and recognized. I admit that this legislation is not legislation that the stock exchanges desire. They hoped that they would be able to continue in the future as they have in the past—mulcting the American people without any restriction or limitations.

If these two gentlemen who have been designated as "young men", or "boys", had given their services to the stock exchanges, I presume they would be acclaimed as great financial experts and gentlemen of the highest attainments; but in view of the fact that they are giving their knowledge, experience, and ability to the committee and the Government, they must perforce be subjected to continuous attacks and abuse, the same as many other men who prefer to serve the country in preference to those who have in the past, and again contemplate wrecking the country in the future. I feel that the vast majority of the people of this country will appreciate the great service these gentlemen are rendering to the Nation.

In conclusion, let me say that I am indeed gratified, notwithstanding that nearly $2,000,000 has been expended in propaganda by the stock exchange and notwithstanding that thousands of misleading statements have been printed, and despite the attacks that have been made against this legislation, that a great majority of the Members of this body have remained steadfast and loyal to their country as against the tremendous power and influences that the stock exchanges have endeavored to exert upon them. Realizing that all their activities have not prevented the consideration of this legislation, they have again resorted to their tactics of hammering prices and instilling fear in the American business man. Therefore, I feel that once more I want to assure the American business men, who have permitted themselves to be used by this stock-exchange lobby and influence not to fear but to look forward with confidence that this legislation will be beneficial to legitimate business. For it will be impossible in the future for these stock-exchange manipulators to utilize billions upon billions of the people's money for gambling and speculation, and thereby deprive legitimate business of the financial aid and credit which these gambling overlords have in the past deprived them of in the hour of greatest need. The Wall Street bankers, and especially the investment bankers and these very stock-exchange manipulators, conducted the same vicious lobby and attack when the Federal Reserve legislation was being considered. I regret that they weakened that act; and if the bill had passed in its original form, as recommended by President Wilson, I am satisfied that the criminal orgy of 1928 and 1929 would not have been made possible, and therefore would have precluded the crash of 1929.

Under the leave given me I herewith insert as part of my remarks H.R. 7924, the last bill that I introduced on this subject:

A bill to provide for the registration and regulation of stock exchanges, to prohibit unfair transactions and practices, and for other purposes

Be it enacted, etc., That this act may be cited as the "Stock Exchange and Securities Act of 1934."

SEC. 2. (a) On and after 60 days after the date of enactment of this act it shall be unlawful to transmit or cause to be transmitted through the mails or in interstate commerce by any means or instruments of transportation or communication (1) any quotation of prices, or any other advice, report, or information concerning transactions on any stock exchange in any security listed, quoted, or dealt in on such exchange; (2) any offer to buy or sell any such security on such stock exchange; (3) any contract, agreement, or memorandum of purchase or sale of any such security arising out of any transaction on such stock exchange; and (4) any security sold or to be sold on such stock exchange, unless such stock exchange shall have first obtained a license from the Commission as hereinafter provided and such license is in effect at the time of such transmission.

(b) Applications by stock exchanges for licenses under this act shall be made to the Commission in such manner and under such terms and conditions as the Commission shall prescribe. No such license shall be granted unless at the time of the application therefor the applicant stock exchange agrees that upon the granting of the license it will comply with all the provisions of this act and of the rules and regulations made by the Commission pursuant thereto. The Commission may by order suspend or revoke any such license for noncompliance with any such provision or with any term or condition of the license, but no such order shall be made except after the licensee has been given due notice and a reasonable opportunity to be heard. Any order of the Commission suspending or revoking any such license may be reviewed as hereinafter provided by the Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia, or the circuit court of appeals for the judicial circuit in which the licensee has its principal place of business, if a petition for such review is filed within 3 months after the date such order was issued. The judgment of any such court shall be final, except that it shall be subject to review by the Supreme Court of the United States upon certiorari, in the manner provided in section 240 of the Judicial Code, as amended. The review by such courts shall be limited to questions of law, and the findings of fact by the Commission, if supported by substantial evidence, shall be conclusive. Upon such review, such courts shall have power to affirm or, if the order of the Commission is not in accordance with law, to modify or to reverse the order of the Commission, with or without remanding the case for a rehearing, as justice may require.

(c) Each license issued to a stock exchange under this act shall contain the following terms and conditions:

(1) That the exchange will adopt, with the approval of the Commission, rules with respect to transactions on the exchange designed to comply with and enforce the regulatory requirements prescribed pursuant to this act;

(2) That the exchange will make such reports and such changes in its rules with respect to transactions on the exchange as the Commission may from time to time require;

(3) That the Commission may modify or alter the terms and conditions of the license at any time if in the opinion of the Commission such modification or alteration is necessary in the public interest;

(4) That the exchange shall take such disciplinary measures as may be necessary to properly enforce the requirements imposed upon it by its license and the rules and regulations of the Commission made pursuant to this act; and

(5) That the Commission, in conjunction with the Federal Reserve bank of the Federal Reserve district in which the stock exchange is located, shall have authority to prescribe margin requirements to be observed by the members of the exchange in their dealings in securities on such exchange: Provided, however, That short sales, pool operations, wash sales and matched orders, sales against the box, and buying or selling by specialists or by floor traders for their own account are prohibited.

(d) In the event that any stock exchange violates any of the terms and conditions of its license or of any provisions of this act or of any rules and regulations of the Commission pursuant thereto, and, in the opinion of the Commission, the immediate suspension or revocation of such license will not be in the public interest, the Commission shall have authority in its discretion to require licenses of the members of such exchange as a condition of the continued operation of the exchange, and/or to require the exchange to appoint new officers and new members of its governing boards and committees, and/or to subject the exchange to a penalty of $5,000 a day for each day that such violation continues, such penalty to be collected by the Commission by suit or otherwise.

SPECIAL POWERS OF COMMISSION

SEC. 3. (a) The Commission shall have authority from time to time to make, amend, and rescind such rules and regulations as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this act, including rules and regulations defining accounting and trade terms used in this act and with respect to pool operations, wash sales and matched orders, margin trading, specialists, short selling, corporate accounting and practices, publicity of transactions and customers' men, segregation of brokerage and other forms of business, reports, and examinations of members of the various exchanges, and unorganized or over-the-counter markets. Among other things, the Commission shall have authority, for the purposes of this act, to prescribe the form or forms in which required information shall be set forth, and the items or details to be used in required statements. The rules and regulations of the Commission shall be effective upon publication in the manner in which the Commission shall prescribe.

(b) The Commission is further authorized to establish such standards with respect to stock-exchange practices, and to gather and compile such information and make such investigations concerning the transactions on the various stock exchanges, stock-market operations and practices, and related matters, as in its judgment are necessary and proper in carrying out the functions vested in it by this act.

(c) For the purpose of all investigations which, in the opinion of the Commission, are necessary and proper for the enforcement of this act, any member of the Commission or any officer or officers designated by it are empowered to administer oaths and affirmations, subpena witnesses, take evidence, and require the production of any books, papers, or other documents which the Commission deems relevant or material to the inquiry. Such attendance of witnesses and the production of such documentary evidence may be required from any place in the United States or any Territory at any designated place of hearing.

(d) The information contained in or filed with any statement required by this act shall be made available to the public under such regulations as the Commission may prescribe, and copies thereof, photostatic or otherwise, shall be furnished to every applicant at such reasonable charge as the Commission may prescribe.

(e) The Commission is further authorized to employ, to fix the compensation of, such officers and employees, and to make such expenditures (including expenditures for rent and personal services in the District of Columbia and elsewhere and for law books, books of reference, and periodicals and for printing and binding), as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this act.

(f) The Commission is further authorized to prescribe fees for licenses required under this act.

(g) The Commission may, to such extent as it deems advisable, exempt from the operation of this act transactions in any security issued or guaranteed by the United States or any Territory thereof, or by the District of Columbia, or by any State of the United States, or by any political subdivision of a State or Territory, or by any public instrumentality of one or more States or Territories exercising an essential governmental function, or by any corporation created and controlled or supervised by and acting as an instrumentality of the Government of the United States pursuant to authority granted by the Congress of the United States, or by any national bank; or any security issued by or representing an interest in or a direct obligation of a Federal Reserve bank.

SEC. 4. The Federal Reserve Board and the Federal Reserve bank of the district in which any stock exchange is located shall have authority to suspend for such period as they may determine the borrowing and rediscount privileges of any member bank which makes loans to a member of such exchange who fails to comply with the margin requirements prescribed by the Commission.

INJUNCTIONS AND PROSECUTION OF OFFENSES

SEC. 5. (a) Whenever it shall appear to the Commission, either upon complaint or otherwise, that the provisions of this act, or of any rule or regulation prescribed under authority thereof, have been or are about to be violated by any person, it may, in its discretion, either require or permit such person to file with it a statement in writing, under oath, or otherwise, as to all the facts and circumstances concerning the subject matter which it believes to be in the public interest to investigate, and may investigate such facts.

(b) Whenever it shall appear to the Commission that any person is engaged or about to engage in any acts or practices which constitute or will constitute a violation of the provisions of this act, or of any rule or regulation prescribed under authority thereof, it may, in its discretion, bring an action in any district court of the United States, United States court of any Territory, or the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia to enjoin such acts or practices, and upon a proper showing a permanent or temporary injunction or restraining order shall be granted without bond. The Commission may transmit such evidence as may be available concerning such acts or practices to the Attorney General who may, in his discretion, institute the necessary criminal proceedings under this act.

(c) Upon application of the Commission the district courts of the United States, the United States courts of any Territory, and the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, shall also have jurisdiction to issue writs of mandamus commanding any person to comply with the provisions of this act or any order of the Commission made pursuant thereto.

JURISDICTION OF OFFENSES AND SUITS

SEC. 6. (a) The district courts of the United States, the United States courts of any Territory, and the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia shall have jurisdiction of offenses and violations under this title and under the rules and regulations promulgated by the Commission in respect thereto, and, concurrent with State and Territorial courts, of all suits in equity and actions at law brought to enforce any liability or duty created by this act. Any such suit or action may be brought in the district wherein the defendant is found or is an inhabitant or transacts business, or in the district where the sale took place, if the defendant participated therein, and process in such cases may be served in any other district of which the defendant is an inhabitant or wherever the defendant may be found. Judgments and decrees so rendered shall be subject to review as provided in sections 128 and 240 of the Judicial Code, as amended (U.S.C., title 28, secs. 225 and 347). No case arising under this act and brought in any State court of competent jurisdiction shall be removed to any court of the United States. No costs shall be assessed for or against the Commission in any proceeding under this act brought by or against it in the Supreme Court or such other courts.

(b) In case of contumacy or refusal to obey a subpena issued to any person, any of the said United States courts, within the jurisdiction of which said person guilty of contumacy or refusal to obey is found or resides, upon application by the Commission may issue to such person an order requiring such person to appear before the Commission, or one of its examiners designated by it, there to produce documentary evidence if so ordered, or there to give evidence touching the matter in question; and any failure to obey such order of the court may be punished by said court as a contempt thereof.

(c) No person shall be excused from attending and testifying or from producing books, papers, contracts, agreements, and other documents before the Commission, or in obedience to the subpena of the Commission or any member thereof or any officer designated by it, or in any cause or proceeding instituted by the Commission, on the ground that the testimony or evidence, documentary or otherwise, required of him may tend to incriminate him or subject him to a penalty or forfeiture; but no individual shall be prosecuted or subjected to any penalty or forfeiture for, or on account of, any transaction, matter, or thing concerning which he is compelled, after having claimed his privilege against self-incrimination, to testify or produce evidence, documentary or otherwise, except that such individual so testifying shall not be exempt from prosecution and punishment for perjury committed in so testifying.

EFFECT ON EXISTING LAW

SEC. 7. (a) The rights and remedies provided by this act shall be in addition to any and all other rights and remedies that may exist at law or in equity, except that this act shall supersede such laws of any State as are inconsistent with the provisions or purposes of this act and such laws of any State as provide for the supervision or regulation of the administration or conduct of business on any exchange which is licensed by the Commission.

(b) Nothing in this act shall be construed to modify existing law with regard to the binding effect on any member of any exchange of any action taken by the authorities of such exchange to settle disputes between members or with regard to the binding effect of such action on any person who has agreed to be bound thereby or with regard to the binding effect on any member of any disciplinary action taken by the authorities of the exchange as a result of violation of any rule of the exchange, insofar as the action taken is not inconsistent with the provisions of this act, or the rules and regulations of the Commission thereunder.

VALIDITY OF CONTRACTS

SEC. 8. (a) Any condition, stipulation, or provision binding any person to waive compliance with any provision of this act or of any regulation promulgated pursuant thereto, or of any rule required by such regulation shall be void.

(b) Every contract made in violation of, or the performance of which involves the violation of, any provision of this act or of any rule or regulation thereunder shall be void as regards any cause of action arising after the effective date of such provision, regardless of whether the contract was made before or after such effective date.

FOREIGN EXCHANGES

SEC. 9. It shall be unlawful for any broker or dealer, directly or indirectly, to make use of the mails or of any means or instrumentality of transportation or communication in interstate commerce for the purpose of effecting on an exchange situated in a place not subject to the jurisdiction of the United States any transaction in any security the issuer of which is a resident of, or is organized under the laws of, or has its principal place of business in, a place subject to the jurisdiction of the United States except in accordance with such rules and regulations as the Commission may prescribe.

SEC. 13. That paragraph (e) of section 3 of this act shall become effective upon the date of the enactment of this act: Provided, That the first part of paragraph (1) of section 3 (a) of the Securities Act of 1933, reading as follows:

"(1) Any security which, prior to or within 60 days after the enactment of this title, has been sold or disposed of by the issuer or bona fide offered to the public."

is hereby repealed.

Before closing I desire to express the fervent hope that in the future the Federal Reserve will not permit itself to be used by the selfish, avaricious, and greedy stock-exchange manipulators, nor that it will be permitted to raise the call interest rate to 18 percent and 20 percent in tempting and inducing the small banks to send all of their available cash to Wall Street for gambling and thus deprive legitimate business of the credit to which it is entitled, nor to give corporations the right to use their surpluses for those purposes, as has been testified to before the Senate committee.

A few days ago Mr. Pecora gave out a statement showing the amount of profits accruing to the members of the New York Stock Exchange, but, unfortunately, he did not have the complete report. I had figures compiled in 1930 showing that the commissions and interest payments alone received on the part of the stock exchanges and their brokers were over $2,000,000,000 for the single year 1929. No wonder that the membership of the New York gambling place sold as high as $650,000. Is there any wonder, then, why Mr. Whitney and his colleagues are using every ingenuity and the great power they possess to stop this legislation?

First and above all, the credit for this great measure must go to Franklin Delano Roosevelt. For we must not lose sight of the fact that it has been due to his courageous and fearless resistance to the greatest propaganda that has ever been launched in this country against an honest proposal to regulate the evils of stock-exchange gambling, that this bill is to be enacted into law.

And in conclusion, once more I want to congratulate the committee, and every member thereof, who has loyally stood by our great President in cooperating in the formulation of this bill, and who has aided in its passage. I fervently hope that this legislation will make impossible the crimes of 1893, 1907, and the greatest crime of all, that of 1929.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that the only ones who had a real valuable, worth-while opinion as to the condition of this country were the shorts in the market. It seems to me that if we had paid more attention to the bears in the market and less to the bulls in the market, we would have been better off.

This bill presents to my mind a strange conflict of thought. You start out with a bill that is designed to curb extravagance of statement in the selling of stock, and you expect to do it by Government regulation, you expect to do it by Government commission.

We have had plenty of laws in all the States, we have a Federal law condemning extravagance of statement, condemning misstatements and providing penalties. In spite of all the laws, these extravagant statements have gone on. There has not been any real enforcement of the laws.

If the Government and the States enforced their laws as well as the stock exchange enforces its drastic regulations, there would not be this hue and cry.

You start off to curb extravagant statements, and then you provide against short selling of stock, which is on the other side of extravagant statement. It is a contradiction to the bulls. In other words, you try to curb extravagant statement, and at the same time you curb the natural regulatory process that has been carried on by the short side of the market.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEGREGATION AND LIMITATION OF FUNCTIONS OF MEMBERS, BROKERS, AND DEALERS

SEC. 10. (a) The Commission shall prescribe such rules and regulations as it deems necessary or appropriate in the public interest or for the protection of investors (1) to regulate or prevent floor trading by members of national-securities exchanges, directly or indirectly, for their own account or for discretionary accounts, and (2) to prevent such excessive trading on the exchange, but off the floor, by members, directly or indirectly, for their own account, as the Commission may deem detrimental to the maintenance of a fair and orderly market. It shall be unlawful for a member to effect any transaction in a security in contravention of such rules and regulations, but such rules and regulations may make such exemptions for arbitrage transactions, for transactions in exempted securities, and, within the limitations of subsection (b) of this section, for transactions by odd-lot dealers and specialists, as the Commission may deem necessary or appropriate in the public interest or for the protection of investors.

(b) In accordance with such rules and regulations as the Commission may prescribe as necessary or appropriate in the public interest or for the protection of investors, the rules of a national-securities exchange may permit (1) a member to be registered as an odd-lot dealer and as such to buy and sell for his own account so far as may be reasonably necessary to carry on such odd-lot transactions, and/or (2) a member to be registered as a specialist. If under the rules and regulations of the Commission a specialist is permitted to act as a dealer, or is limited to acting as a dealer, such rules and regulations shall restrict his dealings so far as practicable to those reasonably necessary to permit him to maintain a fair and orderly market, and to those necessary to permit him to act as an odd-lot dealer if the rules of the exchange permit him to act as an odd-lot dealer. It shall be unlawful for a specialist to disclose to any person other than an official of the exchange, a representative of the Commission, or a specialist who may be acting for him, information in regard to orders placed with him which is not available to all members of the exchange, but nothing herein shall be construed to prevent the rules of an exchange requiring the disclosure to all members of all orders placed with a specialist. It shall also be unlawful for a specialist acting as a broker to effect on the exchange any transaction except upon a market or limited price order.

(c) If, because of the limited volume of transactions effected on an exchange, it is in the opinion of the Commission impracticable and not necessary or appropriate in the public interest or for the protection of investors to apply any of the foregoing provisions of this section or the rules and regulations thereunder, the Commission shall have power, upon application of the exchange and on a showing that the rules of such exchange are otherwise adequate for the protection of investors, to exempt such exchange and its members from any such provision or rules and regulations. Such exemption may be by order withdrawn by the Commission, after appropriate notice and opportunity for hearing, whenever the Commission finds that the conditions which gave rise to the exemption no longer exist.

(d) It shall be unlawful for a member of a national-securities exchange who is both a dealer and a broker, or for any person who both as a broker and a dealer transacts a business in securities through the medium of a member or otherwise, to effect through the use of any facility of a national-securities exchange or of the mails or of any means or instrumentality of interstate commerce, or otherwise in the case of a member, (1) any transaction in connection with which, directly or indirectly, he extends or maintains or arranges for the extension or maintenance of credit to or for a customer on any security (other than an exempted security) which was a part of a new issue in the distribution of which he participated as a member of a selling syndicate or group within 6 months prior to such transaction: Provided, That credit shall not be deemed extended by reason of a bona fide delayed delivery of any such security against full payment of the entire purchase price thereof upon such delivery within 35 days after such purchase, or (2) any transaction with respect to any security (other than an exempted security) unless, if the transaction is with a customer, he discloses to such customer in writing at or before the completion of the transaction whether he is acting as a dealer for his own account, as a broker for such customer, or as a broker for some other person.

(e) The Commission is directed to make a study of the feasibility and advisability of the complete divorcement of the functions of dealer and broker, and to report the results of its study and its recommendations to the Congress on or before January 3, 1936.

Mr. PETTENGILL. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 26, strike out beginning with "It", in line 18, down through the period in line 1, on page 27, and insert in lieu thereof the following: "It shall be unlawful for a specialist to disclose to any person other than a representative of the Commission or a specialist who may be acting for him, information in regard to orders placed with him which is not available to all members of the exchange; but the Commission shall have power to require disclosure to all members of the exchange of all orders placed with specialists, under such rules and regulations as the Commission may prescribe as necessary or appropriate in the public interest or for the protection of investors."

Mr. PETTENGILL. Mr. Chairman, if our distinguished colleague, Mr. MARLAND, of Oklahoma, were in the city today, he would have offered this amendment. I am speaking in part in his behalf. I want to take a moment to say that our distinguished colleague, Mr. MARLAND, has rendered splendid service on the committee. No member of the committee had the large background of experience in the matters covered by this bill possessed by Mr. MARLAND. His voice was always on the side of honest dealing. In the short time he has been in Congress he has made a reputation with his colleagues which any Member with many years of service here would be proud to possess. We all regret that he is leaving Congress to run for the great office of Governor of Oklahoma. If I had anything to say to the citizens of Oklahoma, I would recommend that they elect him to that great office. [Applause.]

This matter is one of the most technical questions or problems presented in this bill. Under the language moved to be stricken out, it will be noticed that it is unlawful for a specialist to disclose information. In other words, that raises the problem of the closed book of the specialist, and upon further consideration by the committee we felt that we did not wish to give congressional sanction to the closed book of the specialist, which many people feel has been one of the greatest abuses on the exchange. Some members of the committee, including myself, would have written into this law that the books of the specialists shall always be open at all times to all members, but we realized that it is a matter that requires a great deal of study.

The Dickinson-Roper report recommended that the matter be deferred for further consideration by the Commission, and the Twentieth Century Fund was not able to make a definite recommendation in respect to the matter; so, by striking out the language which appears to give congressional sanction to the closed book, we are now giving the Commission the power to order the books either open or closed under such regulations as they may deem appropriate in the public interest and for the protection of the investor, rather than making a rigid, statutory limitation in favor of either the closed book or the open book.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PETTENGILL. Yes.

Mr. SABATH. I fully appreciate what the gentleman has stated as to the abuses on the part of the specialists, and I am indeed grateful for the amendment the gentleman has offered, but even with that amendment is there not a danger that a few men on the inside, the officers of the exchange, may secure from the specialist in advance any and all information they desire, precisely as they have heretofore?

Will they not still be able to obtain information that will apprise them in advance of all the other members of the exchange knowledge of the accumulated overnight orders to buy or sell various stocks, the amount and the prices at which the sellers will sell, and the prices at which buyers are willing to buy? With such information the insiders would continue to possess in advance, as they do now, knowledge that probably no one else would have. Armed with this confidential information, they would be able easily to decide what course to pursue as between buying or selling. Or, in other words, as I have stated on the floor before, they would have the opportunity of looking into all the other players' hands, and then of making their bets at this gambling table in safety not only to the disadvantage of outside investors but even to the advantage of their fellow members of the gambling fraternity as well. It is practically the same as if they were playing with marked cards.

Mr. PETTENGILL. Mr. Chairman, I offer no defense of the closed book personally, and I agree with the gentleman that until and unless the Commission shall order the books closed, the abuse the gentleman refers to might happen, that the specialist or his friends might have the advantage of the secret information that is on his books; but as I said a moment ago, neither the Dickinson-Roper report nor the Twentieth Century Fund nor this committee, during the past 10 weeks, feel that we have arrived at sufficiently definite conclusions in respect to the matter, and we prefer to leave it for the future regulation of the Commission.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

REGISTRATION REQUIREMENTS FOR SECURITIES

SEC. 11. (a) It shall be unlawful for any person to effect any transaction in any security (other than an exempted security) on a national securities exchange unless a registration is effective as to such security for such exchange in accordance with the provisions of this act and the rules and regulations thereunder.

(b) A security may be registered on a national securities exchange by the issuer filing an application with the exchange (and filing with the Commission such duplicate originals thereof as the Commission may require), which application shall contain—

(1) Such of the following information, in such detail, as to the issuer and any person directly or indirectly controlling or controlled by, or under direct or indirect common control with, the issuer, and any guarantor of the security as to principal or interest, or both, as the Commission may by rules and regulations require, as necessary or appropriate in the public interest or for the protection of investors:

(A) the organization, financial structure, and nature of the business;

(B) the terms, position, rights, and privileges of the different classes of securities outstanding;

(C) the terms on which their securities are to be, and during the preceding 3 years have been, offered to the public or otherwise;

(D) the directors and officers, their remuneration (including amounts paid, or which may become payable, as a bonus or under a profit-sharing arrangement), and their interests in the securities of, and their material contracts with, the issuer and any person directly or indirectly controlling or controlled by, or under direct or indirect common control with, the issuer;

(E) remuneration (including amounts paid, or which may become payable, as a bonus or under a profit-sharing arrangement) in excess of $10,000 per annum, to any person other than directors and officers;

(F) management and service contracts of material importance to investors;

(G) options existing or to be created with respect to their securities;

(H) balance sheets for the 3 preceding years, certified by independent public accountants or otherwise, as the Commission may prescribe; and

(I) profit-and-loss statements for the 3 preceding years, certified by independent public accountants or otherwise, as the Commission may prescribe.

(2) Such copies of articles of incorporation, bylaws, trust indentures, or corresponding documents by whatever name known, underwriting arrangements, and other similar documents of, and voting trust agreements with respect to, the issuer and any person directly or indirectly controlling or controlled by, or under direct or indirect common control with, the issuer as the Commission by rules and regulations may require as necessary or appropriate for the proper protection of investors and to insure fair dealing in the security.

(c) If in the judgment of the Commission any information required under subsection (b) is inapplicable to any specified class or classes of issuers, the Commission shall require in lieu thereof the submission of such other information of comparable character as it may deem applicable to such class of issuers.

(d) If the exchange authorities certify to the Commission that the security has been approved by the exchange for listing and registration, the registration shall become effective 30 days after the receipt of such certification by the Commission or within such shorter period of time as the Commission may determine. A security registered with a national-securities exchange may be withdrawn or stricken from listing and registration in accordance with the rules of the exchange and, upon such terms as the Commission may deem necessary to impose for the protection of investors, upon application by the issuer or the exchange to the Commission; whereupon the issuer shall be relieved from further compliance with the provisions of this section and section 12 of this act and any rules or regulations thereunder as to the securities so withdrawn or stricken. An unissued security may be registered only in accordance with such rules and regulations as the Commission may prescribe as necessary or appropriate in the public interest or for the protection of investors. Such rules and regulations shall limit the registration of an unissued security to cases where such security is a right or the subject of a right to subscribe or otherwise acquire such security granted to holders of a previously registered security and where the primary purpose of such registration is to distribute such unissued security to such holders.

(e) Notwithstanding the foregoing provisions of this section, the Commission may, by such rules and regulations as it deems necessary or appropriate in the public interest or for the protection of investors, permit securities listed on any exchange at the time the registration of such exchange as a national-securities exchange becomes effective, to be registered for a period ending not later than July 1, 1935, without complying with the provisions of this section.

(f) The Commission is directed to make a study of trading in unlisted securities upon exchanges and to report the results of its study and its recommendations to Congress on or before January 3, 1935. Notwithstanding the foregoing provisions of this section, the Commission shall, by such rules and regulations as it deems necessary or appropriate for the protection of investors, prescribe terms and conditions under which, upon the request of any national-securities exchange, such exchange may continue until July 1, 1935, unlisted trading privileges to which a security had been admitted on such exchange prior to March 1, 1934, and for such purpose exempt such security and the issuer thereof from the provisions of this section and sections 12 and 15. A security for which unlisted trading privileges are so continued shall be considered a security registered on such exchange within the meaning of this act. The rules and regulations of the Commission relating to such unlisted trading privileges for securities shall require that quotations of transactions upon any national-securities exchange shall clearly indicate the difference between fully listed securities and securities admitted to unlisted trading privileges only.

Mr. LEA of California. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment offered by Mr. LEA of California: Page 32, line 25, strike out the word "shall" and insert in lieu thereof the word "may".

Page 33, at the end of line 8, strike out the period and insert a comma and add the following:

"(2) May extend until July 1, 1935, unlisted trading privilege to any security registered on any other national-securities exchange which security was listed on such other exchange on March 1, 1934."

Mr. LEA of California. Mr. Chairman, under the bill as drawn, securities having unlisted trading privileges are to have that privilege until July 1, 1935. The proposed amendment would permit any security which is registered on any national exchange to continue its unlisted trading privilege until the same date. The difference proposed by this amendment is that it permits a stock which is registered on an exchange prior to March 1, 1934, to have the unlisted trading privilege on another exchange until 1935, it being anticipated that prior to that time the Commission will probably report to Congress with a recommendation as to what policy should be established as a permanent one as to unlisted trading privileges for the future.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

PERIODICAL AND OTHER REPORTS

SEC. 12. (a) Every issuer of a security registered on a national-securities exchange shall file the information, documents, and reports below specified with the exchange (and shall file with the Commission such duplicate originals thereof as the Commission may require), in accordance with such rules and regulations as the Commission may prescribe as necessary or appropriate for the proper protection of investors and to insure fair dealing in the security—

(1) Such information and documents as the Commission may require to keep reasonably current the information and documents filed pursuant to section 11.

(2) Such annual reports, certified if required by the rules and regulations of the Commission by independent public accountants, and such quarterly reports as the Commission may prescribe.

(b) The Commission may prescribe, in regard to reports made pursuant to this act, in accordance with accepted principles of accounting, the form or forms in which the required information shall be set forth, and the items or details to be shown in the balance sheets and profit-and-loss statements; but in the case of the reports of any person whose accounting is subject to the provisions of any law of the United States or any State, or any rule or regulation thereunder, the rules and regulations of the Commission with respect to reports shall not be inconsistent with the requirements imposed by such law or rule or regulation, except that this provision shall not be construed to prevent the Commission from imposing such additional requirements with respect to such reports, within the scope of this section and section 11, as it may deem necessary for the protection of investors.

(c) If in the judgment of the Commission any report required under subsection (a) is inapplicable to any specified class or classes of issuers, the Commission shall require in lieu thereof the submission of such reports of comparable character as it may deem applicable to such class or classes of issuers.

Mr. COLE. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment offered by Mr. COLE: On page 34, in line 23, strike out the period, insert a colon and the following: "Provided, That no additional requirements shall be imposed upon the carriers subject to the provisions of section 20a of the Interstate Commerce Act, as amended.

Mr. COLE. Mr. Chairman, I think the purpose of the amendment is obvious, and I have nothing to say about it, except that we do not want to impose on the carriers any additional requirements to those they already have.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. COOPER of Ohio: On page 34, in line 22, strike out the words "and section 11."

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, running all through this bill we set up certain rules and regulations which are required in the filing of reports, and then at the end of those paragraphs we include the words "except that this provision shall not be construed to prevent the Commission from imposing such additional requirements with respect to reports, and so forth."

The language at the end of paragraph (b) not only covers section 12, which we are now considering, but it also goes back to section 11 and gives the Commission power to set up rules and regulations at any time, outside of what is contained in this particular section 12. It seems to me it gives to the Commission tremendous power at any time that they see fit to set up a rule or regulation requiring this or that to be done. I believe, Mr. Chairman, that that provision in paragraph (b) in section 12 should be confined to that particular section. For that reason I offer the amendment.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, this was very thoroughly discussed in the committee. We made this exemption of States. In other words, section (b) provides that the Commission may prescribe in regard to reports made pursuant to this act. That is the whole act; but in order to limit it down here we simply make it apply to 11 and 12. I do not think the gentleman should want to allow these people to get out from under all the provisions of section 11.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. I have no objection to it being there as to section 12, but I doubt whether it should go back to section 11 or not. I think section 11 is very specific in requiring what shall be done and what shall be filed in the report.

Mr. RAYBURN. This relates not so much to what is required as to what is not. We have exempted the Government and States. In other words, we have fixed it so that if a State does not have proper accounting, and some five or six States have none, we want to give the Commission some authority to require something, and make it specific that they will not require more than is already required in section 11. We put it in here that it shall apply to this section. I think the gentleman's amendment might do the very thing he does not want done.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. It was not in the bill originally, before we put in the words "or any State."

Mr. RAYBURN. That is right.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. I am willing to accept this amendment as far as it applies to section 12, but we did not have any such provision affecting section 11 before that amendment "of any State" was offered to section 12.

Mr. RAYBURN. That is right.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Now, we accepted that in good faith. I was glad to see the committee adopt that amendment, as the gentleman knows; but at the time I do not think it had any reference at all to section 11.

Mr. RAYBURN. I will say that that was discussed.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. I do not believe that section 11 has any reference to that particular amendment at all.

Mr. RAYBURN. I think it would be a mistake to have the gentleman's amendment adopted.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. I wish to assure the chairman of the committee that I am not suggesting this amendment in any attempt whatsoever to destroy the effect of this section. This is not a chiseling amendment. I am offering it in good faith. In other words, I thought these words at the end of the section were put in there to take care of the amendment which we inserted on line 15, "or any State."

Mr. RAYBURN. That is exactly right.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. And it did not apply to section 11.

Mr. RAYBURN. But it does apply to the reports. One of the States of the Union, which issues more corporation charters than any other State in the Union, does not have any regulation at all.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I have nothing further to say on that, but I should like to see the amendment adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. COOPER].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. SIROVICH. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. SIROVICH: On page 35, after line 4, insert a new paragraph, to read as follows:

"5. (d) Every issuer of a security registered with and on a national-securities exchange shall file with such exchange on the first quarter year day of each year the book, or accountancy value, of the security so issued and registered, interpreted in terms that shall be applicable to and understood to apply to the entire issue of such securities, expressed in terms of a single share, and no quotation of exchange price of such security shall be printed in the public press unless, underneath the price quotation of the day, there shall also appear the current book, or accountancy value of the security quoted, expressed in terms of a single share, so the investor may see at the same time the stock-exchange price quotation and the book, or accountancy value, of the security. Any false or intentionally misleading information given out in any manner or published in any form concerning the book, or accountancy value of any security shall be deemed to be a felony and the dispenser or proponent of such false or intentionally misleading information in regard to the book, or accountancy value of any security, on the complaint of any purchaser of such security, shall be subject to trial for felony in any court of competent jurisdiction, and on conviction therefor shall be imprisoned for not less than 2 nor more than 5 years."

Mr. SIROVICH. Mr. Chairman, ladies, and gentlemen, a great philosopher, scholar, and sage once remarked that success does not consist in making a mistake, but it consists in not making the same mistake over and over again.

The purpose of this bill is to provide for the regulation of securities exchanges and of over-the-counter markets operating in interstate and foreign commerce and through the mails, to prevent inequitable and unfair practices on such exchanges and markets, and for other purposes.

The amendment I have just offered, in my humble opinion, will protect and strengthen this measure, with which I am in full sympathy and accord. My amendment makes it mandatory upon every corporation or organization that has listed securities upon the market to publish with it the book value or accountancy value of every listed security that is sold in the exchanges and over-the-counter markets of our country.

If the book value or accountancy value of every security had been listed upon the exchanges of our country during the years 1928 and 1929 there would never have been that unfortunate debacle and that financial catastrophe that has left so much tragedy in the lives of millions of our American citizens.

When the security bill was passed, the Latin "caveat emptor"—"let the purchaser beware"—was changed to "let the seller beware also." If this amendment of mine would be enacted into legislation, the purchaser would not only be forewarned but would be forearmed in knowing exactly what he is buying. He knows the book value and it leaves a safe margin for speculation when he also observes the selling value of the security that he buys.

This amendment of mine would help to bring speculation within reason and help to stabilize to a very large extent the sale of securities throughout our Nation.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. SIROVICH. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 5 additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIROVICH. I yield.

Mr. EDMONDS. I think the gentleman's amendment, if adopted, would make the balance of the bill unnecessary.

Mr. SIROVICH. I do not desire in any way to subtract from the magnificent accomplishment of the committee in the splendid bill they have given to the House. My amendment is only a perfecting amendment which I believe would be instrumental in making the bill as nearly perfect as human ingenuity and diversified minds can make it so.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. SIROVICH. I yield.

Mr. EDMONDS. The gentleman's amendment is the only thing needed. It means more than all the balance of the bill.

Mr. SIROVICH. I am exceedingly grateful for the compliment paid to me by the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania. I appreciate his sentiments very deeply. At this time I should like to bring my surgical knowledge into operation and apply it to this bill.

Mr. Chairman and fellow Members of the Committee, as a surgeon it has been my privilege to open many an abdomen and correct the pathological conditions that are responsible for the diseases of human individuals. I have removed many an appendix, gall bladder, parts of the stomach, and sections of the intestines. When you remove the cause of disease you invariably cure the condition from which the individual suffers. In my humble opinion, this amendment would be instrumental in removing many of the exciting and contributory factors that are responsible in having people buy securities with whose values they are not conversant. Through a uniform system of bookkeeping any certified public accountant could easily determine the book value or accountancy value of any share of any security listed upon the exchanges of our country.

In every city, in every State, in every municipality property is appraised in order to determine its assessed value. No one with his eyes wide open will pay $400,000 for a piece of property that is assessed at only $20,000. The same principle applies to securities that are listed upon the markets of our country. If a stock known as "A stock" has a book value of $40, only an insane man will pay $2,000 or $3,000 for it. On the other hand, if a stock is listed on the markets as having a book value of $80 a share and sells for $40 a share, every conservative investor will try to purchase this stock because of its undervaluation in the selling market as compared to its book value.

This amendment of mine would help every conservative corporation or organization to honestly and legitimately sell its shares to the investing public upon the theory that book value and accountancy value gives them a formula upon which they can intelligently buy any of our securities of industry, finance, or commerce.

Mr. Chairman and members of the Committee, I desire at this time to pay the tribute of my homage and respect to the distinguished chairman of the committee and to the other members of the committee on both sides of the aisle who have so earnestly, faithfully, and conscientiously labored to bring out a measure of this nature that will to a large extent eliminate the evils and abuse to which the innocent investors of our country have been subjected in the past. [Applause.]

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I was a little surprised to hear the distinguished doctor proclaim so strongly for this bill. After all, the market is only an indicator of business conditions. I would be surprised indeed to see the eminent scientist, the doctor who has just spoken, entering a patient's sick room, finding that the patient's temperature was very low, then proceed to kick the thermometer around the room, but that is what is being done now through the instrumentality of this bill.

After all, the stock exchange and the curb market are but barometers and thermometers of business conditions.

I do not know how you are going to keep people from losing money if they want to lose it unless you pass a law providing for the issuance each day of a Government bulletin saying: "Mr. Citizen, on this stock you can only spend so much; on this stock you can spend only so much. If you spend more, you commit a felony; if you spend exactly the price proclaimed, the Government will lend you the money."

Mr. SIROVICH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLACK. The doctor is interrupting me when I am conducting a clinic in a very orderly way. [Laughter.] Mr. Chairman, I cannot yield.

Another thing, I do not know how long it is going to take the accountants to get these figures together in order to warn the public. This means that once every 3 months the public will get accurate information; then the public can go "haywire" as to the prices and real values for the next 3 months following the report.

I know that the gentleman from New York [Mr. SIROVICH] means well and that he has an honorable purpose in view, but may I say to the gentleman and those who are from city districts that I have as much right to stand on the floor of this House and protect my people as any man representing any region has to protect his people. I feel that the stock exchange, by the issuance of securities, has been able to develop this country. They have sent money to the West, to the South, and to other places. They have helped mining, railroads, and other projects. Money drawn through the market on the eastern coast has gone for the development of all parts of the country.

There are stenographers, clerks, and accountants employed by stock-exchange houses in New York and elsewhere. Some are my constituents, and I feel that every man from a city district, particularly New York City and other cities which have branch houses, should do as much to protect their constituents under attack as you folks from the farming country would in order to protect your interests.

If you paralyze the stock market—in other words, if the doctor came into the sick room and squeezed the heart of the Nation when it needs help—you will paralyze the entire business of the country. You will not only hurt us in New York, but you will hurt every part of the country. You will ruin business by the rigidity called for in this bill and by the additional rigidity that the gentleman from New York would seek by his amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. SIROVICH].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word to ask the distinguished chairman of the committee a question.

There are a number of corporations in the United States that have subsidiary corporations in foreign countries. It is necessary for them to form separate corporations in foreign countries, because if they do not do so and it is found that they are identified with an American corporation, there is a possibility of their being discriminated against.

In making the returns provided for by this bill, they will also have to incorporate in the return their holdings in these foreign corporations or furnish a return for the corporations in the foreign countries. That is all right. I have no objection to that, and I am in harmony with the idea.

But if there is any public disclosure, it will enable foreign countries to find out who these corporations are and the fact that they are affiliated financially directly or indirectly with American corporations.

Is there any provision in this bill which will permit the Commission, if they deem it advisable and in the best interests of our people, or if there is no public demand requiring the same, to provide that there be no publicity as to the returns made on those foreign corporations?

Mr. RAYBURN. It is the understanding that they will not.

The Clerk read as follows:

OVER-THE-COUNTER MARKETS

SEC. 14. It shall be unlawful, in contravention of such rules and regulations as the Commission may prescribe as necessary or appropriate in the public interest and to insure to investors protection comparable to that provided by and under authority of this act in the case of national-securities exchanges, (1) for any broker or dealer, singly or with any other person or persons, to make use of the mails or any means or instrumentality of interstate commerce for the purpose of making or creating, or enabling another to make or create, a market, otherwise than on a national-securities exchange, for both the purchase and sale of any security (other than an exempted security), or (2) for any broker or dealer to use any facility of any such market. Such rules and regulations may provide for the regulation of all transactions by brokers and dealers on any such market, for the registration with the Commission of dealers and/or brokers making or creating such a market, and for the registration of the securities for which they make or create a market, and may make special provision with respect to securities or specified classes thereof listed, or entitled to unlisted trading privileges, upon any exchange on the date of the enactment of this act which securities are not registered under the provisions of section 11 of this act.

Mr. CLAIBORNE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out section 14.

Mr. Chairman, this section, like many others, is as clear as mud to me. I wish I had the ability to fully understand this act. I have not been furnished any light by which to guide my conduct. I am from Missouri. You have to show me.

I prefer to do my thinking and not act on orders. In my district a gentleman proposes to run against me because I am not following the President closely enough. I am mighty proud of my seat in this House. I am fond of my associates here. I am the seventh member of my family to sit in Congress, but I would rather be beat by voting for what I believe in than stand here until my head was covered with the snowflakes of years.

The chairman of the committee, Mr. RAYBURN, sought in the beginning of the discussion in a very skillful manner to prejudice the new Members by throwing out the suggestion that if we voted against the bill we were taking orders from Wall Street. I do not hesitate to stand in this distinguished body and admit that I am not ashamed of my acquaintanceship with the bankers and business men of America. If it is the purpose of my party to destroy business, big or small, I certainly do not want to go along with my party in that regard. The chairman of the committee, Mr. RAYBURN, said if it was shown that the bill was unfair in any particular to business, amendments correcting the bill in such respects would be accepted.

Take section 14 and study it. How will it be interpreted if Mr. Corcoran or Mr. Cohen perchance is given an appointment by the President? Where will the small business house stand with respect to the treatment of its stock by the Commission? They would have you believe that all the propaganda sent out was put out by Wall Street, but may I say that the other evening I received a telephone call at my hotel from my law office in St. Louis asking if I would advise a St. Louis client whose stock was falling to sell out. I said, "Oh, no; when Congress is in session you are likely to have a bear market." This call was not suggested by Wall Street.

I have received a number of telegrams since this bill has been before the committee. Permit me to read the following:

My experience in railroad financing and knowledge of the effect of public control of business enterprises justifies me in saying for your information that I believe the proposed Fletcher-Rayburn bill unwise and unworkable. It, if passed, undoubtedly would prevent anything like a free flow of private capital into productivity. To my mind it is an effort to protect the sucker at the expense of the welfare of enterprises of all kinds which must rely on private financing. Political or public control by a board at Washington with the abuses, scandals, leaks, tips, and temptations which we know are inevitable would destroy the confidence of investors not only in the stock market but in the stability and dependability of investments generally. I do not speculate in the market, and believe those who gamble should not burden the Government with their guardianship at the expense of the enterprises of the country and those who have money to invest in them.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. BLANCHARD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may proceed for 5 additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

There was no objection.

Mr. SABATH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLAIBORNE. Not at this time.

Mr. SABATH. Who sent this telegram?

Mr. CLAIBORNE. I did not yield to the gentleman.

How did we get into the stock-market situation? In this way: The Government asked the public to buy Liberty bonds. The people bought them and got their first taste of such form of investment. From this they turned to the stock market in hope of greater return on the investment. The public, old and young, big and little, proceeded to make a bull market. That was the beginning of the stock market rise. The suckers had come in. Wall Street was not responsible.

You cannot write any kind of law to protect suckers. If you shut them out of the stock market they will turn to something else. Remember the Florida land boom? Nobody can read this bill and make me believe that the customers' chairs of America are to be occupied by grandmothers, sitting there complacently believing the Democratic Party has taken loss out of speculation. [Laughter.] And I am wondering, since business men are in such disfavor with the Democratic Party, where are we going to get the money to pay off our debt incurred in the last national election? How are we going to raise the campaign fund to carry on our next national election if we stifle business as this bill will do? [Laughter.]

I made a campaign over the State of Missouri in the primary and in the election, and I did not accept a dollar from a soul for campaign expenses because I did not want to get letters or wires from the fellows who might give, but I want to know how you are going to run campaigns when you harass, annoy, and destroy business. It is a practical matter.

Mr. BRITTEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLAIBORNE. When I get through; yes.

There is another reason why I am opposed to this bill. I come from St. Louis. In St. Louis there is a great shoe house, the International Shoe Co. Under the corporate laws of the State of Missouri when corporate stock is increased each stockholder has a right to buy his or her fractional share of the increase, and in this way continues to hold his or her fractional interest. Now suppose the International should increase its capital stock, and a stockholder wishes to buy his or her fractional part of the increase, but cannot pay for same in cash, what does he or she have to do? Go to a banker to borrow and say, "Here is a loan I wish to make." "But", says the banker, "International Shoe is quoted on the market. I cannot lend you more than 45 percent." This man is prevented by this law from going along quietly working and saving and building up his fortune by borrowing and buying International stock. It was in this way 43 millionaires were made in St. Louis by International. [Applause.]

In conclusion, let it be distinctly understood I am not opposed to strict regulations of stock exchanges, but I am unalterably opposed to unreasonable registration and other requirements made on corporations doing business throughout the country, under the guise of a stock-exchange control bill.

Mr. LEE of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the motion.

Mr. Chairman, I am sorry I cannot agree with the gentleman from St. Louis. The gentleman says he is the seventh member of the Claiborne family to come to the Congress of the United States. If he keeps up this lip that he has started, he will be the last member of that family that will ever come to any Congress. [Laughter] The gentleman talks about the International Shoe Co., and he talks about this fellow and that fellow, and how we will pay the debt that the Democratic Party owes. We are going to pay the debt and collect the money from the rank and file of honest people in this country to pay the debt of the Democratic Party [applause], and we are not going to ask these stock jugglers and these crooks that have put poison in the universities of every State in this Nation—we are not going to ask them for a dollar, because you know, CLAIBORNE, they contribute to the Republican Party, because they belong to that outfit and not ours. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. FOSS. How about Raskob?

Mr. LEE of Missouri. Raskob happens to be a Democrat who joined our party and left yours because he found it too crooked to stay in it. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. ELTSE of California. How about Doheny?

Mr. LEE of Missouri. How about Doheny? He used to be a Democrat, and when they caught him stealing he immediately announced himself as a Republican.

Mr. ELTSE of California. When did he make his money?

Mr. LEE of Missouri. Doheny?

Mr. ELTSE of California. No; Raskob—after he joined the Democratic Party.

Mr. LEE of Missouri. Well, everybody made money when the Democrats were in power [laughter], but for the last 12 years nobody has made any money. In my district just common, everyday men got $8, $10, and $12 a day. They got so much money and got so fat they went to voting the Republican ticket, and three fourths of them have been on soup-house soup ever since [laughter], but we are going to bring you out. We will take care of you.

We will follow Mr. Roosevelt. He wants this bill, and he is the greatest President the world has ever known. There is no question about that [applause], and everybody is for him, and everybody will be for you, but you will not get the vote of any of these suckers who are trying to rob the poor. You have got to depend on the poor, Mr. CLAIBORNE, because you run on the Democratic ticket.

Mr. CLAIBORNE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEE of Missouri. Certainly.

Mr. CLAIBORNE. God help me!

Mr. LEE of Missouri. The Lord ought to help you, and if you will pray to Him I believe He will help you, and I am going to pray for you, because it is not of the heart, it is of the head. [Laughter and applause.] I thank you.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, I did not know that there was any objection to this section. Frankly, this section of the bill protects the legitimate exchange from the over-the-counter fellows in having them run from the exchange to the unregulated market. As I say, I have not heard of any objection, excepting the gentleman from Missouri, who seems to have some objections against the bill and more against the Democratic Party. He is the only one I have heard raise an objection, and I ask for a vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri to strike out section 14.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

DIRECTORS, OFFICERS, AND PRINCIPAL STOCKHOLDERS

SEC. 15. (a) Every person who is directly or indirectly the beneficial owner of more than 5 percent of any class of any equity security (other than an exempted security) which is registered on a national securities exchange, or who is a director or an officer of the issuer of such security, shall file, at the time of the registration of such security or within 10 days after he becomes such beneficial owner, director, or officer, a statement with the exchange (and a duplicate original thereof with the Commission) of the amount of all equity securities of such issuer of which he is the beneficial owner, and within 10 days after the close of each calendar month thereafter, if there has been any change in such ownership during such month, shall file with the exchange a statement (and a duplicate original thereof with the Commission) indicating his ownership at the close of the calendar month and such changes in his ownership as have occurred during such calendar month. Such issuer shall include in each periodical report made by it to its stockholders such information regarding changes in the ownership of its securities by its directors and officers which have occurred during the period covered by such report as may be revealed by the reports filed by such directors and officers under this subsection and by the records of such corporation.

(b) It shall be unlawful for any such beneficial owner, director, or officer, directly or indirectly, to sell any equity security of such issuer (other than an exempted security), if the person selling the security or his principal (1) does not own the security sold, or (2) if owning the security, does not deliver it against such sale within 20 days thereafter, or does not within 5 days after such sale deposit it in the mails or other usual channels of transportation, unless such person proves that he was unable to make such delivery or deposit within such time, or that to do so would cause undue inconvenience or expense.

Mr. PETTENGILL. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 37, beginning on line 2, after the word "person", strike out the balance of line 2, all of lines 3, 4, and 5, including the word "or." And in line 8, strike out the words "beneficial owner", and on page 38, subsection (b), lines 1 and 2, strike out the words "beneficial owner."

Mr. PETTENGILL. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the Committee, from the time we began the consideration of this bill in committee I have thought with reference to the regulation of exchanges that we should be careful to go far enough, but with reference to the regulation of business we should be careful not to go too far. As far as regulation of business is concerned I would rather have the test of experience and later, if necessary, tighten up the bill rather than be compelled to loosen it as we find it necessary to do now with respect to the Securities Act of last year.

With reference to section 15, this is one place where I think we have gone a little too far.

The amendment that I am offering was debated at great length in the committee, and lost by a narrow margin. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN] will be called upon to oppose this amendment in deference to the majority voice of the committee as well as perhaps to express his individual views.

Now, I will tell you why I think this is going too far. With reference to the directors and officers of a corporation, who stand in a fiduciary relation to the stockholders of the company, in a quasi-trustee capacity, drawing their livelihood by way of salary from the stockholders of the company—those are the people in my judgment who owe a distinct moral, if not a legal obligation to not conceal, but to reveal, whether they are selling their own stock in anticipation of a future unfavorable report known only to themselves, or buying in anticipation of a future favorable report.

But, with reference to stockholders who are not directors or officers and who owe even no moral or legal responsibility to other stockholders of the company, I think it is going too far to ask them to file reports every time they buy or sell a share of stock, if they are stockholders who own as much as 5 percent of the stock of the company. The stockholder who is not a director or an officer owes no moral obligation to anybody in the world as to whether he is buying or selling the stock, and I think that we ought not to impose this burden upon him. There are many occasions when if this language stays in I can see the possibility of grave danger to the corporation. Here is a stockholder, not a director, not an officer, but who owns 5 percent of the stock of the corporation, and who, for some reason personal to himself which has nothing to do with any inside information that he has acquired with reference to the company, but because he needs money in his own business, sells his stock, and because of the report that he is required to file within 10 days after the sale it soon becomes known that that man is selling the stock of the company. It seems to me that, although he is doing it for a reason that is personal to himself, personal to his private business, it might incite a scare on the part of the other stockholders of the company needlessly injurious to them, or which might impair the credit of the company if it becomes known that one of its large stockholders is selling the stock, and it might be ruinous to the corporation and the stockholders to have the information known.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PETTENGILL. I yield to my colleague.

Mr. FISH. Is not this much more injurious to small companies than to larger companies?

Mr. PETTENGILL. I think that with reference to smaller companies, in which one man would more often own 5 percent of the stock than in a large company, it would be a peculiar embarrassment.

Mr. DONDERO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PETTENGILL. Yes.

Mr. DONDERO. Suppose that a director of a corporation found himself in the same position as a stockholder, would you not be imposing an obligation on him that the stockholder would not be under?

Mr. PETTENGILL. I appreciate the point the gentleman makes, but there has been so much internal racketeering on the part of directors and officers of corporations who, knowing that there is going to be an unfavorable report of the condition of the company 30 days hence, sells stock short that they should be put under whatever difficulty there may be, because an officer or a director is a trustee and is acting in a fiduciary capacity.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has expired.

Mr. LEA of California. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana. The provisions proposed to be stricken out attempt to require principal stockholders who hold a controlling interest in corporations from juggling their stock to their own advantage at the expense of the stockholders.

Mr. PETTENGILL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEA of California. Yes.

Mr. PETTENGILL. The gentleman has said those who hold a controlling interest. That would mean 50 percent. I am speaking only of the man who owns as much as 5 percent.

Mr. LEA of California. I recognize the fact that the 5-percent-line is an arbitrary one. It is variable in its effects in reference to different corporations. As to all corporations listed on the great exchanges of the country, 5 percent represents an important part of the stock of such corporations. It is so commonly the case that a man who owns a large amount of stock, but nothing like a majority, controls the directors of the corporation that the committee thought it was advisable to require these large stockholders who may be trafficking in the stock of the corporation to reveal the facts.

There may be cases, of course, many cases, in which the transaction is entirely legitimate, where no wrongful purpose is intended by a transfer of the ownership of this stock. A requirement that the fact of a stock transfer be reported does not stigmatize the transaction as wrongful. The reluctance to report will be greatest where the motive is wrong. If the transaction is innocent, the Commission can withhold the information from the public. There is a provision further over in the bill—section 21 (b)—which permits the stockholder who transfers his stock to file with his report a statement protesting against making a public disclosure of the facts. The Commission has a right to consider whether or not there are just reasons for withholding the information from the public; and if there is, the information will be withheld from the public, although it is on file with the Commission.

This section of the bill has been called the "Wiggin section" of the bill. It grew out of those transactions in which many prominent men, responsible in dominating the corporations of the country, were recreant to their trust and treated the corporation not as belonging to the stockholders but as if it existed for the benefit of these special controlling stockholders or officers.

Mr. PETTENGILL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEA of California. Yes.

Mr. PETTENGILL. The gentleman, of course, recognizes the fact that Mr. Wiggin was a director and an officer and would be caught under the language of the bill even if my amendment were adopted, because he was not acting as a stockholder alone, but was acting as a director or an officer.

Mr. LEA of California. That would be true as to the man who was acting as a director.

If we pass this bill without such a provision, leaving it the duty to disclose stock transfers only as to the director, we give the opportunity for a beneficial stockholder who dominates the directorate to accomplish his purpose without being a director. So part of the object of this provision is to prevent that method of evading a revelation of the facts by a dominating stockholder.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, to speak briefly in favor of the amendment. I may be wrong, but I understand the original section in the bill is known as the "anti-Wiggin proviso", and the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. PETTENGILL] does not affect that at all, because Mr. Wiggin was a director of a company, and it is evident from the newspaper report, at least—and that is as far as I know about his transactions—that he sold short both his company stocks and Chase National Bank stock. As a director he would be required to disclose the amount of his sales to the Federal Trade Commission within 30 days under the provisions of this bill, and the amendment proposed does not change the status of directors or officers of a company. Under the terms of the bill an officer or a director, if he owned 5 percent of a company, would have to state when he sold short and the amount sold. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana, who is trying to protect the smaller companies and individuals, is sound and helpful, because any company on any national exchange—it does not mean necessarily the Stock Exchange of New York but it means any national exchange, any small group that is recognized can constitute a national exchange, and therefore it may apply to a small company with a small capitalization of $100,000, where one man owns 5 percent. It would certainly interfere with the business of small companies and would be an injustice to individuals. I do not think that is what you want to do at all in this bill. I think you are trying to protect the public interest. The public interest would be better protected by the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana, which protects the rights of individuals and small companies.

I have not studied this part of the bill, but it is obvious to me from listening to the gentleman's argument that his contentions are sound, and they are in the interest of the small man and the small company. I believe that is the last kind of business anyone in this House wants to hurt. We are still trying to pump credit into those small companies. If you want to help them, you should vote for the amendment.

Mr. PETTENGILL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I yield.

Mr. PETTENGILL. The gentleman will agree that there is great danger of injuring 95 percent of the innocent stockholders of a company because one man holding 5 percent, by reason of personal necessity, may find it necessary to sell that stock?

Mr. FISH. Exactly. I want to make it clear that in favoring this amendment I am entirely in sympathy with that part of the bill that makes a director, or an official such as Mr. Wiggin, show when he sells short and the amount of stock sold, because although I come from New York, I am not taking this floor to defend Albert Wiggin, as I believe he and those like him, in selling short and in mulcting the public and deceiving the members of his own bank and his own stockholders, has done more to create communism in America than all the reds combined. [Applause.]

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, I think there is a chance for an honest difference of opinion as to whether this provision should remain in the section or not, but Members of the House should understand the purpose of it and the theory of it before voting for the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. PETTENGILL] to strike it out.

It seems to me that it is very easy to overestimate the inconvenience or embarrassment that anyone may suffer in connection with this provision if it should remain in the bill. In the first place, it only applies to companies whose stocks are registered upon some national securities exchange. It seems to me that would eliminate the small companies for which the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH] has been so earnestly pleading.

Mr. BOLTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAPES. I yield.

Mr. BOLTON. A national exchange means a stock exchange anywhere in the country of whatever size, whether it is New York or anywhere else.

Mr. MAPES. Well, it must be licensed by the Federal Trade Commission, and of course it must be doing a very substantial business.

Mr. HOLLISTER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAPES. I yield.

Mr. HOLLISTER. Can it operate unless it is licensed?

Mr. MAPES. No.

Mr. HOLLISTER. Then it covers any exchange that operates?

Mr. MAPES. It cannot operate as a national-securities exchange unless it is licensed or exempted by the Commission. The law expressly provides that if an exchange is not doing enough business to justify licensing it as a national exchange, the Commission can exempt it from the provisions of this act.

Mr. FISH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAPES. I yield.

Mr. FISH. Does that not include the Curb in New York, too?

Mr. MAPES. Yes; I think there is no question about that.

Now, Mr. Chairman, it is recognized that a great many large stockholders of corporations who are not officers or managers dictate the policies of the corporation and have all the information that any officer or anyone connected with the management has, and if you strike out this provision you will give the controlling interest in many cases an opportunity to take advantage of the secret and private information known ordinarily to the management only to speculate in the stocks of the company which it controls, the very thing that this provision attempts to prevent in the case of officers and directors. I think the House ought to understand very clearly what it is doing before it votes to strike this out of the bill.

Mr. Chairman, we get unduly excited, I think, about the information which this would require. In your town and my town at the beginning of every year the newspapers print a list of the stockholders and the number of shares which each stockholder owns in the national banks of the country. It is public information. Everybody knows it. It does not disturb the stability of the banks. Nobody will be disturbed here. This is not to prevent anybody from making an investment in corporations. If anybody is making real investments, as investments, he will not have any objection to making a report; and if he is buying and selling in the market simply to speculate in the companies in which he is an officer or which he controls, then he should be required to make the report which this provision requires.

Mr. BRITTEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAPES. I yield.

Mr. BRITTEN. The gentleman is in error when he says that the names of the stockholders and the amount of stock held by the stockholders in these corporations is made public once a year. That does not prevail at all, and, as far as I know, in Chicago it has never prevailed.

Mr. MAPES. Well, I do not know how it is in Chicago; but at the beginning of every year the newspapers in Grand Rapids, Mich., carry a list of the stockholders, together with the number of shares that they own in the banks of the city. No one gets disturbed about it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MAPES] has expired.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, I dislike very much to disagree with the gentleman from Indiana, my friend, who has been so helpful in the preparation of this bill.

A while ago we passed a provision relating to manipulation, one of the finest in the bill. In my opinion, we are now considering another very important antimanipulative section.

The committee's investigation of utilities and other corporations revealed very few directors or officers owned a half, a quarter, or even a tenth of the stock of any of these great corporations. We do know, however, that in the case of any corporation having widely scattered stockholders the concentration of 5 or 10 or 20 or 30 percent of stock ownership is control; they can always get the proxies.

Speaking with reference to the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana to hold the officer or director of a company liable, the officer or director in many instances may not own even one half of 1 percent of the stock of the company in which he is a director. It will be found, I think, that the committee's investigation of the railroads, of power and gas companies, of telegraph and telephone companies, disclosed that rarely does an officer or director in any of these companies appear in the list of the 30 largest stockholders of the company—very rarely; but he is held, and he should be, as the gentleman from Indiana says, because he occupies a fiduciary position. Here is a man, however, who says: "I do not want to be an officer or a director for the reason that if I accept such office I am held under this provision. I can, however, be the largest stockholder in the company and by proxy and otherwise dominate the officers, the directors, and the policies of the company, and get all of the inside information, even though I am not an officer or a director. I will not, therefore, allow myself to be elected an officer; I will not allow myself to be elected a director; but I will stay on the outside, I will control the company, I will manipulate its stock up and down. When it is the proper time to run the market up in my interest I will run it up; when it is to my interest to run the market down I will have the power to run it down."

He can do all this, and his fellow stockholders throughout the length and breadth of the country will suffer as a result of this man using information never divulged to the public, using it to enrich himself and to impoverish other shareholders.

Mr. Chairman, I think it would be most unfortunate to let out the man who in the last analysis, in my opinion, really controls the corporation.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. BYRNS). The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. PETTENGILL) there were—ayes 42, noes 46.

Mr. PETTENGILL. Mr. Chairman, I ask for tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and the Chair appointed as tellers Mr. PETTENGILL and Mr. RAYBURN.

The Committee again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 51, noes 72.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. Goss: Page 38, after line 11, insert a new subsection, as follows:

"(c) The provisions of this section shall not apply if the registration of the equity security has been been secured without the consent of the issuer thereof."

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, so far as the members of the committee whom I have consulted are concerned, there is no objection to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Connecticut.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

LIABILITY FOR MISLEADING STATEMENTS

SEC. 17. (a) Any person (including any director or officer, or accountant or other expert) who shall make or cause to be made any statement in any application, report, or document filed pursuant to this act or any rule or regulation thereunder, which statement was false or misleading with respect to any material fact, shall be liable to any person (not knowing that such statement was false or misleading) who, in reliance upon such statement, shall have purchased or sold a security at a price which was affected by such statement, for damages caused by such reliance, unless the person sued shall prove that he acted in good faith and did not believe that such statement was false or misleading. A person seeking to enforce such liability may sue at law or in equity in any court of competent jurisdiction.

(b) Every person who becomes liable to make payment under this section may recover contribution as in cases of contract from any person who, if joined in the original suit, would have been liable to make the same payment.

(c) No action shall be maintained to enforce any liability created under this section unless brought within 3 years after the violation upon which it is based.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Texas yield for a question?

Mr. RAYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. BRITTEN. Did I understand the gentleman just now to make the statement that the Committee would rise in 15 minutes?

Mr. RAYBURN. I think so.

Mr. BRITTEN. Could not the Committee rise before that?

Mr. RAYBURN. I may say to the gentleman from Illinois there is a strong desire on the part of many Members to get away by 4 o'clock tomorrow, and we want to accommodate them if possible.

Mr. BULWINKLE. May I suggest to the gentleman from Texas that we meet tomorrow at 11 o'clock?

Mr. RAYBURN. It would be satisfactory to me to meet at 11 o'clock.

Mr. HOLLISTER. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HOLLISTER: On page 40, line 1, after the word "fact", insert the following: "and was known to such person to be false or misleading at the time of making such statement."

And in line 6, beginning with the word "unless" strike out the remainder of the sentence.

Mr. HOLLISTER. Mr. Chairman, I cannot feel that this Committee or the Members of the House wish to insert a provision in the bill which casts the burden of proof upon the person sued for damages on the ground of having made a false or misleading statement in a document, report, or whatever it may have been. I cannot believe that in a country where the policy has been to lean backwards in giving the benefit of the doubt to the accused, this great Committee of the House has knowingly tried to insert in this bill a provision shifting the burden of proof to the defendant to prove his innocence.

If the Members will kindly read the section carefully as it now stands, I will show you what my amendment does. The way the section reads at the present time, anyone who claims to have suffered damage because of the fact that a false or misleading statement was made, may sue the person who was responsible or one of those who was responsible for the making of the statement and recover the damages which may have resulted because of the false or misleading statement. The burden of proof is cast upon the person sued to prove that he did not believe such statement was false or misleading.

All of you know the times through which we have passed and how in the excitement of the moment it would be difficult for a defendant under such circumstances to establish his innocence. We know perfectly well that innocent party after innocent party, many a man who had a little wealth, or who had a prominent position in the community, would be compelled without doubt at a jury trial to pay damages to some person who claimed to have lost something as a result of a misleading statement. The mere declaration that the person who made the report or the statement did not know it was false or misleading would mean the word of one man against the other man, and the burden of proof would be cast upon the defendant.

I sincerely hope that the committee will accept this amendment. All I am asking is that the ordinary processes of American justice be followed, and that the individual who made these statements shall be held responsible only in the event that after proper and fair trial it is shown that he knew the statement which was made was false or misleading. In no other way should it be proper to have damages brought in against a defendant. No man should be subjected to the processes of law without the right to a defense of that kind. I hope the committee will accept the amendment.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I do not think any member of the committee will accept the amendment. We have been passing laws here which went a great deal further than this. We say here that if you make a false or misleading statement in reference to any material fact you shall be liable to any person who relies upon that statement. A man has to prove not only that the statement was false and misleading but that he relied on the statement. He cannot recover damages unless he does prove that, and if the man making the false or misleading statement, if it is a misleading statement, can prove that he acted in good faith and did not believe that the statement was false or misleading, damages will not lie against him.

If there is going to be any liability at all in this bill for false or misleading statements by which one man has gotten someone else's money, it appears to me, and the committee feels, that we have gone as far as we can to have anything in here that would protect a man who buys a security on a statement which is false and misleading.

Mr. HOLLISTER. Does the gentleman believe that it is the fair thing to make a person an insurer under such circumstances?

Mr. RAYBURN. As far as this goes; yes. A man who sells something under a false or misleading statement gets someone's money. He could not be damaged unless he got it.

Mr. HOLLISTER. This does not refer to a sale alone. It refers to a statement made in any application, document, or report.

Mr. RAYBURN. But nobody would sue him unless he was damaged.

Mr. HOLLISTER. Does the gentleman believe that whenever a man is damaged he has a right to sue somebody for damages, no matter how responsible the person sued may be for the injury?

Mr. RAYBURN. If they are responsible for the damage by false and misleading statements; yes.

Mr. HOLLISTER. Even if the statements are innocently made?

Mr. RAYBURN. If the statements are made in good faith, he is not responsible.

Mr. HOLLISTER. It casts the burden of proof upon the defendant.

Mr. RAYBURN. The burden of proof should be upon the defendant.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Is not the fallacy of the argument of the gentleman from Ohio the fact that we are talking about a civil action here? When you reach the point that a statement is false or misleading in fact that constitutes a prima facie showing, and the burden then shifts to the person accused of making the statement, which is misleading in fact or false in fact, to disprove.

Mr. HOLLISTER. The burden does not shift under any such principle of law.

Mr. O'CONNOR. If it is misleading or false in fact it makes a prima facie case.

Mr. HOLLISTER. Under what law?

Mr. O'CONNOR. Under the ordinary civil law.

Mr. HOLLISTER. A false or misleading statement does not make a prima facie case. What you are trying to do under these circumstances is cast the burden of proof completely the other way.

Mr. O'CONNOR. No.

Mr. HOLLISTER. It is a denial of justice that I do not believe this House is going to stand for.

Mr. RAYBURN. We passed laws that went a great deal further than this.

Mr. HOLLISTER. What are those laws?

Mr. RAYBURN. The Securities Act of last year and its liability provisions go a great deal further.

May I say that we have talked here a great deal about the members of the stock exchange and the fact we should not treat them unjustly. I do not want to do that. We talk about the issuer and all this, that, and the other thing, but it seems to me that a great many of us forget there is such a thing as an investing public in this country which should have some protection, and when we ask that the investor have protection against false and misleading statements with reference to a material fact and that the man knew of the statement and relied upon the statement as being not false and not misleading and invested his money, it does appear to me that the man ought to have some protection.

Mr. HOLLISTER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAYBURN. I yield.

Mr. HOLLISTER. The gentleman keeps referring to the issuer or the seller. This is a general clause and covers anybody making any kind of statement in any kind of document or in any kind of paper that is filed. It includes accountants, lawyers, or any other expert.

Mr. RAYBURN. No.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. MILLARD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may proceed for 5 additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. RAYBURN. I want to read this part of the section to the gentleman:

Who, in reliance upon the statement, shall have purchased or sold a security.

Mr. HOLLISTER. Yes; that is the man who is going to sue. I am talking about the report that is made. This refers to any statement that is made in any report under this bill, if it contains a misleading statement.

Mr. RAYBURN. If upon that report somebody bought or sold a security and lost money relying upon the statement that was false.

Mr. HOLLISTER. Exactly, and it may have been a lawyer or an accountant or any other expert hired for the occasion. We make such a man practically an insurer, no matter how honest he may have been, if the statement is misleading. If he cannot sustain the burden of proof he is going to be held liable.

Mr. RAYBURN. Exactly, because he got the other man's money.

Mr. HOLLISTER. And the gentleman considers that American justice?

Mr. RAYBURN. I certainly do.

Mr. MILLIGAN. If the gentleman will yield, that is the common law.

Mr. HOLLISTER. It is not the common law in any State of the Union, never has been and never will be, I hope.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado). The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HOLLISTER].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the bill (H.R. 9323) to provide for the regulation of securities exchanges and of over-the-counter markets operating in interstate and foreign commerce and through the mails, to prevent inequitable and unfair practices on such exchanges and markets, and for other purposes, had come to no resolution thereon.

PHILIPPINE INDEPENDENCE

Mr. McDUFFIE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks and to include therein a cablegram from Governor Murphy, of the Philippine Islands, to the Secretary of War.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama?

There was no objection.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks by inserting in the RECORD a cablegram addressed to the Secretary of War by the Governor General of the Philippine Islands, it is with pleasure that I submit the message of Governor Murphy, which sets forth the concurrent resolution passed unanimously in a joint session of the Philippine Legislature on May 1, 1934.

The passage of this resolution undoubtedly indicates the good faith of the Filipino people in laying the foundation for a free and independent nation. These people have progressed in a way that surpasses all other nations in the Orient within the past 30 years. The spirit and economic conditions obtaining in the Philippine Islands today are a credit to both the American Government and the constructive leadership of the Philippine people. No colonization scheme in all the history of the world, especially insofar as the Orient is concerned, can compare with that of the United States in the Philippine Islands.

It has never been the intention of the American people since the day our flag was raised at Manila to hold the Filipino people against their will. From time to time the American Congress has given expression by its various acts to such an attitude on the part of our Government. We have promised that when the people of the islands attained a social and economic status qualifying them for self-government, we would make them a free and independent people. We took the first step in carrying out that promise by passing the Hare-Hawes-Cutting Act, which was later amended, and became Public Law 127 of the present Congress.

The legislature of the islands is to be congratulated. The passage of this resolution on May 1, I am sure, is thoroughly appreciated by the American people, and I am likewise sure an overwhelming majority of our people are looking with sympathetic interest in the future welfare of the Filipino people. I can but believe the injustice and burden of the tax on their second largest industry will be rectified in some way to the satisfaction of both countries. In all justice and fairness this great nation should keep its traditional faith with the Filipino people.

On behalf of the Committee on Insular Affairs of the House of Representatives I extend hearty felicitations to the members of the Legislature of the Philippine Islands and to the Filipino people, and bid them Godspeed in their onward march to independence.

The message from the Governor General to the Secretary of War follows:

MESSAGE RECEIVED BY THE SECRETARY OF WAR, HON. GEORGE H. DERN, FROM THE GOVERNOR GENERAL OF THE PHILIPPINE ISLANDS, QUOTING THE TEXT OF THE CONCURRENT RESOLUTION ADOPTED AT THE SPECIAL SESSION OF THE NINTH PHILIPPINE LEGISLATURE ACCEPTING THE ACT OF CONGRESS APPROVED MARCH 24, 1934 (PUBLIC, NO. 127, 73D CONG.), THE NEW PHILIPPINE INDEPENDENCE ACT

Signed copies of following concurrent resolution received today: Concurrent resolution accepting Public Act No. 127 of the Congress of the United States, commonly known as the "Tydings-McDuffie Act", and expressing the gratitude of the Philippine Legislature and the Filipino people to the President and Congress of the United States and the American people.

Whereas the Seventy-third Congress of the United States of America has enacted Public Act No. 127, entitled "An act to provide for the complete independence of the Philippine Islands, to provide for the adoption of a constitution and a form of government for the Philippine Islands, and for other purposes", and commonly known as the "Tydings-McDuffie law";

Whereas section 17 of the aforesaid act requires the acceptance thereof by concurrent resolution of the Philippine Legislature or by a convention called for the purpose of passing upon that law before the same shall take effect;

Whereas although the Philippine Legislature believes that certain provisions of said act need further consideration, the said legislature deems it its duty to accept the proffer of independence thus made by the Government of the United States;

(A) Because the Filipino people cannot, consistent with their national dignity and love of freedom, decline to accept the independence that the said act grants;

(B) And because the President of the United States in his message to Congress on March 2, 1934, recommending the enactment of said law, stated: "I do not believe that other provisions of the original law need be changed at this time. Where imperfections or inequalities exist, I am confident that they can be corrected after proper hearing and in fairness to both peoples." A statement which gives to the Filipino people reasonable assurances of further hearing and due consideration of their views: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the senate (the House of Representatives of the Philippines concurring), That Public Act No. 127 of the Seventy-third Congress of the United States, entitled "An act to provide for the complete independence of the Philippine Islands, to provide for the adoption of a constitution and a form of government for the Philippine Islands, and for other purposes", commonly known as the "Tydings-McDuffie law", be, and is hereby, accepted by the Philippine Legislature in accordance with the provisions of section 17 thereof;

Resolved further, That the Philippine Legislature, in its own behalf and in behalf of the Filipino people, express, and does hereby express, its appreciation and everlasting gratitude to the President and the Congress of the United States and the American people.

Adopted May 1, 1934. Manuel L. Quezon, president of the senate. Quintin Paredes, speaker of the house of representatives.

We hereby certify that the foregoing concurrent resolution was adopted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the Philippines in joint session on May 1, 1934. Fermin Torralalba, secretary of the senate; Julian La O, acting secretary of the house of representatives.

WAR DEPARTMENT, May 2, 1934.

THE SUGAR INDUSTRY

Mr. MONTET. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MONTET. Mr. Speaker, the remarks of the gentleman from the Philippine Islands [Mr. GUEVARA] appearing in yesterday's RECORD indicate that while the Filipino sugar producers sought to take undue advantage of the American market pending the preparation and consideration of the sugar bill, they now have the audacity to plead for further consideration in the administration of the sugar program looking to the stabilization of this industry.

The Filipino sugar producers never favored the program in question. Their protests against it were heard throughout the country. They stamped this effort to help our American sugar-beet and cane growers as unpatriotic. In spite of the fact that Congress has written into the law that the marketing year shall begin January 1, 1934, they are still appealing that through administrative edict this date be changed to July 1, 1934. In spite of the low market price for sugar, by reason of their low production cost these producers have managed to show an operating profit anywhere from 10 to 30 percent on each unit of operation during this depression. By reason of their low production cost they have been able to monopolize the market and now request the further unrestrained privilege to continue in this debacle at the expense of our continental sugar producers.

I desire to submit some facts which conclusively show that, while the Filipino sugar producers were appealing to the patriotism of this country, at the same time they were attempting to take undue advantage of the delays necessary for the consideration of this legislation, and that by reason of their unfair methods and practices caused the sugar market to decline to a level absolutely out of proportion to the price of other commodities. While they were reminding us of solemn obligations to them in the hope of defeating or delaying the legislation, they were abnormally exporting sugar to this country, depressing the market, and at the same time expecting to "beat the wire" before the legislation would become law. However, because the marketing year begins January 1, 1934, for the administration of the act, this effort to take undue advantage of the situation has amounted to naught.

In 1931 the Philippine Islands exported to this country 679,968 tons of sugar. In 1932, 869,369 tons. In 1933 this increased to 1,035,738 tons, and according to the Weekly Statistical Sugar Trade Journal, published by Willet & Gray, of date April 26, 1934, our sugar importations from these islands during the first 3½ months of this year, amounted to 860,000 tons, thus flooding the market of this country with sugar in an amount almost equal to the entire 1933 importations from those islands, and at a time of the year when they, as well as anyone else, know there is less demand for sugar than during any other 3½ months of any year. In view of the sugar legislation and the sugar proposal which had been pending for many months, these figures bespeak the purposes behind these abnormal importations of sugar into this country. The London market established the world price for sugar. During this time when the Filipinos have been abnormally exporting sugar into this country, they forced our markets to a level 20 points below the world market. This not only represents a loss to our sugar producers but is as well an irretrievable loss to the Filipinos. Sugar is already the cheapest food article obtainable. While sugar has been selling at 2.70 in this country, it is a well-known fact that if sugar prices were on a level with that of other agricultural commodities, this price would now be 3.10, but to have it further depressed by the Filipinos in the fashion and for the purposes they have and at the expense of our sugar-beet and cane growers is only adding insult to injury. It must be obvious to all that while the Filipino sugar producers were stirring American patriotism on the continent, they were at the same time unethically attempting to defeat the purposes of this legislation in the hope that Congress would not take cognizance of their methods, thus permitting them to wreck the sugar market as they have during the last few months and at the same time expecting that in the allocation of their quota, this keen but defeated purpose would not be taken into consideration. I am happy to state, however, that under the sugar bill, these unscrupulous methods have met with substantial defeat, because the marketing year for which quotas are to be established is to begin January 1, 1934.

These large importations of sugar, coming from one source and at a time which reflects the lowest consuming months of the year, had the very detrimental effect of depressing the market to such an extent as to seriously impair the selling of sugars by domestic producers, to say nothing of what it has done to the Cubans and Hawaiians through the depressed market for granulated sugar. Such high-handed methods in trying to defeat the stabilization of the sugar industry by placing this product on the market in an irregular and disorganized manner are reprehensible indeed.

No sugar-producing area has prospered as much under the present sugar tariff as has the Philippine Islands. They have doubled their production since 1931, and their importations into this country have almost doubled. They have always sold their sugars on our market at a price below the world market. This they have done for many years. We have always manifested a helpful attitude toward the Philippine Islands, and I feel that this country should know of their sugar producers' last efforts to take advantage of the situation pending the formation and passage of the sugar bill. These people always raise the American flag, but on the other hand they have shown little respect for the rights of those of us who live on the continent and under this flag. In my opinion, their methods of continually wrecking the American sugar market, and particularly their last efforts in trying to "beat the wire" under the sugar bill, deserve universal condemnation. It is obvious to me that they have shown little or no appreciation of our many manifestations of interest and friendship toward them. Now that in the first 3½ months of this year they have practically exhausted what they can reasonably expect as their quota under the sugar bill, in all probability they will again appeal to American patriotism and clamor that they are not being fairly dealt with under the legislation in question. The facts disclose that the American people should pay little heed to these appeals, as they spring from a Filipino industry which by its conduct has demonstrated that it has little respect for the purposes of Congress, and which obviously believes that in all things the ends always justify the means.

In spite of the fact that the marketing year of 1934 has been designated in the act as beginning January 1, 1934, it is obviously the intention of the Filipino sugar producers to appeal to the Secretary of Agriculture to make the marketing year begin on July 1 next, so that whatever sugar these producers have brought in during the first 3½ months will have been just that much advantage which they will have had over all other producers, including our own American farmers. Even now, if we may judge by the past, it is to be expected that these producers of Philippine sugar will seek to have some special treatment or exemptions in their favor because they will have large amounts of sugar on hand over and above their quota allotment for 1934. I personally have every confidence in the judgment and fairness of our Secretary of Agriculture, and I know that his fairness will not permit him to listen to the appeals of those who have not only depressed the market price for sugar more than 20 points under the world market but who sought to take advantage of a situation, to the detriment and harm of our own American producers and farmers.

These comments are not leveled at the Filipino people as a whole. My active participation in their fight for freedom is well known to all. I do feel, however, that, in justice to our own sugar producers, the people of this country are entitled to the facts with respect to the unfair methods of the Philippine sugar producers.

PRESENT-DAY GOVERNMENT

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks by including therein a radio address delivered over Station WOL last evening.

Mr. SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD I include the following address made by me yesterday evening over Station WOL in Washington, D.C.:

Just prior to and since the election of President Franklin D. Roosevelt in 1932 this country has been educated to a new phase in government, "brain trust advisers", and through them the "new deal" has introduced a national political economic planning scheme which seems to have permeated all branches of Government.

The original "brain trust" was composed of Prof. Raymond Moley, Prof. Rexford Tugwell, and Justice Brandeis' contribution, A. A. Berle, Jr., and Bernard M. Baruch's contribution, Gen. Hugh S. Johnson. To these must be added Prof. George F. Warren and Prof. James Harvey Rogers, the gold-specialist twins, and other Justice Louis D. Brandeis' confreres, Prof. Felix Frankfurter, James M. Landis, Jerome Frank, and another Bernard M. Baruch contribution, Donald Richberg, Frederic C. Howe, Harry L. Hopkins, Clarence Darrow, Mordecai Ezekiel, Harold Ickes, and one must not omit Secretary of Agriculture Henry A. Wallace, nor the other Cabinet member, Henry Morgenthau, Jr., nor should we omit Henry Morgenthau, Sr., who is a sort of superadviser for his illustrious son.

These men are now or have been actively engaged in the various phases of the political-economic plan called the "new deal."

The country has recently been treated to the spectacle of the present administration's attempt to ridicule the idea that there is a definite new plan of government in process. Without attempting to comment in any manner whatever on the attempt to disarm the public, I desire now to refer briefly to a plan that was advocated as far back as 1918 when A. A. Berle had some very definite ideas regarding the establishing of a new state. Indeed, he wrote a little book on "The Significance of a Jewish State", dedicated to his friend, Louis D. Brandeis. In it he regarded the Jew as "the barometer of civilization at all times." He recognized the inability of Christianity to avert war or "to do a single thing toward mitigating its worst effects", and seemed to think the Jews were the only power that could do anything about it.

He believed "A Jewish state would be a 'Hague' which could, and which would, command the attention and govern the thought of the world."

He did not wait for the public recognition of the "brain trust" to start a campaign for social regeneration. In 1918 he said: "There have been many of us who for many years have seen in the Hebrew laws the elements of the social regeneration of the world. * * * It would have commanded interest to the entire world to see a state, albeit a small one, work these problems through, and especially a state which could, and which would, call to its aid the finest body, collectively, of intellectual force and discrimination which the world knows. * * * A rationalized Hebrew state, founded on Hebrew fundamental laws—ethical, social, sanitary, dietary, and all the rest—would be a working laboratory of social regeneration which would excite breathless attention. * * *"

In this state he advocated: "Concessions to intending builders could be made on the national plan and automatically agreeing with the national interest and the public welfare. The industrial expansion, therefore, could be without those weary steps toward freedom, which all other industrial civilizations have to undergo. Almost from the beginning land and industries, public resources, mineral and otherwise, could be nationally administered, and all this would make a most novel and striking page in statecraft. * * *"

An attempt to establish a political economic plan is now in operation under the leadership of a group, formerly connected with the Fabian Society in England. This, until the present, secret political-economic plan was drawn up by Israel Moses Seiff, an Israelite, the director of a chain-store enterprise in England, called "Marks & Spencer", which house handles almost exclusively imports from Soviet Russia, which enables them to undersell its competitors. Prominent members of this organization in England, besides Seiff, are Ramsay Macdonald; his son, Malcolm Macdonald; Sir George May; Kenneth Lindsey; Gerald Barry; I. Nicholson; Sir Henry Bunbary; Graeme Haldane; I. Hodges; Lady Reading; Daniel Neal; Sir Basil P. Blackett; Sir Arthur Salter; Sir Oswald Mosley; Sir George Allan Powell; Sir Sydney Chapman; Lord Eustace Percy; Ronald Davison; Lord Melchett; Sir Christopher Ternor; Mrs. Leonard Elmhirst, formerly Dorothy Willard Straight nee Whitney, of New York.

This political-economic plan organization, now secretly operating in England, is designated "Freedom and Planning", and is divided into many well-organized and well-financed departments, such as Town and Country Planning, Industry, International Relations, Transportation, Banking, Social Services, Civil Division. It is already in operation in the British Government by means of the Tariff Advisory Board. It has gathered all data and statistics obtainable by governmental and private organizations in administrative, industrial, trade, social, educational, agricultural, and other circles. Through its Tariff Advisory Board it has control over industry and trade and works in direct connection with the British Treasury, and together they devise the British tariff policy. It has also been granted the power of a law court and can exact, under oath, that all information concerning industry and trade be given it. Iron and steel and cotton industrials have been ordered by the Tariff Advisory Board to prepare and submit plans for the reorganization of their industries, and have been warned that should they fail to do so a plan for complete reconstruction will be imposed upon them. This board has been granted default powers, and can, therefore, enforce its plans.

May I pause here to suggest the similarity of the "Freedom and planning" scheme of the political-economic group in England with the N.R.A., the Bankhead cotton bill, the control of farm acreage, and the other planned developments of the new deal under the direction of the "brain trust" and their cohorts?

Neither you are nor I am particularly interested in what takes place in England, but what should interest us Americans, it seems to me, are the strong indications that point to the putting into operation definitely of this plan in the United States, with the necessary changes to adapt it to our conditions. This is made pertinent by the well-known fact that this particular English group has very close connections with the Foreign Policy Association of New York. This association was largely organized and fostered by Felix Frankfurter and the late Paul N. Warburg. In this group we must also place Henry A. Wallace, the present Secretary of Agriculture, for the reason that he has recently caused to be published under the auspices of the Foreign Policy Association a copyrighted article entitled "America Must Choose." This article is quite in keeping with the "Freedom and Planning" group in England.

There is no doubt, I think, that Professors Frankfurter, Moley, Tugwell, Berle, Jr., and the mysterious Mordecai Ezekiel are all members of this particular group who are carrying out a world plan.

That this political-economic group practically controls the British Government is indicated by the fact that Prime Minister Macdonald and his son and J. H. Thomas and other influential Britishers are officers of the group.

An interesting sidelight is that some 6 months ago when the father of this plan, Israel Moses Sieff, was urged to show more activity by the members of his committee, his answer was "Let us go slowly for a while and wait until we see how our plan carries out in America." That statement indicates that a plan similar to theirs is being tried in America.

When we consider Professor Tugwell's announced plans for control of all land in the United States and the production therefrom, and when we consider the plans of Professor Berle, Jr., for the railroads and finances of this country, and when we consider the Mordecai Ezekiel-Tugwell-Bankhead cotton control bill and the Wallace hog, corn, and wheat control plans, and the Ickes control of mineral and petroleum industries, and General Johnson's N.R.A. control of industry, we must know that something is being tried out here. And, again, when we hear President Roosevelt say, as he did on April 25, 1934, that this is "evolution not revolution", in his address at the opening of a subsistence homestead exhibit, at which time, according to press reports, he made an appeal for the recognition of the importance of long-range national planning as a step toward permanent improvement of the economic and social structure of the Nation, and he stated that the administration was going ahead with its experiments, can we say that this is mere experimentation? Further the President said, "If we look at this thing from the broad national viewpoint, we are going to make it a national policy if it takes 50 years." Again he said, "The time is now ripe, overripe, for planning to prevent in the future the errors of the past and to carry out social and economic views new to the Nation." Also, yesterday, President Roosevelt announced the formation of a "plan committee on national land problems", with the apparent purpose of coordinating and stimulating the Federal program for retiring submarginal land—the Tugwell plan—which he designated as one of the main divisions of national long-range planning. The avowed purpose of the committee, according to the White House announcement, will be to improve "practices of land utilization" and achieve "better balancing of agricultural production, aiding in the solution of human problems in land use and developing of a national land program."

In view of all these things, can we say that this is mere experimentation? Or shall we say that which it is? It is assuredly "Freedom and Planning", adapted to the United States. Stripped of all its camouflage, it is the guild form of government and is the kind of government that has recently been established in Italy and Austria and which will be established in England if this particular group under the leadership of Israel Moses Sieff succeed in their plans. The guild form of government is directly the opposite of the constitutional form of government. It is the Jewish plan of a World State.

Mr. PETTENGILL. Mr. Speaker, I desire to submit a parliamentary inquiry to the Chair.

In the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, when remarks that purport to be remarks of a Member of the House are included as an extension of remarks, is it to be assumed that the remarks were not made on the floor of the House?

The SPEAKER. They may have been withheld for revision. The Chair would have no knowledge about how the remarks were made.

Mr. PETTENGILL. The reason I ask this question is because I have noticed two or three times lately, and I am not going to refer to any Member of the House by name, that in extensions of remarks the words "laughter and applause" or "applause" have been sprinkled in the remarks, and I have wondered if it is correct for the Public Printer to insert any such language as that with respect to "applause" that did not occur on the floor of the House.

Mr. SNELL. I saw one a short time ago that had that in six different places.

The SPEAKER. The reporters can insert such words where it actually occurred on the floor.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. BROWN of Michigan, for Friday and Saturday, on account of official business in Michigan.

To Mr. SWEENEY, for 10 days, on account of illness.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, the Chairman of the Judiciary Committee has reported the following bills, which are popularly known as the "crime bills." They are H.R. 9370, S. 2460, H.R. 8912, S. 2080, S. 2249, S. 2845, S. 2252, S. 2841, S. 2253, S. 2575. So far as I can learn, there is no objection to any of these bills. They were presented and urged by the Department of Justice in the interest of the campaign being made against the kidnapers, racketeers, gangsters, and criminals of the country.

I ask unanimous consent that it may be in order for the Chairman of the Judiciary Committee to call up these bills for consideration under the general rules of the House. I think that will avoid loss of time rather than have to resort to a rule.

Mr. SNELL. Are they unanimous reports from the Judiciary Committee?

Mr. BYRNS. All unanimously reported, as I understand, by the Judiciary Committee. The Senate bills were unanimously passed by the Senate.

Mr. BLANTON. And all recommended by the Department of Justice?

Mr. BYRNS. Yes; and they urge that they be passed as quickly as possible.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

There was no objection.

DEATH OF WILLIAM H. WOODIN

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, I am sure that we have all learned with very profound sorrow of the death of one of America's most distinguished and beloved sons, former Secretary of the Treasury William H. Woodin. I feel a deep personal loss in the passing of the man whose abilities I had occasion to admire and whose fine character was a true inspiration to all who knew him. He was a man of wide accomplishments, and his gracious manner brought him an even wider personal friendship. Industrialist, banker, and artist, he crowned his great career as Secretary of the Treasury during our greatest financial crisis. The energy and aptitude and untiring devotion which he brought to his huge task in the face of failing health was heroic and undoubtedly hastened his death. It can truly be said of him that he gave his life to his country, but not until after he had rendered inestimable public and patriotic service and created a multitude of friends who mourn their loss.

DISPOSITION OF USELESS PAPERS

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a letter from the Comptroller General of the United States, reporting, pursuant to law, relative to papers and documents on the files of the General Accounting Office which are not needed in the transaction of public business and have no permanent value or historical interest, and asking for action looking toward their disposition, which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to a Joint Select Committee on the Disposition of Useless Papers in the Executive Departments.

APPOINTMENTS ON BOARD OF INDUSTRIAL ALCOHOL AND IN INTERNAL REVENUE BUREAU

Mr. McKELLAR introduced a joint resolution (S.J.Res. 113) providing that further appointments in the Bureau of Industrial Alcohol and certain appointments in the Internal Revenue Bureau shall be made from an eligible list hereafter established, which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Civil Service, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Whereas in 1926, 1927, and 1928 prohibition agents were employed by the Government with the requirement that they should take and pass character tests, and some 2,600, practically all belonging to one political party, were appointed as prohibition agents; and

Whereas in 1928 the Bureau of Industrial Alcohol Inspectors were required to take and pass similar tests and to have 2 years in pharmacy as a prerequisite; and

Whereas on August 9, 1933, prohibition agents were dropped and time was extended to January 30, 1934, to qualify with civil-service status, and after that these men could only be appointed with the President's approval; and

Whereas recently the Bureau of Industrial Alcohol has appointed many of the old prohibition agents and appointed them inspectors and even promoted them to better places; and

Whereas there was no real civil-service examination; and

Whereas it is believed that the Bureau of Industrial Alcohol is about to appoint 1,236 more agents who have never really taken a civil-service examination, except in the ways above stated; and

Whereas it is believed that practically all, with the possible exception of 47, belong to one political party; and

Whereas the appointment to places in the Bureau of Industrial Alcohol of persons from the list made up from character tests is not consonant with the civil-service laws and is contrary to the spirit and intent of the laws: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, Before any further appointments are made in the Bureau of Industrial Alcohol or in the Bureau of Internal Revenue having to do with alcohol a civil-service examination shall be held by the Civil Service Commission for the specific purpose of securing eligibles for service in the Bureau of Industrial Alcohol, or in the Bureau of Internal Revenue having to do with alcohol, and that appointments to such service be made only from the list of eligibles to be hereafter secured by such civil-service examination; and

Resolved further, That appointments already made by or in the Bureau of Industrial Alcohol since March 10, 1934, be, and they are hereby, annulled, and all appointments shall be made from such civil-service eligible list to be established after the examination herein provided for, and such sums as may be necessary for the Civil Service Commission to hold such civil-service examinations are hereby authorized to be appropriated.

REGULATION OF SECURITIES EXCHANGES—AMENDMENTS

Mr. FLETCHER submitted three amendments intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 3420) to provide for the regulation of securities exchanges and of over-the-counter markets operating in interstate and foreign commerce and through the mails, to prevent inequitable and unfair practices on such exchanges and markets, and for other purposes, which were ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I ask unanimous consent to offer an amendment to a pending bill. I ask, first, that the amendment intended to be proposed by me be printed in full in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, and thereafter that it be printed and lie upon the table. The amendment is to become part II of Senate bill 3420. Senate bill 3420 is the bill to provide for the regulation of securities exchanges and of over-the-counter markets operating in interstate and foreign commerce and through the mails, to prevent inequitable and unfair practices on such exchanges and markets, and for other purposes.

My amendment, as submitted, proposes to amend and repeal certain portions of the Securities Act of 1933, the purpose being so to amend the act that it will be possible for securities of the proper kind to be issued and sold.

The amendment intended to be proposed by Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma to Senate bill 3420 was ordered to be printed, to be printed in the RECORD, and to lie on the table, as follows:

On page 57, after line 9, to insert the following:

"PART II. AMENDMENT OF SECURITIES ACT OF 1933

"SEC. 2. Such act is amended by inserting after section 10 two new sections, as follows:

"'SEC. 11. "'SEC. 12. Except as provided in sections 20 and 24, the common law shall apply to any violation of the provisions of this act.'

"SEC. 3. Section 17 of such act is renumbered as section 13, and is amended by striking out, where they appear in subsection (a) (2), the following words: 'or any omission to state a material fact necessary in order to make the statements made, in the light of the circumstances under which they were made, not misleading'; and such section is further amended by striking out subsection (b) and by relettering subsection (c) as subsection (b).

"SEC. 4. Sections 18, 19, 20, 21, 22, and 23 of such act are hereby renumbered as sections 14, 15, 16, 17, 18, and 19, respectively.

"SEC. 5. Section 3 (a), first sentence, and paragraph (1) of said act be amended to read as follows:

"'SEC. 3. (a) Except as hereinafter expressly provided, the provisions of this act shall not apply to any of the following classes of securities:

"'(1) Any security which, prior to July 26, 1933, has been sold or disposed of by the issuer or bona fide offered to the public.'

"SEC. 6. Section 24 of such act is hereby renumbered as section 20, and is amended by inserting immediately before the word 'omits' the word 'willfully.'

"SEC. 7. Sections 25 and 26 of such act are hereby renumbered as sections 21 and 22."

CODES FOR LUMBER AND TIMBER PRODUCTS INDUSTRY

Mr. CLARK. I ask unanimous consent that the resolution which I send to the desk may be read for the information of the Senate and may be printed and lie on the table, under the rule.

The resolution (S.Res. 230) was read and ordered to lie on the table, as follows:

Resolved, That the Federal Trade Commission is hereby directed to make an investigation and study of the code of fair competition for the lumber and timber products industry and the code of fair competition for the retail lumber trade, and report the result thereof to the Senate as soon as practicable, showing the practice of the lumber industries under such codes with reference to price fixing, the increase in price of lumber products, and such other matters as would give a full presentation of facts touching the industries since they began operations under such codes, respectively.

FINANCING OF MAYFLOWER HOTEL CORPORATIONS IN THE DISTRICT

Mr. GIBSON submitted the following resolution (S.Res. 231), which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia:

Whereas it is reported—

1. That the Mayflower Hotel Co. and the Mayflower Hotels Corporation of America were incorporated in or about 1922 to construct and operate the Mayflower Hotel on Connecticut Avenue in Washington, D.C., the title to the property to be in the Mayflower Hotel Co.;

2. That the following securities of said corporations were sold to the public, viz, $7,500,000 of first-mortgage 6-percent bonds; $2,400,000 of second-mortgage 6½-percent bonds; $3,031,100 of

6-percent preferred stock; and 60,000 shares of common stock, amounting, in the aggregate, exclusive of the common stock, to $12,931,100;

3. That a foreclosure of said first mortgage is pending, in which a sale of the properties securing the same has been authorized at a minimum price of $2,800,000;

4. That three bondholders' committees have been formed, which have obtained possession and control of about 80 percent of said bonds;

5. That two of said committees are composed of the original sellers of said securities or of their associates and affiliates;

6. That said bondholders' committees have united in a plan of reorganization, by the terms of which:

(a) No provision is made for any securities or stock except the first-mortgage bonds, with the result that under said plan the holders of said second-mortgage bonds, of the preferred stock, and of the common stock would suffer a total loss;

(b) Upon consummation of the plan depositing first-mortgage bondholders will receive for each $1,000 principal amount of said first-mortgage bonds (with a proportionately smaller amount for $500 and $100 denominations) $500 principal amount of new 15-year 4½-percent general-mortgage sinking-fund bonds, together with 10 shares of capital stock, making a maximum total of $3,721,500 principal amount of new bonds and the entire outstanding capital stock of the proposed new company (74,430 shares authorized);

(c) Said $3,721,500 mortgage will not be a first lien, but will be second to a mortgage estimated to be for not less than $500,000 nor more than $750,000, the giving of which $500,000 to $750,000 mortgage is claimed to be wholly unnecessary in view of the cash on hand, and of the ability to raise any small deficiency on short-term unsecured notes, or, if necessary, on pledging a sufficient amount of the first-lien mortgage bonds;

(d) The 74,430 shares of stock of the new company proposed by the reorganization committee will be issued to a voting trust committee consisting of three members, who will hold the stock for 2 years, subject to an extension of 6 years, making the voting trust period provided for 8 years altogether, the 6-year extension being subject to the authorization of a majority in interest of the voting-trust certificate holders;

(e) Provision is made for a reorganization committee of three members, each to be paid $7,500 a year; of a voting-trust committee of three members; and for the designation of a bank to supervise the financial affairs of the new company;

(f) The reorganization committee is given authority to bid in the hotel property or to refrain from purchasing it, in their discretion; and if they do bid the property in at the minimum price of $2,800,000, they propose to penalize nondepositing bondholders by settling with them on the basis of such price, whereas the depositing bondholders are to be paid on the basis of $3,721,500 (nearly $1,000,000 more);

(g) The voting trustees shall have full power, if the hotel property is bid in, to sell it and to act as fully as the stockholders themselves might act in regard to any company matters, including the designation of their successors;

(h) The three bondholders' committees shall be paid an aggregate of $62,000 for services;

(i) The bondholding committees with whom bonds have been deposited shall be paid fees and expenses and the charges of their counsel; and there shall be paid the expenses of organization of the new company and of the issuance of its securities and of the first-mortgage loan.

7. That there has accumulated and is on hand from the hotel operations the sum of about $900,000;

8. That it is feared because of the experience of a similar local reorganization, managed, it is asserted by the same persons or some of them, now composing two of the present bondholders' committees, or their affiliates or associates, that the new stockholders' bonds will not sell for more than 20 cents on the dollar, if said reorganization plan is carried out, which would result in a property on which securities were sold for $12,931,100, aside from the common stock, realizing for the security purchasers but $700,000: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That for the purpose of providing the Senate with information to serve as a basis for such legislation, if any, as may in its judgment be found necessary in respect of financing the construction of buildings, selling to the public of bonds secured by mortgages on such buildings and the land they cover, and of preferred and common stock of the corporate owners of such real estate, and to correct abuses in such financing, and to protect the public against losses from unsound financing, and in particular to protect such investors as have already suffered losses in this Mayflower Hotel financing and such as are threatened with further and future losses in connection with the proposed reorganization of said Mayflower Hotel corporations and properties, the Committee on the District of Columbia, or a duly authorized subcommittee thereof, is directed to investigate all facts in connection with the financing and the proposed reorganization of said hotel and in particular the following matters relating to said corporations and to said proposed reorganization, viz:

(a) Who sold and what methods were pursued to accomplish the sale of $7,500,000 of first-mortgage 6-percent bonds; of $2,400,000 second-mortgage 6½-percent mortgage bonds; of $3,031,100 of 6-percent preferred stock; and of 60,000 shares of common stock, all securities of said corporations, and aside from the common stock amounting in the aggregate to $12,931,100.

(b) As to the management of said corporations since their formation in or about 1925, to date.

(c) As to the circumstances which have led up to the fixing, in proceedings for foreclosure of the first mortgage, of $2,800,000 as a price at which the Mayflower properties may be sold, on which securities to the amount of $12,931,100 were sold to the public.

(d) Whether the sellers of such securities for $12,931,000 are the same persons, or some of them, who have now obtained control of said securities as members of bondholders' committees of said first-mortgage bonds and the methods used to obtain such control, and to induce the bondholders to whom they sold such bonds to deposit the same with them as reorganizers, and specifically to determine if said sellers of securities and the members of said bondholders' committees are now advocating the sale of said hotel property for $2,800,000, a sum approximately one fourth the amount of the securities issued against the same.

(e) Whether the proposed reorganization is in the interest of the security holders.

The committee or subcommittee shall make a final report of its investigation, with recommendations, to the Senate, not later than May 31, 1934. For the purposes of this resolution the committee or subcommittee is authorized to avail itself of the services of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, and of the corporation counsel of the District of Columbia, and to make expenditures to be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate upon vouchers approved by the chairman of the committee. The total of such expenditures shall not exceed $2,500.

SENATE RULES AND MANUAL

Mr. COPELAND submitted the following resolution (S.Res. 233), which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That the Committee on Rules be, and is hereby, directed to prepare a revised edition of the Senate Rules and Manual for the use of the Seventy-fourth Congress, and that 2,500 additional copies be printed and bound for the use of the committee, of which 300 copies shall be bound in leather and tagged as to contents.

TOLL ROAD IN COCONINO NATIONAL FOREST, ARIZ.

Mr. ASHURST submitted the following resolution (S.Res. 234), which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry:

Resolved, That the Secretary of Agriculture be requested to enter into negotiations with the San Francisco Mountain Scenic Boulevard Co. of Arizona for the purchase of the toll road to the summit of the San Francisco Peaks, in the Coconino National Forest, State of Arizona, under the terms of the stipulation entered into by said company on January 27, 1920, under the authority of the act of June 4, 1897 (30 Stat. 35).

LOANS BY FEDERAL RESERVE BANKS FOR INDUSTRIAL PURPOSES

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I have a very able and comprehensive discussion and analysis of industrial credit legislation pending before the Banking and Currency Committee, prepared by Mr. John Galleher, general counsel of the Manufacturers' Community Mortgage Loan Corporation of Springfield, Mass. Mr. Galleher discusses and contrasts the difference between the Glass bill, which is now pending before the Senate, and the Jones Reconstruction Finance Corporation bill, which is to be heard by the Banking and Currency Committee on Monday.

I ask that this analysis and comments be printed in the RECORD as part of the debate on the bill under discussion on yesterday, and upon which action was postponed until Monday, and also that it lie on the table.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PROFOSED INDUSTRIAL CREDIT LEGISLATION

THE GLASS BILL	THE JONES R.F.C. BILL
LOANING AUTHORITY
The Federal Reserve banks.	The Reconstruction Finance Corporation.
PURPOSE
Direct loans to industry, through banks, trust companies, mortgage companies, credit corporations for industry, and other financial institutions, for working capital.	Direct loans to industry in cooperation with banks or other lending institutions. Solely for the purpose of maintaining and increasing the employment of labor.
HOW EFFECTUATED
By discount or purchase of credit obligations.	By discount or purchase of participations.
MATURITY
Not to exceed 5 years.	Not to exceed 5 years.

REQUIREMENTS
In exceptional circumstances, when it appears to the satisfaction of the Federal Reserve bank that the industry is unable to secure requisite financial assistance from usual sources on reasonable terms.	Shall be made only when deemed to offer reasonable assurance of continued or increased employment of labor. The borrower must be solvent. The borrower must be unable to secure credit at the bank rate for the character of the loan applied for. No one borrower may receive more than $1,000,000, subject to such terms, restrictions, and conditions as the board of directors may determine.
SECURITY
Loans to be made on a reasonable and sound basis.	Loans shall be adequately secured.
ADDITIONAL GUARANTY
The financial institution to guarantee 20 percent of the loan to the Federal Reserve bank.	No provision as to additional guaranty, but present policy of R.F.C. requires from 10 to 20 percent of each loan to be deposited as additional security in the form of a Government bond.
ADMINISTRATION
Advisory industrial committee, of 3 to 5 members, to be set up in each Federal Reserve district, who will serve without remuneration, to recommend loans to Federal Reserve bank.	No provision for advisory committee. Present R.F.C. practice, however, includes approval of all industrial loans by an advisory committee of bankers set up in each loan agency.
AMOUNT AUTHORIZED
Approximately $280,000,000.	$250,000,000.
TERMINATION OF AUTHORITY
No termination; permanent part of Federal Reserve Act.	Authority terminates January 1, 1935.

COMMENT

1. Amounts authorized insufficient: The amounts authorized by both bills, even when taken in the aggregate, do not appear to be sufficient to meet the demands of industry for this type of loan.

In a report furnished to Senator FLETCHER by the R.F.C. as of March 6, 1934, 1,742 borrowers, through 382 mortgage-loan companies, have asked the R.F.C. for $172,526,524. Since that date this total must have increased considerably. This corporation has considered approximately 250 applications from borrowers since January 1 asking for approximately $4,000,000 for disbursement in the western part of the State, including the Springfield area. In our judgment, $750,000,000 to one billion should be provided for this purpose. Under present R.F.C. policy conditions, onerous, burdensome, and totally unnecessary, are attached to every loan. In most cases compliance with these conditions is impossible. Such conditions imposed by R.F.C. are much more drastic and unreasonable than conditions imposed by banking institutions for loans of a similar character.

If industry throughout the United States up to March 6, 1934, applied for $172,000,000 under these impossible conditions, the demand would, under reasonable terms and conditions, increase at least fivefold.

2. Glass bill—provision as to exceptional circumstances: The words "in exceptional circumstances" should be stricken out of the bill, because they would involve difficulties in construction, as to when an exceptional circumstance existed, and thus might vitiate the entire purpose of the bill.

3. Glass bill—advisory committee of industrialists: This provision is excellent and removes the present obstacle to granting of loans under the existtng R.F.C. policy by requiring approval of all loans by a committee of bankers.

In our opinion, a clause should be added making it mandatory upon the Federal Reserve bank to authorize loans upon the recommendation of the advisory committee of industrialists. No discretion should remain in the Federal Reserve bank as to authorization of the loan by them after approval by the advisory industrial committee.

4. Jones R.F.C. bill—advisory banking committee in loan agencies: These committees in each loan agency are solely comprised of bankers, many of whom are totally opposed to this form of financial assistance to industry. Equal representation upon these committees in each loan agency should be accorded to industry in the interests of justice and fair play.

5. Jones R.F.C. bill—termination of authority: This authority should be extended beyond January 1, 1935, and it is suggested that it exist for at least 1 year, say, to July 1, 1935.

GENERAL SUGGESTIONS

To our mind, and in this we are in accord with most of the mortgage-loan companies in Massachusetts, neither of thes bills will reasonably accomplish the desired purpose.

The amendment to the Industrial Credit Act, which was under consideration by the Senate Committee on Banking and Currency during the early part of April, is practically perfect to effectuate the purpose of industrial credit expansion.

Senator Fletcher directed letters to all mortgage-loan companies who had had loans approved by R.F.C. asking for their comment on this bill, and we are sure the replies received were unanimously in favor of it.

The bill provided for the organization of mutual credit associations for industry, as Federal corporations, under the supervision and control of the Comptroller of the Currency, in much the same manner as our national banks are supervised. It sets up a mutual guaranty fund of liquid assets, contributed by the credit associations and supervised by the Comptroller of the Currency to protect the Government against any reasonable expectation of loss, based on the business mortality records of a given industry or community. It provides loans primarily for working capital purposes up to 5 years maturity, secured by first liens on industrial plants and equipment, by raw materials held for processing or manufacture, and by pledge of receivables. It authorizes Federal Reserve banks to purchase and discount obligations of these credit assocnations to the same extent as obligations issued under the Farm Loan Act, and further authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to purchase obligations of these mutual associations out of funds in the Treasury arising out of the devaluation of the gold dollar.

IN CONCLUSION

We submit that the expansion of credit to industry, promptly, and upon reasonable terms and conditions, is very necessary to the economic welfare of the Nation, and in support of the national industrial recovery program.

We suggest that the Jones R.F.C. bill be favorably reported out of the committee as a temporary measure with authority to grant loans to January 1, 1935, or unless superseded by Executive order of the President. That hearings be held by the Senate Committee on Banking and Currency, to permit industrialist and mortgage-loan company officials to be heard.

Respectfully submitted.

HOUSING CONDITIONS IN THE DISTRICT

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, I ask to have inserted in the RECORD an editorial from the Washington Post of April 30, entitled "Low-Cost Housing."

The editorial is a concise and well-considered statement of the housing problem in the District of Columbia. It calls attention to the finding by the Public Utilities Commission that a scarcity of low-cost dwellings prevails in the District. The editorial also refers to plans of the Emergency Housing Corporation for construction of low-cost sanitary dwellings in this city.

More than 7,000 persons live in the alley slums of Washington. Many of them are crowded into dirty, unwholesome shacks. Granted that the alleys are sought out as homes by the criminal and the vicious, I cannot believe that thousands of the poor live in the alleys for any but one reason—low rents.

These people cannot afford to pay even a fair price for decent living accommodations. Under present conditions, their mode of living creates disease and fosters crime. The whole city pays the penalty and pays heavily for perpetuating the alley homes.

Therefore, I do not believe that the rehousing of the alley dwellers should be undertaken on a strictly business basis. I believe that new, clean housing should be rented to them at prices within their meager incomes. Whatever the public may pay to accomplish this result, it will earn a rich return in stamping out tuberculosis, in reducing crime and juvenile delinquency.

The elimination of the alleys is, however, only one phase of the housing problems in Washington, as the editorial ably points out.

With few exceptions, no effort has been made by private capital in Washington to provide homes for the people at prices within the reach of the low-paid Government clerk. Within the past few years and up to the present day there has been very little residential building of any kind in Washington.

As a result, the houses and apartments available in Washington today may be divided into two groups:

Buildings constructed under high costs and speculative conditions since the World War.

Old buildings rapidly deteriorating and costly to repair.

In neither case is the tenant getting fair value for his dollar. On the one hand, he pays for the basis of an inflated value to help the owner meet the interest on an exorbitant mortgage. On the other hand, he is paying for depreciated property, living under undesirable conditions because he cannot pay more for better quarters.

Mr. President, private capital has done nothing to meet the needs of the large group of Government employees paying 40 percent or more of their small salaries for decent living accommodations. Here is a real opportunity for the Government to engage in housing on a strictly business basis.

I am convinced that the Government, through existing agencies, can and should show private business how to make housing for Government workers a paying venture, with rents low enough to give the Government worker a chance to live properly.

The sanitary housing companies of Washington, which are limited dividend corporations, have already demonstrated the practical success of such operations. These companies have over 800 two-family flats in Washington. They scarcely ever have a vacancy. They have been paying 5- and 6-percent dividends all through the depression, and their rents are approximately 30 percent lower than in comparable privately owned properties. This shows what can be done by eliminating the waste and greed of high finance.

I think the Government should serve notice on the real-estate interests of Washington now that it intends to follow the course which over 30 years has proved successful for these limited dividend companies. Let the Government build apartments for the workers of Washington and show what can be accomplished in giving Government employees decent homes at fair rents, with a fair return to the Government.

Mr. President, I ask that the editorial may be printed in the RECORD and lie on the table.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Post, Apr. 30, 1934]

LOW-COST HOUSING

Plans for the construction of low-cost housing units in Washington are developing slowly. Nevertheless, they are being watched with intense interest. The alley-clearance project is of special importance to the people who live in these unsightly and insanitary quarters, but it has a broad community appeal, because all the people of Washington are exposed to the disease and crime originating in these infected areas.

Without in any way diminishing the importance of eliminating alley hovels, we must recognize that this is only one aspect of Washington's housing problem. A recent survey by the Public Utilities Commission showed an acute shortage of suitable dwellings for families of moderate means. Since the war the supply of higher-priced apartments and homes has been augmented by about 50 percent. But the needs of families with small and average incomes have been singularly neglected. The findings of the P.U.C. indicate that modern dwellings can be constructed and operated for much less rent than the average family is now paying. Yet private capital has failed to initiate low-cost housing projects on an extensive scale.

The purpose of the E.H.C. is to demonstrate that modern, sanitary dwellings with pleasant surroundings may be provided at reasonable rentals. Several large cities have already proved the feasibility of such undertakings. It seems quite proper that the Government should conduct an experiment of this kind in the National Capital, although its intention to take over this municipal responsibility in other cities throughout the country has aroused rather grave misgivings. In general, the low-cost housing program would be far more satisfactory if it were going forward as a series of community enterprises rather than as a Federal undertaking.

Projects of this kind are significant if they point the way for private enterprise to render greater service to the community. Of course, there is no excuse for subsidization of those families who may obtain quarters in houses built with taxpayers' money. The first prerequisite of community housing is that it be kept on a strictly business basis. If these Federal projects should develop into a racket, as other "letter" undertakings have done, the price would be excessive even for such essential developments as elimination of slums and hovels.

NATIONALIZATION OF BANKS—ARTICLE BY SENATOR CUTTING

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an article entitled "Is Private Banking Doomed?" by the senior Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CUTTING], published in the March 31 issue of Liberty Magazine.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From Liberty, Mar. 31, 1934]

IS PRIVATE BANKING DOOMED?—"YES", SAYS A FIGHTING CHAMPION OF THE NEW DEAL—"IT WAS PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT'S GREAT MISTAKE" THAT HE DID NOT NATIONALIZE THE BANKS ON HIS FIRST DAY IN OFFICE

By Senator BRONSON CUTTING, as told to Frederick C. Painton

Just before I left for Washington to attend the present session of Congress a banker constituent of mine, whose intelligence I highly regard—and who is a good banker, incidentally—came to me in an angry mood.

"The Government", he said bitterly, "is caught in the same dole system that is wrecking England. The idea of putting 4,000,000 men to doing useless work is plain out-and-out charity. It is socialistic. It undermines personal initiative. Why, in many cases the Government is paying more for this silly labor than industry itself pays. And the whole thing is placing a colossal, unnecessary strain on Government income."

He switched abruptly to his other pet abomination.

"You've got to depend on us bankers to keep recovery going, once it really begins", he said. "The Government should leave us alone. BRONSON, I hope you will oppose this Government dole system and fight Government tinkering with the banks."

I told him, when opportunity came, that I intended to support the so-called "dole system" of Government-made work, because as long as our present economic system continues there will always be from three to four million workers whom industry cannot employ.

"And as time passes", I added, "this number of parmanently unemployed will grow instead of lessen."

He stood quite silent when I told him that I favored even more Government tinkering with the banks.

"Private banking", I said, "is doomed in this country by the new deal. Control of credit is a Government power that does not belong in private hands. Unless the administration presents a bill depriving bankers of this power, I myself shall introduce such a measure. Private control of credit must be abolished."

Both of these are key points in the development of the country's future. Without Government employment of surplus labor and Government control of credit, the new deal must fail. In my opinion, neither point is radical but rather a common-sense effort to bring the Government into alinement with modern needs.

Everyone now knows that the vital objective of the new deal is to raise consumer purchasing power. There is a fundamental need of national planning to equate consumption with production. Such an equalization cannot be made unless the Government employs the increasing surplus of labor to raise consumption to maximum levels, or unless, by control of credit, it forces industry to regulate its output.

The failure of consumption through unemployment and the wild gyrations of private banking control of credit brought on the 1929 crash and will cause another even greater unless the Government acts decisively now.

Let me say at once that I do not believe our political system needs any great change to achieve these ends. I am opposed to communism, fascism, or any other form of dictatorship. Those who wrote the Constitution of the United States knew what they were doing; but the Constitution is, after all, an eighteenth-century document and needs more than an occasional amendment to bring it up to date. It could well be rewritten. Nevertheless, our political system based on the Constitution is fundamentally American and should be preserved. We are capable of national economic planning without the shackling of human intellect now practiced in Russia and Germany.

What we are now witnessing is a modernizing of our Government to meet the changes of the last 60 years. This modernizing process is causing me—as well as thousands of my contemporaries—to discard the economic doctrine which we in our youth absorbed second-handed from Adam Smith, John Stuart Mill, and the others.

They started with an assumption that the supply of the necessities of life would always be insufficient, and built up an economic system based on the law of supply and demand. As long as there was a shortage of the necessities of life their system worked. But today we have turned from the economics of scarcity to the economics of plenty.

Yet, creatures of habit that we are, we grumble as my banker friend has grumbled and protest the vital changes necessary for our own welfare. I am no better than anyone else in this respect, but as a public official I have necessarily examined the situation carefully. Hence I venture to discuss the dole system and Government reform of bank credits, not as a progressive but as a Senator with one vote who is trying to apply his common sense to the situation that exists.

Now the Government has put 4,000,000 men and women on the Public Works Administration pay roll because industry cannot employ these people. The Government will have to employ another 4,000,000 next year and the year after, and indefinitely continuing, because even if we do have a return of prosperity—a sensible prosperity—industry will still be unable to absorb all those who wish to work.

It seems to me there is ample proof that the so-called "dole system" must endure. Ever since James Watt made a practical success of the steam engine we have seen machines steadily supplanting man power. At first, during the nineteenth century, when markets were expanding because of a receding frontier and with working hours gradually being reduced, the slow increase in wages and the widening of human needs kept workers fairly in labor. But with the twentieth century progress swept upon us like an avalanche. The shortening of labor hours did not keep pace with the increase in production. The wage raises were not great enough to absorb the larger output. And hence there arose what was called a norm of permanently unemployed.

Very early indeed these numbered a million men and their dependents. We knew about it casually, but it was not until the depression of 1921 that we had public admission from high places that our economic scheme was keeping men permanently unemployed.

In his report of 1922 the Secretary of Labor said, "In 1921 we had between five and six million jobless. We were in the throes of one of the greatest industrial depressions ever known. The Nation fought its way through this period. * * * We are back to normal in our employment. But we have made the startling discovery that normal in America means that approximately one and a half million men are detached from any pay roll." (The italics are mine.)

In 1928 and 1929 our unemployed reached a total of approximately 3,000,000. These were permanently jobless at the very time we were shouting an end to poverty.

The withdrawal of these millions as purchasers, and the increasing share of the national income taken by industry for larger plants and huge surpluses, brought on the crash of 1929. Then, of course, the unemployment grew, until in 1932 it reached a staggering total of 12,000,000 jobless.

If in the height of our so-called "prosperity" 3,000,000 men went jobless, how many will remain unemployed when and if we reach a point of recovery comparable to, say, 1926? The answer seems inevitably to point to 4,000,000 men and women who must turn outside of industry to find work.

Since the low of last March it is estimated that 3,500,000 men and women have returned to work. This uplift in business has, according to administration spokesmen, brought us back some 25 percent toward the prosperity peak of 1929. Yet we are told in the same breath that 9,500,000 people are still without employment.

In other words, business, recovering 25 percent, has absorbed 3,500,000 workers, leaving nearly three times that many still to find employment. Then we must recover another 75 percent to absorb the remainder. That would bring us back to the insane peak of 1929—which would be impossible anyway.

If, which is a more sensible theory, we revive 80 percent of the high of 1929, we should still have 4,000,000 jobless. And you can arrive at that same figure through several different considerations of the problem.

I shall be told that the very machines that threw men out of work created new lines of endeavor that absorbed the jobless. Once that statement might have been true in part; but we know now that machines have thrown men out of work faster than new industries could absorb them. And I am frank to say that I do not believe that any new industry or group of industries can reduce our permanently unemployed below the 4,000,000 mark.

Yet practically and morally these unemployed workers must be cared for. If purchasing power is to reach its ultimate high, they must have work and income to spend. Morally, they must have their chance to live like human beings. And when industry cannot care for them, then it becomes the Government's duty. This it has done and released a torrent of criticism.

Most of this protest is, I believe, directed at the uselessness of much of the made work. But no one can be blamed for that. The winter was here—the emergency at hand—the duty plain.

But presently, when the emergency is passed, much constructive employment can be found for these millions of eager hands. The mere removal of 210,000 grade crossings would cost something like $10,000,000,000 and would keep many men employed a long time. With water power, flood control, drainage, reclamation, reforestation, housing, and educational and recreational needs, there is no excuse, for a good many years, in believing that we cannot utilize surplus labor.

Despite the fact that we shall all benefit from this work, the cry has gone forth that our taxation will increase. For the time being doubtless it will. But by forcing industry to pay higher wages, seizing part of the profits through taxation to keep all workers in jobs, the profits will grow and thus provide a greater national income which eventually will reduce taxation.

In short, we must have Government regulation of all industry to name the capital return on money. The Government regulation is becoming greater, will become more pronounced during this session of the Congress.

As a matter of fact, I am more interested in seeing a growth of national income than in discussion of whether 4,000,000 men and women shall have a so-called "dole." And if capital gets its just—and only its just—return, if labor receives an adequate wage, and extra profits go to supplying needed work to those outside of industry's gates, our national income can again reach eighty billions a year. Real prosperity will be achieved.

There are many able thinkers who now believe that in the future, instead of letting industry make profits of which a portion is claimed through taxation by Government, the Government itself may start by doing all the work necessary for the Nation-community and pay for it directly through certificates of work done for the state. I am not arguing for or against this theory, but it does bring me directly to the second point which my banker friend raised—interference by Government with private-banking control of credit.

The announced objective of the present administration is to introduce national planning in order to adjust consumption to production. With private-banking control of credit such a realization is utterly impossible.

There is, let us say, a manufacturing company whose commodity is in good demand. Its president, desiring to increase his profits, decides to build an addition to his factory. He naturally approaches his local banker and asks to borrow $4,000,000. The banker recognizes in the plant itself a sound collateral; he knows the company's prosperous condition; and if he be a broad-minded banker he perceives, too, a chance to increase the wealth of his community through greater employment. Naturally, he makes the loan.

But how does he make it? He writes on the credit side of a little book the figures, $4,000,000. He has, then, reached into thin air and summoned $4,000,000. He has created $4,000,000 out of nothing. What he has loaned is his bank's credit.

That loaning of confidence in his bank is his own private responsibility. He is accountable to no one but his board of directors.

Now, presume that in the far end of the Nation another manufacturer of the same commodity also desires to expand. He approaches his banker, who makes the loan.

When the additions to the two manufacturing plants are finished and in operation, it is discovered that the combined increase in production has flooded the market. Naturally, the executives of the factories lay off men. But they have to lay off not only the newly employed but some of the old as well until a normal demand for their goods again presents itself.

A depression has begun in that industry, and we find national wealth uselessly tied up in too big productive facilities and the manufacturers barricaded behind their surpluses awaiting better times. Heretofore no thought had ever been given to the men laid off.

With the overproduction which their tsaristic control of credit created, the two bankers become worried and demand repayment of their loans. Yet when the banks made the original issue of credit they increased to that extent the amount of money in circulation. To that extent, also, they increased the price level. Hence, when they recalled their loans they deflated the price level by $8,000,000.

Yet, at the time they demanded their loans there was actually more goods in existence than when they made the loans. Obviously, to buy these goods there should have been more money in circulation instead of less.

To the extent that the above example actually occurred not once but many, many times in the years leading up to 1929, the banker can be held accountable for what followed. He exercises an uncontrolled and capricious power over credit that may be beneficent if he be lucky, but that is more apt to be destructive.

Most people, I believe, do not realize just how great that power is. Only a small part of our monetary system consists of currency. The greater part by far is made out of bank credit. Hence, the banker controls the major part of our financial system, yet works absolutely isolated from his cobankers and under little public control. He is no different from any other human being. In good times he is optimistic, free with credit; in bad times he is cautious. This has brought about the axiom that in good times there is too much credit and in bad times not enough. The Federal Reserve System was supposed to remedy this human defect, but we know now that it did not.

During the Hoover administration Government credit was poured out generously through the Federal Reserve and Reconstruction Finance Corporation in the hope that this credit would sift down to those needing it. But the credit never got any farther than the private banker. He was the dam where it gathered in a large pool.

The banker was so in control of the Nation's finances that even the Government was powerless to get its credit to those needing it to lift us out of the depression. How fully he exercises this power is shown by the fact that there was little or no credit available in the United States in 1932 save through the Government.

Here is a power controlling the very destinies of the Nation. Yet the people of the Nation have no word in the selection of the men who control credit. The men we elect to governmental power have little to say in authority. So the banker has held the power that enabled bankers to squander the national wealth in freak foreign loans and waste the national substance with overexpansion of industry at home.

With Government control of credit, however, such ridiculous foreign loans would be impossible, and there could be no overextension of industry in the Nation. It seems obvious, then, that Government control of credit is the only tool by which we can have national planning.

Yet Government control of credit does not necessarily mean the end of banks as we know them. Individuals and industrial enterprises will always need deposit money and issue checks. For giving this service the banks will make a charge. They will also be able to make small loans of the same nature as the loan of money between two men. But this is not the loaning of credit which has made the mischief. Either banks of this sort will be strictly regulated by the Government, or else the Government will take them over as an extension of the Postal Savings System. In either case they will be entirely sound, for they will be compelled to keep 100-percent reserves.

The fight against the abolition of the credit power of private banks will be a savage one, for their power as a unit is without equal in the country. Knowing this is why I think back to the events of March 4, 1933, with a sick heart. For then, with even the bankers thinking the whole economic system had crashed to ruin, the nationalization of banks by President Roosevelt could have been accomplished without a word of protest. It was President Roosevelt's great mistake. Now the bankers will make a mighty struggle.

But none the less, like any other outmoded machine, they must be scrapped.

Of course, the naturalization of banks by itself will not salvage our industry, nor yet will the employment by Government of surplus labor bring us upward. Prosperity will depend thereafter on the policies pursued by those in charge. Surely the first step is to place the Government in a position where it has full responsibility and then to hold it to strict account.

And there is where our two-party system would work if there was a distinct line of cleavage. It seems to me that the formation of a consumers' party would place the control of the Government in the proper hands.

Every man on the street corner will tell you that the depression has come because our consuming power did not equal our productive output, yet practically no one acts as if this were so.

The consumers are completely unorganized. Even those experimenting abroad, in Italy, Russia, and Germany, have not tried to organize them. Yet the consumers constitute the people of the United States. They are the one and only hope of what we call the "capitalistic system." Will we begin to recognize that we are not labor or capital, or broker or store proprietor, and recognize that we are consumers, and consider our national problems from that angle?

Certainly the age-long battle between capital and labor is near its close. As machinery increases and man power declines, labor, it seems to me, must identify itself as consumer rather than continue a futile fight with capital to obtain a greater share of profits which under Government regulation will be too small to be worth fighting for. Hence, we have a nucleus here on which to base a party that would see through consumers' eyes the necessity of more equal distribution of wealth, which would mean, of course, greater consumption and in the long run greater prosperity for us all.

If, as Thomas Jefferson once phrased it, "the earth belongs to the living", then we must throw away the old shibboleths and look to the future instead of the past. For myself, I have three positive conclusions:

First. The consumer is now the basic factor in our civilization, and until we recognize that fact maladjustments will continue.

Second. The Government must consider itself as the representative of the consumer and not as a representative of capital or labor, whose perennial war has helped produce the mess we are now trying to climb out of.

Third. The success of any new deal depends primarily on Government control of credit and Government employment of the surplus labor on national projects.

APPORTIONMENT OF COTTON IN ARIZONA

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a letter addressed by me to the Secretary of Agriculture relative to the apportionment of cotton exempt from tax in Arizona.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

APRIL 28, 1934.

Hon. HENRY A. WALLACE,
Secretary of Agriculture, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. SECRETARY: Telegrams from Arizona indicate that the Bankhead Act of April 21, 1934, is being misinterpreted so as to reduce the apportionment of cotton exempt from tax in Arizona by 14,000 bales or from 87,000, as originally announced, to 73,000 bales. This change is proposed to be brought about by taking into consideration only the short-staple cotton grown in that State during the 5 crop years instead of including all cotton grown during that period.

I respectfully insist that section 5 (a) of the act requires that all cotton produced must be included in the basis of apportionment to each State. The text of the section means just what it says and reads, as follows:

"SEC. 5 (a) When an allotment is made, in order to prevent unfair competition and unfair trade practices in marketing cotton in the channels of interstate and foreign commerce, the Secretary of Agriculture shall apportion to the several cotton-producing States, the number of bales the marketing of which may be exempt from the tax herein levied, which shall be determined by the ratio of the average number of bales produced in each State during the 5 crop years preceding the passage of this act to the average number of bales produced in all the States during the same period: Provided, however, That no State shall receive an allotment of less than 200,000 bales of cotton if in any 1 year of 5 years prior to this date the production of the State equaled 250,000 bales. It is prima facie presumed that all cotton and its processed products will move in interstate or foreign commerce."

The sole question to be determined is "the number of bales the marketing of which may be exempt from the tax herein levied." To obtain the only correct answer it is necessary to look to section 4 (e), which provides that:

"(e) No tax shall be imposed under this act with respect to—

"(1) Cotton harvested by any publicly owned experimental station or agricultural laboratory.

"(2) An amount of cotton harvested in any crop year from each farm equal to its allotment.

"(3) Cotton harvested prior to the crop year 1934–35.

"(4) Cotton having a staple of 1⅛ inches in length or longer."

The four kinds of cotton above specified must be all taken into account in fixing the number of tax-exempt bales in any State. It would be just as illogical to single out "cotton harvested prior to the crop year 1934–35" and deduct it from the calculations as to say that "cotton having a staple of 1⅛ inches in length or longer" shall be omitted or ignored.

The State of Arizona is lawfully entitled to have apportioned to it by the Secretary of Agriculture the number of bales of tax-exempt cotton as calculated and fixed by using as a basis the quantity of all cotton, whether short staple or long staple, produced in that State during the 5 crop years preceding the passage of the Bankhead Act. The direction to the Secretary of Agriculture is mandatory in that respect, and he cannot lawfully adopt any other method of deciding upon the number of bales in the Arizona quota or apportionment.

The cotton-planting season is now at hand, which makes it imperative that there be no delay in arriving at a final decision on this important matter. I hope that you will promptly repeat the advice previously given to the cotton growers of Arizona, that the apportionment to that State is 87,000 bales.

Very respectfully,

HENRY F. ASHURST,
Senator from Arizona.

MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT

Messages in writing from the President of the United States were communicated to the Senate by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries.

CORPORATE REORGANIZATIONS

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H.R. 5884) to amend an act entitled "An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States", approved July 1, 1898, and acts amendatory thereof and supplementary thereto, the pending question being the amendment offered by Mr. FRAZIER.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair understands from the parliamentary clerk and those who were in the Chamber at the time the Senate took a recess yesterday that the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG] yielded to the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. DAVIS] with the understanding that he would have the floor this morning. Therefore, the Chair recognizes the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. LONG addressed the Senate. After having spoken for about 1 hour and 45 minutes,

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. LONG. I yield to the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. FRAZIER. I suggest the absence of a quorum, and ask for a roll call.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield for the call of the roll?

Mr. LONG. Yes; I yield.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Dakota [Mr. FRAZIER] has made the point of no quorum. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

The Chair announces eighty-three Senators having responded to the roll call, a quorum is present. The Senator from Louisiana has the floor.

ALLEGED DISCRIMINATORY PRACTICES UNDER STEEL CODE

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. LONG. I yield to the Senator from Minnesota with the understanding that he does not take the floor away from me.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I ask unanimous consent to have a resolution read; and if there is no objection, I should like to have immediate consideration of it. If it should lead to debate, I shall ask that it be printed and lie on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Minnesota asks unanimous consent that a resolution be read. It will be read, subject to the further motion of the Senator.

The legislative clerk read the resolution (S.Res. 232), as follows:

Whereas complaints are being made to Members of the Congress that certain provisions of the code of fair competition for the iron and steel industry discriminate unjustly against different manufacturers using steel as a raw material by the imposition of the basing-point method of selling only at delivered prices; and

Whereas complaints are also made that under code rules a schedule of extras for quantity was universally adopted by parties to the code which greatly increased the relative prices theretofore paid by the smaller manufacturers using steel as raw material, which makes it more difficult for them to compete with larger manufacturers who are able to buy and use larger quantities; and

Whereas in response to a resolution of the Senate (S.Res. 166) the Federal Trade Commission on March 19, 1934, has made a report indicating that these charges are well founded; and

Whereas the code will expire by limitation on May 31, 1934: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the President be requested—

(a) To take notice of the manner in which the industry is discriminating against different localities by the basing-point practice and between large and small enterprises by the imposition of quantity extras; and to

(b) Refuse further approval of those portions of the code which make these conditions possible.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution having been read, what further motion does the Senator from Minnesota make?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, I want to take a moment to explain the purpose of the resolution. In response to a resolution adopted by the Senate some time ago the Federal Trade Commission made a report on the practices of the steel industry under the code. In that report they mentioned certain monopolistic practices. They showed, for instance, that in certain cases prices had been raised as high as 800 percent over the former prices.

All this resolution proposes is that when the code which is now in existence shall expire, on the 31st day of May, if it shall be renewed by the code authority and by the President, it shall not contain the provisions allowing the practices complained of and which were shown by the investigation of the Federal Trade Commission to be well founded. That is all it does.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, is it a joint resolution?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. No; it is not a joint resolution, but a simple Senate resolution expressing the opinion of the Senate that when the code shall be renewed, if it shall be renewed at the time of its expiration on the 31st day of this month, it shall not continue to include the provisions that make these objectionable practices possible.

Mr. BORAH. Then, the effect of adopting the resolution would simply be a request?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. That is all.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, what is the request of the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I ask for the adoption of the resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Minnesota asks unanimous consent that the resolution which has been read be now considered.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, I inquire if the Senator has consulted the majority leader, the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], about the matter?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I have not. I endeavored to consult the Senator from Arkansas, but he has not been in the Chamber for some time.

Mr. McKELLAR. I inquire if the Senator consulted the minority leader?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I have not.

Mr. McKELLAR. I ask the Senator to defer his request until the Senator from Arkansas and the Senator from Oregon shall have returned to the Chamber.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Very well. I ask that the resolution lie on the table.

Mr. McKELLAR. That is all right.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Minnesota requests that the resolution lie on the table.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I should like to have the opportunity and privilege of taking it up, if consent can be secured, this afternoon.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be printed and lie on the table.

PROPOSED RETURN TO CANADIAN GOVERNMENT OF MACE OF PARLIAMENT OF UPPER CANADA (ONTARIO)

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LEWIS in the chair) laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, which was read and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, as follows:

To the Congress of the United States:

During the War of 1812 the mace of the Parliament of Upper Canada, or Ontario, was taken by United States forces at the time of the Battle of York, April 27, 1813. That mace, which had been the symbol of legislative authority at York (now Toronto) since 1792, has been preserved in the United States Naval Academy at Annapolis.

On July 4, 1934, there is to be unveiled in Toronto a memorial tablet erected by the United States Daughters of 1812 to the memory of General Pike and others of the United States forces who were killed in action. The mayor and council of Toronto are providing the site for the memorial.

The suggestion has been made that it would be a gracious act for the United States to return this historic mace to Canada at the time of the unveiling of the tablet.

The mace is a token of representative government established at York nearly a century and a half ago. It symbolizes the orderly rule of such government in Canada, continuing from that day to this.

Since the agreement of 1817 the two countries have by common accord maintained no hostile armaments on either side of their boundary, and every passing year cements the peace and friendship between the peoples of Canada and the United States.

I heartily recommend to the favorable consideration of the Congress the enactment of a joint resolution authorizing the return of the mace to the Canadian Government.

ACCEPTANCE OF INDEPENDENCE ACT BY PHILIPPINE LEGISLATURE

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, which was read, and, with the accompanying paper, ordered to lie on the table, as follows:

To the Congress of the United States:

I transmit herewith for your information a copy of a radiogram from the Governor General of the Philippine Islands quoting the text of a concurrent resolution, adopted May 1, 1934, at the special session of the Ninth Philippine Legislature, entitled "Concurrent resolution accepting Public Act No. 127 of the Congress of the United States, commonly known as the 'Tydings-McDuffie Act', and expressing the gratitude of the Philippine Legislature and the Filipino people to the President and Congress of the United States and the American people."

VETERANS' REGULATION—BURIAL EXPENSES OF DECEASED WAR VETERANS

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, which was read, and, with the accompanying paper, ordered to lie on the table, as follows:

To the Congress of the United States:

Pursuant to the provisions of section 20, title I, of the act entitled "An act to maintain the credit of the United States Government", approved March 20, 1933, I am transmitting herewith Executive Order No. 6695 (Veterans' Regulation No. 9 (c)), approved by me May 2, 1934.

This Executive order amends Executive Order No. 6567, January 19, 1934 (Veterans' Regulation No. 9 (b)).

This regulation was promulgated in accordance with the terms of title 1, Public, No. 2, Seventy-third Congress, "An act to maintain the credit of the United States Government."

CORPORATE REORGANIZATIONS

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H.R. 5884) to amend an act entitled "An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States", approved July 1, 1898, and acts amendatory thereof and supplementary thereto, the question being the amendment offered by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. FRAZIER].

Mr. LONG resumed his speech. After having spoken for about an hour,

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GIBSON in the chair). Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. LONG. I yield.

Mr. FRAZIER. Inasmuch as we have this to ourselves, I think we might as well adopt this amendment.

Mr. LONG. All right, I will yield.

Mr. FRAZIER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield the floor?

Mr. LONG. Yes, sir; I yield for the amendment to be voted on.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. FRAZIER].

Mr. BACHMAN. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The absence of a quorum being suggested, the clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Adams	Couzens	Kean	Reynolds
Ashurst	Cutting	Keyes	Robinson, Ark.
Bachman	Davis	King	Robinson, Ind.
Bankhead	Dickinson	Lewis	Russell
Barbour	Dieterich	Logan	Schall

Clark	Harrison	O'Mahoney	Van Nuys
Connally	Hatch	Overton	Wagner
Coolidge	Hayden	Patterson	Walsh
Copeland	Hebert	Pittman	Wheeler
Costigan	Johnson	Pope	White

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Eighty-four Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, will the Senator from Louisiana yield?

Mr. LONG. I yield, provided I do not lose the floor.

Mr. FRAZIER. I desire to perfect my amendment, on page 2, line 5, by striking out the words "homestead and", so that it will then read:

be appraised at its then actual value and that his exemptions be set aside and that he be allowed to retain possession of any part or parcel or all of the remainder of his property—

And so forth.

I also desire to make a similar modification by striking out the same words, in line 25, page 2, and also in line 20, page 3. The modification merely leaves out words to which objection has been raised in the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Dakota modifies his amendment as indicated by him.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, yesterday at the time I yielded the floor we had under consideration the so-called "Frazier amendment." The constitutionality of that amendment had been questioned by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] and by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS]. I had agreed in principle with both of the distinguished Senators that based on the old understanding of the Constitution as interpreted up to a few years ago by our Supreme Court, this legislation and other legislation of its kind would not be held constitutional; but that in view of the late jurisprudence that the Constitution had to yield to the necessities of occasions and events and cycles of time, it would be held by the Supreme Court to be constitutional.

On investigation, however, I find, contrary to what was my belief on yesterday in some particulars, or at least to some extent, that the Senator from Nebraska and the Senator from Idaho had labored in some error as to what the law really is in the matter of discharging debts under the power of Congress, and that in accepting some of those views I, too, have probably somewhat misinterpreted what has been the law. It is very likely that the municipal bankruptcy bill would be considered unconstitutional for many more reasons than those to be inferred from the amendment which has been offered by the Senator from North Dakota allowing farmers to take advantage of bankruptcy.

I know of no warrant of law whatever by which the Constitution allows Congress to permit municipalities to go into bankruptcy, because a municipality is a subdivision of a State and in effect the obligations which the Congress is undertaking to wipe out are obligations contracted under the sovereignty of the State. I know of no jurisprudence or any precedent whatever which indicates that Congress may go in that direction in the cancelation of debts through bankruptcy. In other words, I contend that if Congress may grant bankruptcy to municipalities, it certainly may grant bankruptcy to the States. If the Congress of the United States may say that obligations of States can be canceled, then, of course, that means that Congress has taken over the matter of public and private debts as to their cancelation.

But the cancelation of private debts through bankruptcy is not assailable under the Constitution of the United States, nor do I believe the means or the manner of cancelation of private debts can be assailed under the Constitution, particularly in view of the liberal way in which it is now being interpreted.

I desire to read several extracts from decisions of courts which have been furnished to me by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. FRAZIER], who has taken the time since we recessed yesterday afternoon to look up these authorities.

From the text writer, 12 Corpus Juris, page 987, I read the following:

The prohibition of laws impairing obligations of contracts is expressly directed to state action and does not apply to Congress, which may pass laws directly or indirectly impairing the obligations of contracts.

Then I read from another well-known authority, volume 6, ruling case law, 323, the following, which I believe will be found to be the law:

The particular provision of the Federal Constitution designed for the protection of the citizen in respect to his contractual rights is that no State shall pass any law impairing the obligations of contracts (art. I, sec. 10). This clause of the Constitution is, in terms, a limitation on the powers of the States only, and neither it nor any other clause forbids the Congress of the United States, when acting within the scope of its powers, to enact laws which may operate to impair the obligations of contract. It is on this principle that Congress has the power to enact a bankruptcy law under which debtors may be discharged of their debts at the time of the enactment of the law, while the power of the States in this respect is limited to the discharge of subsequent debts.

Then I am furnished by the distinguished Senator from North Dakota another authority taken from a decision of the Supreme Court of the United States. I read from the case of Louisville & Nashville Railroad Co. v. Mottley (219 U.S.R. 467), the following quotation extracted from that decision:

An act of Congress rendering contracts in regard to interstate commerce invalid does not infringe on the constitutional liberty of the citizens to make contracts; an act otherwise constitutional under the fifth amendment as taking private property without due compensation because it invalidates contracts between individuals which conflict with the public policy in the act.

Then I am furnished with a comment taken from Eightieth American Law Reporter, 638, which I read, as follows:

Article I, section 10, of the Federal Constitution is also discussed in the so-called "Sinking Fund Cases" (99 U.S. 700; 146 U.S. 162; 186 U.S. 181; 58 L.R.A. 900). See also Due Process of Law, L.R.A. 6, page 433. Fourteenth amendment does not impair police power of State (113 U.S. 27). On impairing the obligation of contract (see Modern Woodmen Case, 80 A.L.R. 638).

Having placed these in the RECORD, which I hope may in due time be perused by Senators who are dubious on the question, I trust Senators will have an entirely different viewpoint then, because it is within the contemplation of the Constitution of the United States that the Congress may afford debtors a way and a method by which they can be relieved of their debts. It is also contemplated by the exercise of that power that debtors may retain certain parts of their property. As an example, the present bankruptcy laws of the United States specifically stipulate that when a debtor is discharged he can claim for himself the property that is exempted to him free from seizure under the homestead laws of the State.

In my State, for example, there is exempted from seizure land to the extent of 160 acres. In the State of Texas a great deal more is exempt than is exempted in the State of Louisiana. So it is within the power of Congress to prescribe any limitation and to prescribe certain properties which may be exempted as a result of the enactment of State laws, or with or without them. If that is within the power of the Congress, I see no particular reason why, under the liberal construction of the Constitution today, in the discharge of private debts this power may not be extended to allow a man to retain certain property by paying for it over a long period of time and at stated intervals, at a definite stated percentage of the total, with a certain rate of interest fixed. Even though it were without interest, I still conceive that under any liberal interpretation of the Constitution this would be interpreted to be a valid provision under the Constitution.

It is high time we begin to think a little. I was surprised to hear it said that this is a wicked exercise of legislative power. I read from the Scriptures to show that, instead of being wicked exercise of constitutional power, it is a good exercise, a proper exercise, the kind of exercise of power that has been commanded through the law and through the gospel. I read not only the specific instructions that those debts should be remitted in this manner but I read from the fifth chapter of the Book of Nehemiah to show that it had been done in exactly this manner, and where exempted property had been turned back without the discretion or consideration given to the creditor such as is provided in the amendment offered by the Senator from North Dakota.

Now, I am going to show something else. I am going to show that this was the law of America at one time. I am going to show that this country was settled under that law. I am going to read the original contract and the original law under which the Pilgrims came to this country and landed here. I am going to show that they came here to establish a country based on the law of the Lord, signed up and sealed and delivered, and that they did establish a colony which led to the settlement of a large part of this country, and gave a large support to this country by making a contract based upon the law of the Lord.

I read from The Bradford History, presented by the New England Society in the city of New York to its members, the original volume of which I think was published a number of years ago, this copy being reprinted in the year 1899. I read from page 56 of this book, containing the stipulations that were signed.

Here are the articles that were signed:

It will be meete I here inserte these conditions, which are as foloweth—

Says the author of this book; and here they are—

Anº: 1620. July 1.

This is the Pilgrims' contract, signed when they came to settle America:

1. The adventurers & planters doe agree, that every person that goeth being aged 16. years & upward, be rated at 10li., and ten pounds to be accounted a single share.

2. That he that goeth in person, and furnisheth him selfe out with 10li. either in money or other provissions, be accounted as haveing 20li. in stock, and in ye devission shall receive a double share.

3. The persons transported & ye adventurers shall continue their joynt stock & partnership togeather, ye space of 7. years, (excepte some unexpected impedimente doe cause ye whole company to agree otherwise,) during which time, all profits & benefits that are gott by trade, traffick, trucking, working, fishing, or any other means of any person or persons, remaine still in ye cōmone stock untill ye division.

4. That at their cōming ther, they chose out such a number of fitt persons, as may furnish their ships and boats for fishing upon ye sea; imploying the rest in their severall faculties upon ye land; as building houses, tilling, and planting ye ground, & makeing shuch cōmodities as shall be most usefull for ye collonie.

Here is where I come to it:

5. That at ye end of ye 7. years—

This is the Pilgrims' covenant, now—

5. That at ye end of ye 7. years, ye capitall & profits, viz. the houses, lands, goods and chatles, be equally devided betwixte ye adventurers, and planters; wch done, every man shall be free from other of them of any debt or detrimente concerning this adventure.

In other words, it was written—and I will read the rest of this in just a moment—in the fifth clause of the contract made by the Pilgrims that at the end of the seventh year there would not be a debt left on one of those men owing to the other. We have been parading up and down this country for the past 300 years on the virtue and stability and good, sound common sense of the Pilgrim Fathers.

We have extolled the landing of the Pilgrims and the wonderful example they set to the world; and the first thing they did before they undertook to establish it was to declare that at the end of 7 years they were going to follow the Lord's command, and not have one of them bound down to the other by debt to a point where they would reach the cannibalistic condition that America has reached under the debts that it cannot pay today.

I have been reading from the contract made by the Pilgrims; and they could well afford to make that kind of a covenant, because they came to America, bowed upon the soil of America, and kissed the sacred ground on which they had been permitted to land by the great Jehovah, consecrating themselves to carrying out on this land the law as it had been commanded by the Holy Writ, which had not been observed in the country they had left.

That is how the colony was founded, Mr. President—on the condition that at the end of the 7 years the colonists were going to have a fair sharing and a remission of debts as commanded through the laws of the Gospel.

6. Whosoever cometh to yº colonie hereafter, or putteth any into ye stock, shall at the end of ye 7. years be alowed proportionably to ye time of his so doing.

Then they go on with one or two other little paragraphs which are not material but which merely carry out the purport of what I have already read, which is entirely sufficient to show that we are not proposing anything evil here. We are following the laws of the Scripture and the examples of the founders of this country in trying to give relief from debt and a chance to breathe the spirit of a new life to the 125,000,000 American people, a large part of whom are farmers, who would be affected by the amendment offered by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. FRAZIER].

Mr. President, I submit that it is high time that we should do this. I think I can show the reasons.

A short time ago we were all misled by the great amount of favorable publicity that was being given to what we were experimenting upon.

Everybody was complimenting the experiments that were about to be made. I think I was a great deal better friend to all of the Congress than some other men were when I expressed my doubt as to the feasibility of those experiments. I think I served a better cause. Although I voted for most of the experiments, reluctantly in many cases, I think it was better that I should have stated my forebodings at the time that I did so. However, others went ahead and complimented the various and sundry experiments that we were going to try out. I did not think they were going to work. I could not see sense in some of them, any more than I can see sense in some of them now; but in a nonpartisan fashion, sponsored by all the general claptrap and hurrally and the spirit of the mob that goes with it, nearly everybody was in accord that everything that was being done was going to be holy and perfect.

I have before me now the New York Times of Friday, May 4, 1934. The very gentlemen who condemned the kind of criticisms that some of us saw fit to make, the gentlemen who saw nothing but fire and destruction in the philosophy of those of us who had misgivings in regard to what was being done and saw fit to express them at the time, now appear here in Washington, and here are 10 specifications of the United States Chamber of Commerce in which they lambast everything from Genesis to Revelation that has been done here in the past year or so. They find everything to have brought about calamity. They find nothing but fire and the sword and sinking and demoralizing influences in everything that has been done, they say. They can find no good in these things now. They did not intend to find any good in them, even though they had worked out better than they actually have worked out. They were simply biding their time until things had passed along, and the administration had lost a great deal of its power to put things over; and then, like somebody that slept behind a log, they would get up and show their heads and come out again.

I never did think these men were sincere in the lip service they were doing to the praise of the kind of things we were enacting, nor did I believe they were sincere in their belief and in their advocacy that any good was going to come from them. What these gentlemen were doing was to encourage these unworkable theories so as to keep their advocates playing with baby rattles in the corner, to keep them from doing the kind of things that had been advocated here that the people were really demanding. What they were doing was to keep up some kind of a smoke and a rabble and a procession and music, beating the drum to attract people's attention to theories that they did not think were going to work, to keep them from proceeding along the lines of substantial reform that would have worked and which they do not want.

These people wanted the administration to get into these various and sundry side pockets. They wanted them not to adopt the inflation measures that we had been trying to enact. They did not want silver remonetized. They did not want taxes levied at the top in order that wealth might be distributed at the bottom. They did not want the farmer relieved of his debts. They did not want agriculture to come out, to the destruction of the various and sundry mechanics of marketing from which they had profited through what the farmer had raised. So they got up various and sundry fulminations, and encouraged every kind of experimental theory, and put everybody off in the corner with a baby rattle and a Jew's harp, or something else to play on, until the time came when they could just get up and make a general shout that all these new theories had been tried and would not work, and the only thing that could be done was to go back to their old order.

We fell for it. What these men are trying to do now, and what we are having to fight against today, is to keep from being whipsawed from both sides. Here on one side are the theorists who ask for the right to experiment. Here on the other side are the Tories, who want everything to go along the route of the laissez-faire doctrine.

Here we were trying to use the processes that had always brought a country out. We were trying to expand silver. We were trying to provide more money in the country. We were trying to give the people a chance to get from under debt. We were trying to do sane, sensible, progressive things advocated by men who had sat here in the House of Representatives and in the Senate of the United States for 25 or 26 years, and whose policies had been lauded by their people all the time. But, oh, no; we could not listen to them. We had to go out here and look up some men with a bifocal spectacle over his eyes so thick that you could not drive a bullet through it unless you had a lot of power behind it. We had to go out here and get hold of somebody who uses a spirit level and a compass and a magnifying glass; and suddenly, out of his great mind, the fulminations spouted out something, and we ran and adopted it the next day without reading a line of it, or ever having it advertised among the people to see what they thought about it. No; we had to go out here and try these experiments, and the very men who are today criticizing the administration for doing it are the men who supported the efforts to put these experiments over and to keep the people's minds distracted on things of that kind, instead of along constructive lines that would have meant something to the people.

Now they want to go out and bait the trap, and have the fight come off next November, on the question whether the people should select the old Tory system or this baby-rattling system we have been trying out. They do not want to let the sound, progressive type of legislation have a chance. They want to make us compare our baby-rattler system with the old Tory system. One means bearing a man to the grave with music, the other means taking him there without a song. It makes no difference. A dead man does not need music anyway.

They come out today and criticize the President. They criticize everything he has done and the greatest hope we have is that they will keep up this criticism, and the President will find that their applause for anything he sets out to do means that he is bound to be nearer wrong than right. He will find out that their advice is never given with any intent of helping the country, unless it gives them a special privilege which they are not entitled to have.

So I do not read with approval the criticisms of the Chamber of Commerce of the United States. I learn rather with a spirit of pity that this source of applause is turned into one of condemnation, as showing that we ought to proceed along the course on which we ran our campaign, when we pledged that we were going to free the people of debt, were going to lighten the load of the people of the country.

The people thought they were turning to what had been advocated in the Congress, which had been defeated by the party in power. The people thought that they were turning to the kind of constructive policies that they had had years to investigate and many months to study.

What does the chamber of commerce say, as we find it in the New York Times?

DEFECTS IN NATIONAL RECOVERY PROGRAM AS SEEN BY COMMERCE CHAMBER SPEAKERS

WASHINGTON, May 3.—Points raised against the national recovery program in today's session of the annual convention of the Chamber of Commerce of the United States included the following:

"(1) The tax burden is becoming unbearable, if not confiscatory, according to Silas H. Strawn, of Chicago."

Oh, yes; his tax burden is becoming unbearable, because of what? Why is the tax burden on any of them any heavier than it was? That is not what is worrying them. It is not the National Government's tax burden that is restraining their prosperity. They brag about the theory of the income tax which England has working so successfully. Nothing we have proposed here would have taken half the toll off the big interests or the little interests that the income tax is taking in the British Isles today. So that is a great effort to beguile the people into a false channel.

What is the second specification of failure on the part of the Roosevelt administration which the Chamber of Commerce of the United States alleges?

"2. The administration's railroad policy indicates a strong possibility of Government ownership of the carriers, despite the help already advanced to them, in the opinion of Harry A. Wheeler, of Chicago."

It is not the administration's policy that indicates public ownership of railroads; it is the policy of the financial interests, of those who finance the railroads, and of those who have allowed them to go on for the last several years. That indicates Government ownership of railroads. They overwatered the railroads, they overbonded them. It was a fault on the part of the carriers. Then, after they had been allowed to load themselves down with securities and financing which they could not discharge, we set up the Interstate Commerce Commission, and they began to make rules and regulations under which they would cooperate.

We made water transportation free, and it became a competitor of the railroads, and we taxed the railroads to build the waterways.

We made the public highways free, and we built paved highways over which trucks could go, and we made the free travel ways over which trucks could travel, and we taxed the railroads to help build the highways.

Then we began to expand, and we are trying to expand passenger travel through the air, and we subsidized and paid a great deal of money to airplane companies so that they would be able to carry passengers through the air. The Government paid the cost of developing the waterways, and taxed the railroads to help do it. The Government has paid the cost of building the highways, and it has taxed the railroads to help build them. The Government is subsidizing the airplane companies, and has taxed the railroads to help do that. Then they have such a machinated set of rules and regulations that a spirit level and a compass and the Egyptian emperor's soothsayer could not find out what the answer was if he studied for a week, and I cannot if I study for a year.

Under this kind of restriction and regulation the railroads have been attempting to find a way to live. There is no way for the railroads to live under the conditions, and the administration is not responsible for the conditions. The conditions were here when this administration came into power.

In just a moment I will state what the administration can do to get out of the difficulty. I will give the answer to all these criticisms, I will give the answer to every one of them, and the answer is, as was expressed here the other day in an editorial in the Philadelphia Record, that the President of the United States has gone too far trying to placate the Tories and conservative men. The trouble is in his undertaking to placate them and to accept advice from them, and then to communicate to the Congress their opinion. That is the cause of the trouble which afflicts us, for there is brought about a condition which they urge as a justification for this character of criticism I am reading now.

"(3) The processing tax is causing an appreciable reduction in the wheat consumption of the country, according to Fred J. Lingham, of Lockport, N.Y."

Certainly it is. Did we not say so here? The people did not advocate the processing tax, or they kept quiet about it. Certainly the processing tax is having that effect. They knew that all the time. That is nothing to blame anybody for. They are as much to blame for it as anyone else. I will give the answer to that criticism in just a moment, when I shall have completed reading these specifications.

The fourth criticism of the United States Chamber of Commerce against the recovery program is as follows:

"(4) Placing commodity exchanges under Government control would work havoc with prices for farm products, predicted Thomas Y. Wickham, of Chicago."

I will give an answer to that in just a moment.

"(5) The foreign-trade program is doomed to failure unless those affected are consulted, said James A. Farrell, of New York."

Oh, yes; that is a great thing. I will give a general answer to that in just a moment, but I will make specific reference to it now.

The foreign-trade program is doomed to failure unless those affected are consulted.

Whom are they to consult? Whom do they mean as the persons affected? The farmers of this country, whose produce has to be exported, or the exchanges, which think they are the masters of the export and import business of this country?

If there is any fault, it is because there has not been consultation with the man back in the interior, rather than the men found in the Chamber of Commerce of the United States.

The sixth specification of criticism by the United States Chamber of Commerce is as follows:

"(6) Increased expenditures and reduced receipts will raise the national public debt from $16,000,000,000 in 1930 to $32,000,000,000 in 1935, according to Fred H. Clausen, of Horicon, Wis."

Nobody is denying that. Everybody knows that we have run the public debt up to around thirty-two or thirty-three billion dollars, and it will probably go on up to $35,000,000,000 in the next few months.

Who is responsible for that? The United States Chamber of Commerce and the men who have been sponsoring it have been urging it as much as anybody else. They have been the chief instigators of it. They advocated it when many on the Democratic side were opposed to it, that the only thing to do was to go to spending money, to keep from taxing them. They urged that the Government ought to issue bonds and go in the hole instead of making them pay more. I will give an answer to that under the general answer I am going to give to all these questions in just a moment.

"(7) Arbitrary regulations of the Public Works Administration are preventing any revival of the construction industry under the Government expenditures authorized, in the opinion of Nick F. Helmers, of St. Paul, Minn.

"(8) Jurisdictional disputes and overlapping and conflicting claims are being written into the N.R.A. codes, according to Gilbert H. Montague, of New York."

Oh, yes. Who is it that is trying to put the N.R.A. code over? In the meeting called here of the Chamber of Commerce of the United States, among the first things Mr. Harriman did was to state that they had to stick by the N.R.A. codes, was it not? They have undertaken to enshrine themselves in the control of the National Recovery Act under the N.R.A. codes. None of them is being prosecuted, says General Hugh Johnson, because they have such skillful lawyers that they go so close to shore that there is no such thing as convicting one of them. They are the ones in charge, and if there has been any failure of the N.R.A. and if the N.R.A. is subject to any criticism, it is because of the fact that it has been left in the hands of the very type of men and the named men who are in this Chamber of Commerce of the United States leveling this criticism at the program of the President today. They are the ones who are responsible for it.

They wrote the oil code and they have written every other code, and they have been consulted in connection with them, and have been placed over most of them, and now they come in, after they have helped ditch the whole program, when they have practically destroyed it in their attempt to pervert it to their own selfish interests and aggrandizement, and undertake to level a criticism at somebody else.

The trouble is that these people were allowed to come in and make the codes. They are now criticizing their handiwork, and well it is that they should. We criticized them before ever they were brought here, because we knew they were going to do what they did, and we knew they would then go out and raise a loud clamor and undertake to saddle the responsibility on the new deal and then say, "Turn the thing back into our hands."

Oh, no; if you make a failure of the new deal, Messrs. Tories, we are not going to turn this Government back over to you. You may manage to saddle it down with theories and nostrums and palliatives and everything else to the point where it cannot possibly succeed, but when you come back here and hollo that the new deal has completely failed, and say "Now, turn the thing back to us", we are not going to do any such thing. This is the time, and the first time, when we are going to stand here and demand that we be given the opportunity to put into effect, and that the people be given a chance to have put into effect, the things they have clamored for all these years. We are not going to let the Tories build up a straw man and then chuck him down and say, "He will not work. Turn the Government back over to us." That is what they are trying to do here now.

Specification no. 9 against the recovery program:

"Political affiliations play an important part in an applicant's qualifications for a loan or grant under the P.W.A."

I do not doubt that. I am not arguing about that. But these very interests have been ingratiating themselves in the political inside of the House ever since it started. Whose political affiliations? Does anyone mean to say that they have been shoved away from their seat at the throne? Have they not been there more than anyone else has been there? Who has been there more than they have been there? What do they mean, coming out here with a great big Nation-wide public criticism now, when they have had the head of the American Telephone & Telegraph Co. writing one code and the head of the Standard Oil Co. writing another code, and they have had someone else writing still another code? And now they come out and say the whole thing does not work.

Of course it would not work, when such a gang as that is called in. That is the trouble.

Mr. President, I will tell the Senate the way this statement in the paper should read, if it were written in the true way and as I should rewrite it. If I were going to do it, I would put acid on the whole thing, and write there that the entire recovery program is threatened with failure because the same old set which, to begin with, sent this country to hell has been allowed to come in and participate in the handling of the recovery program. That is the way this thing should read. That is all that ought to be put in the paper. We ought not to leave the drawing of these specifications with them. They had more to do with the threatened failure of the program than anyone else, because they did most of the things that would cause it to fail. All that is needed to be put in here is that this recovery program is threatened with calamity because of the fact that the gang which brought the country to the brink of disaster, and then pitched us in the stream, has been allowed to participate in the main part in whatever has been done. That is what ought to be put in the paper.

Let us read their tenth specification.

"10. The Securities Act and the proposed stock-exchange control bill have caused almost complete cessation of private investment."

That is the last one.

Now Mr. President, I will make an answer to all this. I will make an answer a part of which will be defense and part of which will not be defense, but I will make an answer to it all.

When we came into power, Mr. President, on the 4th day of March 1933 we came into power with the country in a bogged-down, paralyzed, entangled, besmirched, discredited condition throughout, in all its activities. The condition of the banks was only a symptom of the tottering condition of the country. Nothing could be sold. The people did not have money with which to buy. The people could not consume because they could not buy. The people could not get any more credit. They already had too much credit. There already existed $250,000,000,000 to $275,000,000,000 worth of debt which the people owed. They already had too much credit. The country had no business operating on such credit basis.

When this administration came in there was only one way under God's sun of getting the country out of its trouble. This administration, when it took hold, had only one way under the shining heaven to get the country out of that kind of morass. The only way the administration could do it, which was the first thing to do, was to give the people a sufficient supply of money to start the intercourse of business and to secure freedom from their debts. That is the first thing, though not the main thing, the administration had to do. That was the necessary vehicle to carry us back to prosperity.

The next thing they had to do was by positive law, a positive unequivocal, nonpreferential law, to shorten the hours of labor universally and in all industry. I am not sure that 6 hours a day and 5 days a week are short enough. But the first thing they had to do, as I said, was to allow an adequate currency. Silver had to be remonetized or an adequate currency otherwise furnished.

As I said, the second thing they had to do was to shorten the hours of labor so we would begin to catch up with the production by consumption of products. That was the second thing the administration had to do.

Third, it had to provide for a system of public works so that we might take up the slack immediately.

The fourth thing the administration had to do was to pay for this cost of recovery through taxation to be levied on the big fortunes at the top, so that they might be dragged down to where the Government would not only have the money with which to give employment to its citizens and to stimulate business, but to destroy the disproportion existing between the man on the bottom and the man at the top, and in that manner, pulling down these fortunes from the top, giving the Government a sufficient revenue to carry on its program. Then the Government would proceed to use that fund, spreading it through the Treasury of the United States to the man needing employment, stimulating employment, thereby giving a purchasing power to the masses so that business could begin to revive.

Mr. President, with an adequate currency, and the shortening of the hours of work, America would not have been standing where it is now, 1 year and 2 months later, with conditions getting worse. We would have been out of this depression long ago. We would have gone out of it, Mr. President, so quickly that it would have been surprising to any man.

What did we do? Did we do those things? We promised them. That is what we promised to do. That was the Democratic Party's promise.

How much of it did we do? We started out to remonetize silver and expand the currency. The Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER], the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. THOMAS], the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH], myself, and several others fought here, until finally one day we voted within a few votes of expanding the currency and remonetizing silver.

Mr. President, we heard that we had won the fight. I was in New York at the time, and they sent for my friend from Oklahoma [Mr. THOMAS] to come to the White House. I read this in the newspaper. He did not tell me anything about how it came about that he went down there. I just take it for granted that we all know the facts, and I am not violating any confidence in repeating what the newspapers published. The Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. THOMAS] was sent for, and he came back to Congress and introduced the bill which was supposed to result in our victory, giving the permissive authority to the bureaus and the Executive to expand the currency and to remonetize silver. That is the last we heard about those proposed laws. In other words, we could not get the laws which we were undertaking to sponsor enacted into law, because these very gentlemen who are now condemning the course which has been pursued were against it for one thing and the main thing. But we could get a law through that allowed the Government to expand the currency.

I desire to ask someone in this Chamber if it meant, when we passed that law to authorize an expansion of currency, that we were going to contract it? I want to know if anyone on the Democratic side of the Chamber or on the Republican side of the Chamber ever thought that we went through all that fight and all that compromise to get the final effect of the currency being reduced from $6,068,000,000 down to $5,300,000,000? That is what we did. We are here today—1 year after that so-called "victory"—we are here today after we were supposed to have won that fight, and the currency of the United States, which, on the 19th day of April 1933, was $6,068,000,000, is now $5,324,000,000 or a reduction in money of over $700,000,000.

That, Mr. President, is no. 1. After all the fighting we did we are no nearer to remonetizing silver now than we were then.

Mr. President, we have done one more thing besides all that. We have today $5,300,000,000 in currency, as against $6,000,000,000 on the 19th day of April a year ago. But the dollar that is standing out today is supposed to be a 59-cent dollar, and it is that for foreign exchange. So we have fifty-nine one-hundredths of $5,300,000,000, as against 100 cents on the dollar of $6,000,000,000 a year ago. We have today on the basis of foreign exchange a circulating money currency value of $3,500,000,000 as against $6,000,000,000 a year ago. That is the condition. So that one thing which we had advocated as necessary for the restoration of this country on this side of the Chamber and on the other side of the Chamber has not only not been done but, despite the so-called "compromise" that was effected by the Wheeler-Thomas-Smith-Long bloc and the President and the reactionaries, we are today worse off with respect to the currency than we were when we started. That is no. 1.

No. 2. Did we shorten the hours of labor? We had here the Black bill, introduced by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BLACK], to reduce the working hours to a maximum of 30 hours a week, but along came amendments to exclude certain interests from the purposes of that bill. They wanted to except cotton gins. I was from Louisiana and the South, and I led the fight on this floor to keep them from excluding cotton gins, because I did not want that measure to be mutilated to the point where it would, to the slightest extent, admit of exceptions to destroy its benefits. What became of the Black bill? The Black bill, the 30-hour week bill, passed the Senate and went over to the House, but it has never been heard of since. On the contrary, the Speaker of the House of Representatives gave out a statement about the same day we finally disposed of the Black bill in which he said that it did not have any chance of passing the House. Who told him that or why was he telling us that? Somebody evidently had told him something. I do not suppose he was speaking from his own knowledge. Evidently he communicated with somebody, because when the bill left here to shorten the hours of work, it never received any such thing as consideration in the other House.

They came along with the codes under the N.R.A. law and said, "This is our substitute for the Black bill; we are going to shorten the hours of labor and take up the slack through the N.R.A. codes; we are not going to have a compulsory law that will press down upon the brow of industry like a crown of thorns; we are going to call men together and have one of these love feasts; we are going to call upon the brotherhood of man; we are going to sit there with the big brother and the little brother, and get a code up."

My goodness, Senators, when are you going to find out that you cannot sit down at a table with that kind of men without getting eaten up yourselves? They never look at anything except across the table, and they are cannibals when they go there, and they leave worse than they were when they started.

However, we went into an N.R.A. code system under the National Recovery Act. I voted against it; I voted to strike the code authority out of the bill. I knew it was not going to be anything except a disguise; I knew it was not going to be anything except a smoke screen to put us to sleep again until the Congress should adjourn and keep from passing a compulsory law to shorten the hours of work. So we went home with the statement ringing in our ears that they would pull the country out of its difficulties with the N.R.A. Have they pulled the country out with the N.R.A.? Well, according to the last statistics I obtained, there are 800,000 more unemployed men in the United States, not including a proper survey of farmers, than there were in the month of last October; it has gone the other way; and there are admitted to be somewhere around 11,000,000 unemployed in the United States today.

That has been what we have yielded to as a result of the clamor and advice that has been given by gentlemen such as the leaders of the United States Chamber of Commerce, who are now criticizing the Democratic administration for what it has done. I knew they were going to do it. I said on this floor that they would be back here when the President's power was crimped, criticizing and condemning him in time for the fall election; and they are here doing just what I said they would do. So much for that bill. So we did not get the currency; we did not get a shortening of the hours of labor; we got nothing.

What was the third thing and why was it not done? Did we begin to tax at the top? No. I wonder if anybody wants me to read it again. I have read it so many times that I have worn it out. We came in promising that we were going to see that the big fortunes were pulled down at the top and that people were relieved of their debts and the country would have money to run on by building the little man up from the bottom at the same time. Did we do it?

The President of the United States made a speech a few days before he went into office in which he said that 200 industries in America were already controlling 45 percent of the business. What is the condition now? Since he went into office, according to Mr. Lawrence Dennis, in the article which he published last month, those 200 corporations control 55 percent of the business of this country today; their control has gone up 10 percent; and, as a result of it, they come here and publish 10 reasons to show why the Roosevelt administration ought to be hung. We did not give them enough. I knew we were not going to satisfy them; they cannot be satisfied.

So we have failed to turn the wheel the other way, as we said we would do, through our illustrious candidate, whom I supported for the nomination and for election and whom I yet want to see succeed, and I wanted to see succeed all the time. I wonder if I will be known to be sincere now? I advised against the things that these men advised for. I advised that he go along the old lines as he had pronounced and that he not allow his plans to be mellowed nor compromised by these men. I wonder if I will be given credit for being sincere now about it? The President said, if we did not check that condition whereby 200 industries control 45 percent of the business, that we would soon be an oligarchy run by two or three hundred men owning everything. The condition is 25 percent worse this year than it was then. The only difference is that they are operating as a government now, whereas they were not doing so then. That is the picture of what we promised.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, I rise to a point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LEWIS in the chair). The Senator from Michigan will state his point of order.

Mr. COUZENS. Is it not a rule of the Senate that a Senator must remain at his own seat when he is addressing the Senate?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The present occupant of the chair is unable to recall that there is such a rule, although that sometimes is the habit. It may develop that the Senator now addressing the Senate is indicating a change of mind by a change of position. [Laughter.]

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I am glad the Chair did not invoke the rule because such a ruling would have victimized the present occupant very badly. I wish to say further, Mr. President, that I stand right where I always stand—all over the floor of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Whatever position the Senator from Louisiana takes, however varying, the present occupant of the chair is sure it satisfies his conscience.

Mr. LONG. Coming back to these matters, I have read the law of the Pilgrims. I, myself, am going to read a little authority beyond our platform, after I have given the proof by some examples. I read, Mr. President, from page 2 of the Washington Post, as follows:

> United States spends $14,000 per minute, day and night, last 10 months. For every dollar collected Government has put out $2.34.

I contend that the Government ought to spend every dollar it is spending, but I also contend that the way the Government ought to be getting the money, instead of going into debt, is to lop off the swollen fortunes at the top and spread the money out among the masses at the bottom. The article from the Washington Post continues:

> Uncle Sam has been passing out an average of $14,000 every 60 seconds, day and night, for the past 10 months, according to the Associated Press.

Government spending for the first 10 months of the present fiscal year has averaged $19,152,392.14 a day.

Against this expenditure it has collected a daily average of $8,184,154.89. This means that $10,968,237.25 of every day's expenditure is borrowed.

In other words, for every $1 collected the Government had spent $2.34, of which $1.28 went to emergency recovery expenditures.

Since last July 1 the Government expended in all about $5,822,427,211—a figure made up of $2,591,838,460 of routine running costs and $3,230,588,750 of emergency recovery spending. Receipts in the same period have been $2,487,983,087.

This leaves a deficit of $3,334,444,123. But only 2 months remain of the fiscal year and the Budget Bureau estimated a deficit of more than $7,000,000,000 by June 30.

Manifestly, Mr. President, we cannot stop spending this money. Under present conditions we cannot stop spending this money. It is not possible to turn these men back into idleness. It is not possible to turn these people loose without something to eat and without clothing to wear. We have to continue to spend this money, but we cannot carry the country much further into debt to do it. We are approaching the vanishing point of our national credit. When we get up to $35,000,000,000 of national debt we have gone a long ways. But we can spend the money; and we can see a way by which we can stop the expenditures in a few years, or possibly in a few months, if instead of issuing bonds we remonetize silver and expand the currency and tax from the top, where the big fortunes are found, until we bring them down to frying size. We can continue to spend the money if, instead of issuing Government bonds and going further into debt, we will tax the big fortunes at the top to raise the necessary money.

But manifestly a country that spends $10,000,000,000 and gets in only $3,000,000,000 cannot continue to be a financially solvent country for a very long time. We cannot safely issue $7,000,000,000 more of bonds next year and run our national indebtedness up to $40,000,000,000, and issue $7,000,000,000 the following year and run it up to $47,000,000,000. No one thinks we can continue to do that. Our bonded indebtedness has gone from $16,000,000,000 to $33,000,000,000. Our money supply has gone from $6,000,000,000 down to $5,300,000,000. Manifestly that is a situation which admits of its own destruction.

Difficult as it may seem to anyone, yet there is a remedy by which we can continue the expenditures as long as may be necessary, and improve the fiscal condition of the country every day that we do it, by breaking down the big fortunes until the little man begins to have an earning power. Not only is the Government paralyzed, not only is the Government Treasury depleted, not only is it becoming overbonded with debt, but if we begin to take off of the big fortunes we would begin to loosen up conditions and the situation would begin to unfreeze. The little man could compete with the big man. We would have industries and business thriving and owned by the people everywhere, as we once had. Instead of a chain store extending throughout the length and breadth of the country under the direction of a single fountainhead, we would have thousands and thousands of stores like we used to have, prosperous and owned by little men, scattered throughout the United States, owned by people of medium circumstances, and yet well-to-do because they are independent. But we cannot have it as long as the wealth of the country is practically under the control of a dozen men. Until we have torn down that condition, we face ruin.

Perhaps I am foolish. It may be that I am. I am rather old-fashioned. I believe, as Daniel Webster did, that the Bible means what it says. I realize I am now speaking in the highest legislative tribunal in the world—at least, we claim it is, whether it is so or not, and lots of people think it. Yet I wish to say there is no one here who can point to a single country that ever existed long that did not go to destruction when it failed to recognize and deal with what we are facing now. There has never been a country that did not go to rack and ruin when it continued to allow its wealth to be concentrated in a few hands. That is what America has done. I am saying here and now—and these words may be just as prophetic as what I said here in the year 1932—that Senators will look back to this day 2 years from today, and they will think what we have now is much better than what we will have then. They will look back, if they are allowed to look back. They may not be allowed to take a look, for aught I know.

Here is another dispatch which appeared in today's Washington Post, on page 7, showing the way the people look on what we are doing, showing the temper of the people. Mr. President, the temper of the people is not an indication except that there is bound to be something behind it to excite the people. The headline is, "Iowa Farmers Cheer Wallace Ouster Demand." Mr. Wallace is from Iowa.

I tried to get a member of the Cabinet appointed from Louisiana. I proposed a mighty good man, I thought, and if he had gone into the Cabinet from Louisiana, my State would have been very happy and proud of it. I have no doubt the people of Iowa felt the same way. We would have stood by almost anything to have backed up a Cabinet member from Louisiana. Conditions would have had to get powerfully worse than they are now for us to condemn him, even though he had been Secretary of Agriculture, appointed from Louisiana.

Here is a dispatch from Iowa, the home of the splendid young man who is Secretary of Agriculture. I think he is doing everything he can, everything that he knows how to do. Limited within the sphere in which he has been allowed to operate, tied down by the laws that surround him, he is probably doing as well as I could do in that kind of a job. I do not think he is doing it any better because, between us, Mr. President, I believe he knows no more about it than I do. I think he is doing as well as he can.

But here is Iowa talking about Iowa's native son:

IOWA FARMERS CHEER WALLACE OUSTER DEMAND—2,000 STAND AND CHEER WHEN RESOLUTION WINS

DES MOINES, IOWA, May 3.—The resignation of Secretary of Agriculture Henry A. Wallace was demanded by a gathering estimated to number 2,000 persons at the National Farmers' Holiday Association Convention today.

I know this will be a terrible bit of news to come to my friend the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH], who is at the head of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry of the Senate. I know this will not be the wonderful result he thought he was going to get for the efforts he has put forth here. I know he will be disappointed to see his own Secretary of Agriculture condemned in the home State of that Secretary. If I were serving in that position and had given the time and study to it that the eminent Chairman of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry in this body has done, and I saw the Secretary whom I had sponsored so long criticized in his own State and condemned for the results he had achieved, I know it would awaken me, and I would begin to reckon with events. I think events like this have been largely responsible for a very wonderful piece of legislation that has come out of that committee, in the form of an amendment which I offered to a bill now pending before the Senate, early to be acted upon.

Let me read what the Iowa farmers said yesterday about their native son:

The resignation of Secretary of Agriculture Henry A. Wallace was demanded by a gathering estimated to number 2,000 persons at the National Farmers' Holiday Association Convention today. Standing and cheering—

Listen to this, because it will show Senators how the people look on this business:

Standing and cheering, the group adopted a resolution presented by Governor William Langer, of North Dakota—

He is the man who is under indictment—petitioning President Roosevelt to remove Secretary Wallace.

There is something funny about that, Mr. President. That is rather an abnormal thing. Here is a man who is under indictment as a result of Federal Government activities, who moves at a mass meeting of farmers that they ask the President to remove the native son of Iowa who is Secretary of Agriculture, and unanimously 2,000 farmers stand up and cheer lustily to show their approval of the idea and of the petition to remove Mr. Wallace, the only man Iowa has had in the Cabinet for a long time.

I read further:

Earlier Milo Reno, president of the association, had termed Wallace "the worst enemy the farmer has ever had in an official position", and charged agriculture had been "ruthlessly and criminally betrayed" by the Democratic administration.

I deny that the Democratic administration has betrayed them any more than anybody else. They had the same complaint against the Republican administration. They have the same complaint now that they had then, perhaps; certainly no worse.

Late in the afternoon session the convention heard the Reverend Charles E. Coughlin, of Royal Oak, Mich., in an appeal for the farmers to battle what he termed "the Dillingers of high finance."

It is necessary to identify Father Coughlin. He was the most sincere, outspoken supporter that we have had, not politically speaking. He was backing up everything we were doing and shouting to give it a trial, shouting that it was either this thing or worse. What does he say?

The nationally known pastor of the Church of the Little Flower attacked the Federal Reserve banking system, defended rehabilitation of silver, and criticized crop-reduction programs.

"To the class legislation which has existed in our Nation in favor of the central bankers we stand opposed today and tomorrow and until such a day as we can restore to the people of this country their God-given rights", Father Coughlin said.

"Unless the farmers can accomplish this your meetings are in vain.

"This is the Gettysburg being fought between the disorganized and exploited agricultural class and laboring class of this country on one side and the handful of international bankers and Government riggers on the other.

"Against you are arrayed almost 50 percent of the mighty news journals of this Nation."

That is from Father Coughlin. No one deplores more than I do to see those signs. I do not deplore the criticism so much as I do the fact that it signifies that we are slipping, that we are failing to go forward along lines that we knew would save our prosperity, redeem our farmers, stabilize our credit, expand our agriculture, alleviate our debt, and breathe a spirit of new hope, life, and freedom among the 125,000,000 people of America.

I regret it because it is the cry of despair. I regret it because it shows that someone has surrendered and given up; that a group of people, with their State pride—and I know the citizens of Iowa have it as much as anyone—are so disgusted at what has been done and not been done that they demand the removal of their own son from the high position he occupies as a Cabinet officer of the Government. I deplore it. I regret it. I would do anything I could to correct it. I did everything I could to prevent it. I counseled along lines that I thought would have helped some of it.

I now turn to read from another newspaper published here today, the Washington Herald, a Hearst paper. I read on page 5, column 7:

FORMER SOLDIER, 56, STARVES TO DEATH

Michael J. Kervin, 56, a former soldier at Fort Myer, who was found near death from starvation on an island in the Potomac River yesterday, died last night at Georgetown Hospital shortly after being admitted.

The man's plight was brought to the attention of the Clarendon rescue squad yesterday afternoon by a fisherman. He was removed from the island by firemen and taken to the hospital, but efforts to revive him were to no avail. A report several other men were living on the island was being investigated.

Over on page 6 of the same newspaper I read another report showing the kind of criticisms we are getting, which I contend can be remedied by the kind of a bill that has been introduced here, and other bills along the same line, by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. FRAZIER], but much better remedied by the silver legislation and the expansion of currency, coupled with a program which taxes from the top to reduce the swollen fortunes, and spread the wealth among the masses.

I read this report at the bottom of columns 1 and 2 on page 6 of the same paper:

TUGWELL SERVES BANKER, COUGHLIN TELLS FARMERS

DES MOINES, IOWA, May 3.—Economic equality for the farmer must result from a battle against the international banker and the philosophy of Rexford Guy Tugwell, the Rev. Charles E. Coughlin, Detroit priest, told the National Farm Holiday Association today.

The 6,000 members of the holiday group passed a unanimous resolution demanding resignation of Secretary of Agriculture Henry A. Wallace.

Father Coughlin charged:

"Tugwell wants you to sterilize your sows and wants Henry Morgenthau to sterilize the eagle on the gold dollar. The Government pays you 45 cents in corn loans as a bribe, and tomorrow Tugwell's boss will ask you to pay it back in taxes.

"You must fight not only the philosophy mouthed out by that blatherskite [Tugwell] but have power to fight his boss—the international banker."

Coughlin attacked the Federal Reserve System and the so-called "economists who teach the gospel of concentrated wealth."

Milo Reno, National Holiday president, in opening the convention, said the Roosevelt administration had "ruthlessly and criminally betrayed the American farmer", and branded Wallace as "the worst enemy the farmer ever had in official position."

I should like to turn those criticisms into commendations. We are prescribing the remedy to do it. I venture the assertion, Mr. President, that if Congress will listen to us instead of these illustrious men having this kind of criticism, a large part of which they cannot help, there would be commendation for this administration from one end of the country to the other. I should like to hear those in the moving-picture theaters cheer as they did the day our President went into office. I should like to see the hearts of people gladdened when they read the pronunciamentos coming from these distinguished advisers and members of the President's Cabinet.

I should like to see hope spring in the breasts and smiles appear on the faces of the people, the expectations of good returns again, such as they had on the 4th day of last March, rather than to have criticisms of this kind. I wanted those things to continue then. That is why I advised against the veterans' legislation, which we later came here and undid. That is why I advised against the kind of a banking bill that we took pleasure in passing the first day, to which, after a considerable fight, we managed to compel the adoption of an amendment which has been of great benefit to this administration. Had we not taken the stand that we took for the veterans, this clamor would be louder today than it is; but we have helped the administration, I believe, and our party, by having contributed to override the veto. I believe that that has helped the party, and I know that the administration is glad today that we fought the first banking bill that came in here until we compelled the adoption of an amendment guaranteeing the bank deposits not only of the Federal Reserve banks, but even of the State banks which are not members of the Federal Reserve System.

I know that that has been a good thing. Those have been two good things. The banking bill today stands as a piece of progressive legislation, and with all the criticisms that go out against the Securities Act—the Securities Act to compel the truth—I say that the Securities Act is a forward step of good legislation. I am glad that we have the present banking act. It is the right kind of an act. I am glad we have the Securities Act to prevent the liars and swindlers who have been cheating our 125,000,000 people with every kind of a wildcat nightmare that they could get them to accept. I am glad we have the National Securities Act, and I hope to see the stock exchange bill come in here without any of its teeth being pulled out, and I intend to vote for every word of it.

Those are good things; but where we made our mistake was in allowing those very disciples of iniquity who brought this country to the present brink of despair to come in here and participate in the writing of these codes.

We have allowed them to kill the 30-hour week bill. We have allowed them to kill such amendments as the Couzens amendment, which would have placed the taxes at the top to a greater extent and brought more money into the Treasury.

The trouble is, then, not along the line of the complaints which these financial masters make in the New York Times today, these 10 specifications which I have read into the RECORD. That has not been the trouble. The trouble has been that our financial masters have been allowed to share and to participate too much in what this Government has done. If we had gone ahead and shortened the hours of work, if we had gone ahead and taxed these men at the top, and had decentralized the wealth; if we had gone ahead and remonetized silver and expanded the currency, I guarantee that there would have been nothing but prosperity in the United States today. If we should do those things now, I venture the assertion that these men who met in Iowa and condemned their native son would every one go back there and apologize for what they had done. But they must be given a chance, and they have not been given a chance. The Securities Act has not been given a chance. We could protect the people from the kind of swindling to which they were subjected if we should enact a stock-exchange bill, but until we provide universally, unequivocally, without the possibility of fear or manipulation, for the shortening of the hours of work by law, we will never have anything that will be successful, and the evasions will be too great.

Why did I vote for the cotton acceptance bill? Why was it, when the Black bill was before us, that I fought against excepting cotton gins from it? For the reason that I knew that allowing one industry to write its own code was going to ruin the whole scheme of shortening the hours of work. Yet we put them all to exempting themselves and to writing the specifications of exemptions and exclusions, and I knew every one of them was going to mean the beginning of the breaking down of the law.

I do not want to disappoint my friend, the Senator from New York, who is not here. I would point out some of the errors in the N.R.A. legislation if he were here. It is not possible to work it. It cannot work.

I knew the railroad legislation would not work. I knew the provision for a Federal coordinator of railroads would not work. I helped to put that bill through. I was a member of the Interstate Commerce Commission, but the trouble with the country is that it has no money, and the people are laden down with debt. Everyone has recognized that, everyone sees it, all feel it. So we have adopted the course of bankruptcy after so long a time. That is not what we ought to have done.

Let me read now from the Proverbs.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LEWIS in the chair). Will not the Senator from Louisiana permit the present occupant of the chair to call his attention to an accidental error, where the Senator alluded to himself as a member of the Interstate Commerce Commission? The Senator meant the Interstate Commerce Committee.

Mr. LONG. I referred to the committee, of course. I was formerly a member of the Public Service Commission of Louisiana, and I get those terms mixed, between member of the committee and member of the commission. I do not want to assume any more of the troubles of this complicated Government than I already have. I will do well if I convince my people I have not had as much to do with it as I really have.

Mr. President, I was about to read from Proverbs, from the words of Solomon, supposed to have been the wisest man who ever lived; and I believe he was. I believe Solomon was the wisest man who ever lived. It is practically the universal opinion of all Christian countries that the wisest man was Solomon. In looking over the situation, with all the wisdom and experience the Creator had given him, he said this:

> Two things have I required of thee; deny me them not before I die:
> Remove far from me vanity and lies; give me neither poverty nor riches; feed me with food convenient for me:
> Lest I be full, and deny thee, and say, Who is the Lord? or lest I be poor, and steal, and take the name of my God in vain.

Proverbs, chapter 30, verses 7 to 10.

Mr. President, that is all the Government needs, right along those lines. I would rather have that today than all the articles of the Constitution of the United States. What does he say? That poverty makes a thief of humanity; and it does. We have made thieves of many of our people by impoverishing them. So Solomon says:

> Two things I ask. Give me neither great riches, that I be full and deny the Lord and the people who are the Lord's. Nor give me poverty, that I become a thief, and defile the name of the Lord, and violate His laws.

In either instance, says Solomon, the wisest of all men—not as wise as the United States Congress, oh, no, not that wise; oh, no, I would not say that. Not as wise as the Cabinet; I would not say that. Thank God for the smart men we have here. God bless them and keep them. [Laughter.] Look about the country and see how well they have done their work. It reminds me of the man who was repairing an automobile. He took everything she had out and finally could not make her run, and somebody said, "Now, take off the wheels, and your job is complete." [Laughter.] That is all they have to do now, just take off the wheels. They are wiser than Solomon.

I will be criticized by them for what I am reading here now. Foolish business, to read the law of Nehemiah as to how they freed the country from the oppression of the Jews. The Senator from Kentucky thought the law was made only for the Jews, until I read him the Scripture showing they were taking the property away from the Jews in order to free another race. My friend, Mr. Morgenthau, however, ought to be all the more for that law, if it was not meant for anybody but for his kind. But it is meant for them all, Jews and gentiles. So said the wisest of all men, Solomon.

This does not mean anything. They say it is radical, nondescript, demagoguery. Somebody is here reading out that we ought to limit the amount of fortunes and not have anybody too rich or anybody too poor, taking up the time of Congress from this important legislation. They even accuse me of filibustering and trying to keep important legislation from being passed. Can one imagine a thing of that kind? [Laughter.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The present occupant of the chair can hardly conceive that possible of the Senator from Louisiana. [Laughter.]

Mr. LONG. If all the Senators could see it that way, we would reform this condition.

I am going to read that again, to see if I made a mistake. [Laughter.] I am going to read from the wisdom of all wisdom, the words of Solomon:

> Two things have I required of Thee; deny me them not before I die:
> Remove far from me vanity and lies; give me neither poverty nor riches; feed me with food convenient for me:
> Lest I be full, and deny Thee, and say, Who is the Lord? Or lest I be poor, and steal, and take the name of my God in vain.

Proverbs, chapter 30, verses 7 to 10.

We cannot get that done. We are assailed if we mention it. We cannot go back and read how a country was relieved, how the vineyards and the farms and the homes were given back to the people and part of the money was taken and distributed among them, too. We cannot do that. That is interfering with some important legislation which awaits hatching. Important legislation is being impeded, we are told, because I am trying to get the Frazier amendment tacked onto a corporation bankruptcy bill. I am delaying the passage of a bill which would free the corporations of some of their debts, trying to do the absurd thing of having the farmers included in it.

It is a horrible thing that I have not been able to progress. If I have the time, I am going back to school, and I am going to learn more of the modern things. I am going to have a chance to equip myself with the wide experiences of the world which are taught in the institutions of learning, which I never had a chance to attend. Some day I am going to get some money and go to one of them, and I am going to learn this viewpoint, which I have never been able to absorb.

I am going to learn how it is that it gets to be constitutional when it is desired to wipe out the debts of the big man and it gets to be constitutional when the special privileges can reach into the Government Treasury and borrow money, but it gets to be unconstitutional when we try to restore the farm of a farmer and cancel out his debts.

I have been a lawyer for quite a number of years and have made a fair living—in fact, a pretty good living as a lawyer—and I thought I understood the law, but I have never been able to understand that distinction by which we can grant a bankruptcy constitutionally to a railroad and give it back its property, and we can grant a bankruptcy to a corporation and give it back its property, and grant a bankruptcy to a municipality and give it back its property, but when we come in here with a proposition by which the farmer can retain the farm and the little hovel in which he lives with his family, sharing what he can get from hand to mouth that they may sustain life, I have never been able to understand why that should be held to be radical and unconstitutional if the other form of legislation is held to be necessary.

Mr. President, it is a disaster that the circumstances justify the Frazier amendment. It is a disaster that the conditions which prevail justify that amendment.

Mr. President, they have made their own situation. They have created their own order of things. They have dug their own graves.

In Psalms, seventh chapter, fifteenth verse, we find the statement:

> He made a pit, and digged it, and is fallen into the ditch which he made.
> His mischief shall return upon his own head, and his violent dealing shall come down upon his own pate.

Why? Can Senators get anyone in the Congress today to tell them that the debt structure of this country can be discharged? That the $270,000,000,000 can be half paid? Can Senators get anyone to tell them that there is a chance on God's earth of the agricultural-mortgage indebtedness being reduced this year to amount to anything? It is said there is a total of $16,000,000,000 in chattel mortgages and farm mortgages. Does anyone hold out any hope for reduction for this year? If so, how? Why not enact the silver legislation?

I read an article in the paper this morning, from which I will quote one line:

> Strong forces want to compromise with the silver bloc.

I desire to read to the Senate the compromise they are offering. Here is an article in the newspaper informing us that there is another compromise offered, and that compromise is that consent will be given to a law providing for permissive legislation so that silver can be remonetized and the currency expanded, if that is desired. It ought to be quite encouraging to the silver bloc and the expansion bloc that a compromise has been offered.

We have won a great deal since yesterday or day before. We have been offered a compromise under which we will be allowed to pass another bill like the one we passed last year. They are going to give us another bill, 75 pages or 100 pages, just as long as the ink will hold out to write it, prescribing everything that can be done if it is desired to be done.

Is that not a fine thing? Those who suggest the compromise will pass a bill for us, if we want to compromise. They will pass a bill which will go through both Houses like greased lightning, and it will become the law, the law providing that the Secretary of the Treasury, or the President, or whoever else it is wished to designate, will have the right to remonetize silver and to buy silver and expand the currency.

Mr. President, I thought we did that last year. I thought we had that compromise. If it works out again as well as it did last year, about half the currency we now have will be taken out of circulation.

We compromised last year, when we had $6,068,000,000 worth of silver, and gave those in power the right to manipulate it up or down; and they took out seven hundred and some odd million dollars of the currency we had, and they have depreciated what is left to 59 cents on the dollar, thereby reducing the circulating value of the currency to three and one quarter billion dollars, whereas we had $6,000,000,000 to begin with. So, if we make another compromise, we could well wind up with about one and one half billion dollars' worth of circulating currency, if we do as well with the next compromise as we did with the last.

Someone can make that compromise if he wishes to, but a burnt child is afraid of fire. I have been there once, and I am not going back for any more compromise. A man does not have to whip me more than one time in order for me to know that I am licked. I never get up and ask a man to knock me down when he has already floored me one time, and I am not going back again for such a compromise as is now offered. I am not carrying any more coals to Newcastle.

Mr. President, we must stand and fight for only one thing. Yesterday in Washington a monument was dedicated to William Jennings Bryan, who lies buried in Arlington Cemetery. That monument was dedicated to him because in the hearts of the American people he occupies a place from which he can never be displaced. He occupies a unique place in the hearts and in the minds of the American people today. He ascended to that position because he undertook to remonetize silver, believing in it as strongly to the end of his days as he did the first day he espoused that cause.

Such men as Joseph Weldon Bailey, William Jennings Bryan, and those who served with them in Congress prophesied then what we have today—the crucifixion of mankind on the cross of gold. So it was then. So it is now.

(At this point Mr. LONG yielded to Mr. FRAZIER, who suggested the absence of a quorum, and the roll was called and other business transacted.)

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. LONG. I yield.

Mr. LOGAN. I should like to know if the tenor of the speech of the Senator from Louisiana is going to change since he has moved from the Republican side of the Chamber to the Democratic side? [Laughter.]

Mr. LONG. Yes, sir; it is going to get worse.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The query of the Senator from Kentucky being replied to by the Senator from Louisiana, the Chair will not say anything further.

Mr. LONG. "Give me neither riches nor give me poverty", said Solomon, "because the riches are productive of destroying the life of mankind, and poverty makes of him a thief." Yet in America, according to what we have prescribed, according to what the President of the United States has told us, according to what statistics tell us, we have created a condition of extreme riches on the one hand and extreme poverty on the other, with fewer people ascending into the realm of the rich and more people falling to the strata of the impoverished class of this country.

So we have done exactly what we were told not to do. We have created, according to the word of Solomon, a condition productive of indolence, productive of everything that cannot be desired for the maintenance of the country, by the creation of riches for a few, and we have created a condition productive of thieves of the masses on the other hand. We are out here today hunting Dillinger. Everybody wants to find Dillinger. When we get through hunting for Dillinger we will have somebody else to hunt. There are a thousand organized sets of thieves in America today. There are 60,000,000 people in America today who are either going to be thieves, or they are going to be fed by the Government, or some of them are going to starve.

We were told in the very inception of time that we cannot expect a country to survive, virtue to remain, order to subsist, humanity to be regarded, when there is a constant aggrandizement of fortunes among the few of the pompous and splendor class, and poverty constantly among those at the bottom.

I read some more from the Scriptures in order to show my friends something, and in doing this I include my friend the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. LOGAN], who inquired of me yesterday along this line, from Deuteronomy 4:7–2:

For what nation is there so great, who hath God so nigh unto them, as the Lord our God is in all things that we call upon Him for?

And what nation is there so great, that hath statutes and judgments so righteous as all this law, which I set before you this day?

I read from Ecclesiastes, fourth chapter, first verse:

So I returned, and considered all the oppressions that are done under the sun; and behold the tears of such as were oppressed, and they had no comforter; and on the side of their oppressors there was power; but they had no comforter.

Said the preacher, said the Scriptures in Ecclesiastes:

There is no comforter for the powerful and there is no comforter for the masses in the country where is an oppressed condition remaining among the people.

We have no happy people in America today. There is no comfort, there is no convenience for them.

The Secretary of Agriculture is being criticized today on the ground that he could, if he wanted to, do something for agriculture. There is nothing the Secretary of Agriculture can do for agriculture, Mr. President. I want to be fair about this matter. There is nothing the Secretary of Agriculture can do for agriculture. He cannot help himself. I know the young man only slightly. I have met him, I think, two or three times since he was appointed Secretary of Agriculture, and I think pretty well of him. He came well recommended from his home people over in Iowa. I was over through Iowa, and the people over there thought a great deal of Mr. Henry A. Wallace when I was over there. Never did I expect that after the gentleman came here and, I believe, did the very best he could we should have a headline in a paper that comes from his home town which says they want him removed from the office of Secretary of Agriculture, and that he is the worst enemy the farmer ever had.

Think of it! Here comes this gentleman, who, I think, is as good a man as we might ever get, and he comes over here as Secretary of Agriculture from the State of Iowa; and on yesterday a lot of farmers meet over in Des Moines, Iowa, and pass a resolution condemning Mr. Wallace as the worst enemy that the farmer and the common man has ever had in the Cabinet. I can feel for those farmers.

But there is nothing that Mr. Wallace can do. What could he do? What can Mr. Wallace do today that can improve the condition of the farmer 0.1 of 1 percent? What can Mr. Wallace do? He cannot do anything. Even if he knew how he could not do anything; and I admit that he knows as much as anybody else, as far as I know.

Then we have another condemnation of Mr. Rexford Guy Tugwell. He is condemned; but I do not condemn him for advising. The President has a right to have anybody advise him that he wants to have. The only job Mr. Tugwell holds is that of Under Secretary of Agriculture; and what can he do in that job? There is nothing that Mr. Wallace can do. There is nothing that Mr. Tugwell can do, so far as I know. I do not know anything they can do.

What can Mr. Wallace do that he has not done, anyway? What can Mr. Tugwell do that he has not done, anyway? If I were given the job that Mr. Wallace has and the job that Mr. Tugwell has, I do not know one thing under the sun that I could do that would improve the conditions of the farmers or anybody else 0.1 of 1 percent. I think with what they have to contend with, they are doing just as well as anybody else can do; and when they have not a friend on earth to stand up and defend their integrity and their honor and their efforts and their sacrifices in doing their dead level best, I will stand up, if I am the only man left in the length and breadth of this country, and say that those young men have done the very dead level best they could, and have tried to help the American people all they knew how, without any motive to do anybody any harm.

I will be one man left, Mr. President, if there is no one else, to defend the Department of Agriculture for what it has done. However wrongful, I will defend them for every pig they killed. They thought it was going to help things when they did it. They thought they were doing the best thing, and there are a whole lot of people who thought they were doing the best thing; and some of the very people who are condemning the administration today were standing right back of them at the time. I will defend them for every row of cotton they plowed up, although I condemned it under Hoover. I will say that they have done just what Congress told them to do; and if there is anybody to be condemned I will take my part of the responsibility and condemnation for what has gone on, although I said on the floor of the Senate when they were doing it that it would not work, and we would regret it, and that we were failing to do the things that ought to be done.

Somebody wants to know how we can come out of this condition. I will tell you how.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LONG. I yield.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Is it not a fact that the idea of curtailing the production of cotton, even to the extent of stopping production entirely, originated in the State of Louisiana under the régime of the then Governor, now senior Senator from that State?

Mr. LONG. Yes; the idea of stopping production of cotton originated with me. I was the first Governor of any State to advocate it. I did not advocate plowing up what they had planted.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. LONG. I yield.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Is it not a fact that under the influence of the then Governor of Louisiana, the Legislature of the State of Louisiana took appropriate action following the recommendations of the Governor?

Mr. LONG. Yes. When I was Governor of Louisiana I had the legislature pass a sensible law, and the Legislature of South Carolina passed the same law; and if it had been adopted generally, it would have been a workable law. I favored the curtailing of acreage. But after studying the law, I did not think it could ever be successfully accomplished except by banning the crop, so I went back to the law of the Bible, and I found that the Lord had said that when there was a surplus of a crop every seventh year it should not be planted at all. Therefore I adopted that law—the law of the Bible—not to plow up a part of the acreage, not to burn up a part of the crop, because, manifestly, that was a destruction of property, but to plant something else instead of planting cotton for that year, and to do something else. Never did I advocate planting a crop of cotton and plowing up a crop of cotton or burning the cotton after it had been raised, because I think that is unsound from the standpoint of economics. Nor have I ever believed that a surplus can be successfully prevented except by the sabbatical law prescribed by the Scripture and by the Lord—that when there is a surplus of agricultural products every seventh year the crop should not be planted at all. That is the law, and that is what I followed.

The law was very much favored. When I proposed the law which I had drawn up, Mr. Hoover, then President, proposed that every fourth row of cotton be plowed up, and we laughed him out of existence. I succeeded in getting the Louisiana Legislature to pass my law by unanimous vote—a hundred men out of a hundred voting for it in the house, and 39 men out of 39 voting for it in the State senate. So much was that law thought to be good that the Legislature of Louisiana, viciously divided on partisan and political lines, voted unanimously in both houses for that regulation and that sabbatical cotton year, and it was adopted in South Carolina.

Fourteen or fifteen thousand farmers who assembled in the city of Austin, Tex., to hear a speech of their Governor, Ross S. Sterling, heard a speech from me over the radio and voted practically unanimously for the plan which I proposed instead of the plan which Governor Sterling proposed.

The farmers were in favor of it throughout the length and breadth of this country, and had they been allowed to have that law, we would have done away with the cotton surplus, we would not have had it today, and those farmers would have gotten around 20 or 25 cents a pound for their cotton, instead of all the way from 6 to 10 and 12 cents a pound, and they would have had more money.

I was glad to support, to the limit of my ability, the Bankhead bill. I voted for it, or paired for it, although I crossed my fingers and held my eyes shut when I did, because it is filled with so many mechanisms, so many issues, so much regulation, which the proposition I had advocated did not contain, that I fear it will never be feasible or workable.

Now I come back to Mr. Wallace and to Mr. Tugwell. I asked what they could do, and no one knows, I take it, since no one has answered.

I will state that I will resign my seat in the United States Senate, and never run for another public office, if I cannot submit a program here, right now, which will bring prosperity in the United States in the next 10 weeks' time. I present a program, and I have been presenting it for many years. The experiment of everybody else has been tried, and now I want the officials to try mine out, what we were promised they were going to do. I will submit an experiment of my own conception, which has been agreed to in most cases. If what I propose does not bring universal prosperity to 125,000,000 American people in 10 weeks' time, I will walk out of the United States Senate and never advocate the election of another man or myself to any kind of a public office, or participate in politics for the balance of my lifetime.

I will state the proposition right now. I do not have to read it out of any almanac; I do not have to write it down and go over it; I will state it right now in five groups, and if those in power will do what ought to be done, we will have universal prosperity in America in the next 10 weeks, and there will not be a single unemployed man in the United States, and there will not be any trouble about it.

No. 1. I would have Congress enact a law providing that no man should work longer than 6 hours a day or more than 5 days a week. I would provide that in case there should be a surplus with that much work, the President of the United States would be authorized to prescribe a rule granting vacations of from 2 weeks to a month in the year, as often as twice a year, if it became necessary, in order to keep the consumption balanced with production.

No. 2. I would remonetize silver, as was done in 1873. I would expand the currency to such an extent as to make it possible to free the people of their burden of debt, and to make it possible for them to come out of their trouble.

No. 3. I would provide that whenever there was an agricultural crop of which there had been accumulated a sufficient surplus to last and to fill the demands of the following year, the production of that crop should be banned altogether, and that the United States Government would take over and store the surplus and issue credit receipts of the United States for it, so that in the following year it would be sold without a surplus being created for that year.

That is no. 3, and I want someone who is smart enough to dare to try to contradict one of these, because every one of them comes out of the Bible. I just want someone to get smart enough to try to contradict one of them. I am willing to take my chances that the Lord knew what He was talking about, and if they do not work in the United States it will be the only country where they have failed to work. I will state further that there is no other law that is going to work in the United States, and the Lord said there is no other that would work here. That is no. 3.

Now I come to the fourth. What would I do for the fourth one? I would not issue another bond of the United States Government. On the contrary, I would tax the swollen fortunes above a certain amount of money, throw the swollen fortunes into the Treasury of the United States; first, to pay the costs of running the Government; second, to pay the cost of public works; third, to spread money among the masses who had fallen below a certain stratum in their station in life. That would be my fourth, and that would be out of the Bible also.

I would not have one single bond issued by the United States. I would not be issuing bonds, throwing us further and further into debt. I would not be taxing the common people in order to bring the Government out of debt. I would be getting the money for running the Government entirely by bringing down the swollen fortunes, so that we might have in this country what has been said to be necessary by Solomon, by Isaiah, by the laws which Moses wrote in Leviticus and other books, by the gospel of Christ, by the rules of Confucius, by the teaching of Plato and Socrates and Diogenes, by the teachings of every religious teacher, by the rules of Theodore Roosevelt and Daniel Webster, William Jennings Bryan, Andrew Jackson, Abraham Lincoln, and all the remainder of them. I would bring down the swollen fortunes to the point where those having them had no more money than could be spent during their lifetimes, and their children's lifetimes, and their grandchildren's lifetimes. I would pull them down to frying size, to such a point that when a man had more money than he could use, and his children could use, and his grandchildren could use, that would be the limit of the amount of money he would be allowed to own, and the limit of the amount of property he would be allowed to have.

Mr. President, if that were done, would there be people starving when there was too much to eat? No; we would have the people all sharing in the consumption of wheat. There would be enough for the people to eat. But we would be distributing it among the people so that they could eat. We have enough for the people to wear—as a matter of fact, we have too much, but we are not distributing it so that the people can wear it. There are enough houses for the people to live in, but we are not allowing them to be used. We are allowing the people to be dispossessed of their homes and farms, where millions could live, because of the burden of debt and the concentration of wealth in the hands of a few and the impoverishment of the masses at the bottom.

Now for no. 5. I would add only one artificial law. Four laws I would take from the Bible, and I would add only one artificial law. I would not allow a stock exchange or a market exchange of any kind or character to operate in this country, except under the surveillance of the Government. I would stop those exchanges and market riggers from manipulating the markets in commodities on the exchanges, to the aggrandizement of themselves through swindling the American public. That is the only artificial law I would have to enact. The other four would come from the Bible.

One question arises. What would we do with the surplus farm labor when a crop was banned? Let us say that we banned the cotton crop, and that there were no other crop for the farmers to plant that year. Under my plan that would be the year when the public works would be constructed in the South. That would be the year when we would build the highways and complete our forest reserves and flood control.

That would be the year we would build up the farms, and paint the houses, and repair the fences, and make our streams navigable. That would be the year we would provide for our drainage, and the various and sundry other things, such as eliminating railroad crossings, and many things which we could occupy them in doing during the year. I would coordinate the work so that when I would have to ban a crop, I would have the Public Works there taking the place of crop labor during the one particular year in which I had a crop surplus and banned a crop. I would not go into a country where they had a shortage of labor and put on a Public Works program. I would simply coordinate the two, and we would have no problem.

If that were done tomorrow, there would be prosperity in America in less than 4 weeks' time; there would not be one idle man in this country; there would not be one hungry child; there would not be one naked man; there would not be one family dispossessed of its home; there would not be a single human who is entitled to it who would be deprived of the conveniences and comforts and, in large amount, of the luxuries of life. Then there would not be any Dillinger gangs or thieves. We would not have men stealing to get something to eat and being put in the penitentiary. We would not have a generally demoralized condition. We would have people having enough to eat, enough to wear, and each with a place to sleep, where they could live and work in comfort, and under respectable conditions, according to the laws of the Lord.

If we do not do that, we are going to have just what the Lord said we were going to have. He said:

If you will keep these laws I will give you a land of plenty, rain in due season, and ye shall eat your due fill, and lie down at night in safety, and none shall fear that harm shall come to him. But—if he keep not these laws I will send murder, consumption, wholesale destitution and destruction, and ye will starve even in the midst of plenty.

He said—

That was the promise and a threat to the Nation.

We have not kept the law.

So I have considered the Frazier amendment now before us for a vote.

Let me say, Mr. President, that the people can be satisfied with promises for a while. They have been hopeful of good results. They have been led to believe, through myself and others, that there was bound to be some good coming to them soon. The people have waited very patiently. They have shown a rather remarkable amount of confidence. But they are not going to continue to wait here for something to come so long that it means that they are going to perish before it gets through; and therefore these farmers, whether we pass the Frazier bill or not, if we do not remonetize silver, if we do not expand the currency, if we do not provide a means for them to keep their homes, some of these farmers are going to keep them anyway.

Remember what I am saying. These farmers are not going to be put out of their homes as easily as it may be thought they are. They are going to stay in those homes anyway. They may stay in there under a State law which postpones the time when they dispose of their place.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LONG. I yield.

Mr. FRAZIER. One of the farm organizations in the Middle West, after a careful estimate, says that in their opinion, according to the best figures they can get, there are 3,000 foreclosures and judicial sales taking place every 24 hours in the United States today. It is going on right now.

Mr. LONG. Three thousand a day?

Mr. FRAZIER. Yes.

Mr. LONG. Three thousand a day; that means about a million a year, does it not? We can count about five people to the farm family. That means that we get a figure of about five and a half million people having their homes taken away from them this year. And that applies to the farmers only. That does not include the remainder of the people—five and a half million people every year. It will be worse than that next year. It will finally get up to around 10,000,000. It will keep growing. That will result in turning out about 10,000,000 people from their homes in 1 year. That is a great army, Mr. President. Turn five and a half million men out this year, then start to turn about 5,000,000 more of them out next year, and with 10,000,000 unemployed, who were formerly employed in industries on top of that, it will make a pretty good sized army of unemployed and dispossessed people. I have been talking to many of these people. I have already had to go out to one or two places on behalf of one or two employers to help them out when they did not know whether they were going to get away with their lives or not. I have gone out to them. They listened to me, and they will still listen to me, because I have warned against these conditions all along. They are going to be sending for some of us. Yet we hear all this talk of prosperity and the playing of brass bands.

Mr. President, we will not have many more world fairs like the one held last year, with such conditions continuing. We cannot continue putting five and a half million farmers off their farms and having ten or fifteen millions laborers in the cities out of work and continue getting by with it. It cannot be done. It makes me sick; it makes me tired. One talks to empty seats when he mentions that kind of thing; he talks into the thin air. What do they care? It does not hurt anybody.

[At this point Mr. LONG yielded to Mr. FRAZIER to ask for a vote on his amendment, when Mr. BACHMAN suggested the absence of a quorum, and the roll was called.]

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, the New York Times this morning presents quite a picture that we ought to look at. The President of the United States says to the business leaders in Washington:

It is time to stop crying "wolf"; asks cooperation instead.

That is the message the President of the United States sent to the business leaders who have come here and say everything is going to pot, everything is wrong, and everything is being terribly involved and has begun to go the way which depression naturally leads.

On the same page of the New York Times there is an inset which contains 10 specifications of the riotous and ruinous activities of the Government as set out by the business interests. It indicates that at least business openly is criticizing the President and the President is criticizing business. He said to the bankers that they ought to open up and lend more money, and the bankers came back and said the investigators of the Federal Reserve told them they could not lend any more money. There is another clash and there we have another stalemate.

Then we come down the line, and it is said that there ought to be a general revival of business in the country; that the people ought to spend their money. The people come back and say, "How are we going to spend any more money under you than we did under Hoover? Under Hoover we had $7,000,000,000 of currency, and under you we have $5,300,000,000. Under Hoover our $7,000,000,000 was worth $7,000,000,000, but under you our $5,000,000,000 is worth only $3,000,000,000."

So all around we have a stalemate and a paralysis, nobody getting anywhere, nobody knowing where they are going, and nobody knowing where they are going to be when they get there. That is our condition. It is a mixture of inconsistency. If I may explain it, if we are going to come out as some of these business leaders want us to do, evidently we must do like the boy who started to school one wet morning and discovered that when he took one step forward he slid two steps backward, and in order to get to school he had to start toward home. [Laughter.] Apparently we are going in that direction now. No one sees any better results than I do. I would be hopeful if they did, but I know of none who do.

It may be said that Congress gave the power to the President, but that does not relieve Congress from doing its duty. True it is that Congress is composed of 435 men in the one House and 96 men in the other House, all of whom are supposed to be necessary to the Government and have tried their best to help remedy the situation; but, it is said, they have passed all that business off on one man. True it is that he said it was all right to give him that power to run the United States, but truer it is that the people of the United States know our theory of government. They need the work and the conscientiousness and the mentality and the effort of 435 men and 96 men to do this legislative work, and we cannot expect it to be done under the other system.

The theory of our Government is that one man cannot do the legislating, and that his secretaries cannot do the legislating. The theory of our Government is that the legislating should be done in Congress. Even though we ask somebody else to do it for us, and he does not do it—even though somebody else says he will do it for us and then does not do it—that does not relieve the Congress; that does not relieve Senators and that does not relieve Members of the House themselves of their obligations to the American people to prescribe the legislative cure for the condition now confronting us. It is our duty to take the bull by the horns and bring the country out of chaos and bring order out of confusion, liberality out of stagnation. It is our duty.

Let us stop sitting here idle all the day. Let us go somewhere. Let us get up and go forward. Our farmers are in a serious condition. Let us do something for them. Let us quit criticizing Secretary Wallace for not doing it. He cannot do it himself, and we know he cannot do it. Mr. Tugwell cannot do it himself, and we know that he cannot do it. Let us give the world to understand that these men should not be condemned. Let us accept our own responsibility. If there be any condemnation, let it come upon ourselves, because the responsibility for sins of omission rightfully belongs here and in the other House of Congress before it belongs anywhere else.

True, if we prescribe the remedies and they should be vetoed by the President of the United States, then that would be his responsibility; but until we have prescribed the remedies, until that time has come, then the responsibility lies in the Congress of the United States, and as yet we have not acted for the people of America.

Three thousand farmers have been dispossessed of their homes since last night. Three thousand farms have been sold since last night under the sheriff's hammer. Three thousands farmers and their families are dispossessed of their homes every 24 hours, we are told. We have not done a thing on God's earth to help them.

I do not care whether we relieve corporations of their bankruptcy or not. I do not care whether we relieve the railroads of their bankruptcy or not. I do not care whether we relieve the municipalities of their bankruptcy or not. I do not care whether we plant any more saplings or not.

I do care about five and a half million people who are being put off their homes every 365 days; and I do care about 11,000,000 people, besides that, in the industrial centers, who are out of employment altogether; and I do care about the condition of debts that has been existing and continuing to get worse in this country, with no relief in sight.

I do not think this criticism against the administration is justified at all on the ground of debt, because the money had to be spent, and if we had stopped spending the money today all those people would be out of work, and a whole lot more people would be out of work who are getting business from them. So, on the whole, those criticisms, as I have already analyzed or answered them in detail and as a whole, are not to be found justified; but Congress needs to act. Congress needs to justify its own existence.

I should say that if we were to start here again tomorrow passing more laws for Congress not to legislate itself, or to have somebody else legislate for it, I should vote for an amendment to the Constitution of the United States to abolish Congress along with it. If we were to do it, the next time we come in here with a great big bunch of laws designating somebody esle to do the legislating that Congress itself is supposed to do, I am going to offer an amendment to the Constitution of the United States for Congress to stop drawing the money. There is no need for it.

I want to be fair about this thing. If Congress does not feel that it is competent to do the work it was sent here to do, if Congress does not feel that it wants to shoulder its constitutional responsibility, if Congress feels that conditions are so exciting and emergent that our complicated system of government negatives the idea of Congress discharging its functions, then Congress ought to get out of the way. The day that Congress says "We cannot do the job that was given to us by the people" is the day that Congress ought to say, "We are through."

I think Congress up to this time, in the necessities of the case, in trying out experiments, has half-way tried out the experiment of doing away with a large part of legislative government. There are a whole lot of people who thought Congress ought to do away with a lot of legislative government, and I think Congress did that. I think Congress has tried its hand at seeing just how far it dared go in discharging itself from the functions of performing legislative service to the American people, and in yielding those functions over into the hands of someone else. I think Congress has made the experiment. Congress decided that it was going to try the experiment of whether or not legislative government as such is a good thing. So, therefore, it said, "Inasmuch as the Constitution of the United States has placed the law-making authority in the House of Representatives and in the United States Senate, we are going to place this authority, or as much of it as we can, in the hands of somebody else, and see if it works better that way than having a Congress."

We have tried it. Now let us admit, having tried the experiment, that the experiment has not worked very well. Let us admit that at the very best we have not succeeded very well with the experiment of having Congress intrust its legislative capacities into hands not designated by the Constitution of the United States.

That having been done, now I ask Congress to legislate. I call upon the Congress to reassume the duties prescribed by the Constitution. I ask it to enact laws and to repeal some laws. I ask it to set up things that are prescribed as its duty. I ask the Congress to say, not that we will authorize somebody if he sees fit to do something, but I ask Congress to say that it is this or it is that, it is yonder, it is here, it is something tangible that you can put your finger on, and reach out in the nighttime and grab hold and know where you are going.

That is what I ask Congress to do. Otherwise, what is the law? What is the law down in Winnfield, La., today? The law in Winnfield, La., today on agriculture is whatever the Secretary of Agriculture has authorized the State administrative agency to authorize the county agent to authorize the agents under him to do that he has done or prescribed. That is the law. You have to go down there to find out what the law is, if there is anything down there to enable you to find out what it is; and when the law tinkers with anything, it is almost like lightning striking it.

Mr. President, I have seen lightning strike a man, and I have seen him live. I had a lawsuit once in which lightning struck a man, twisted his arm around into a terrible position, twisted his neck, and twisted his leg. Lightning struck him, and he lived; but I want to tell you that when one of these codes strike a man and he lives, he deserves all the credit in the world. No lightning has ever been so deadly to the institutions of mankind as one of these 467-page codes. When a man's industry gets through with that and lives, or his labor survives, he has gone far beyond anything that is expected of a man who has been struck by lightning, because such men have been known to survive, but none has yet survived under this theory of things.

So let us have Congress come back. Let us call the roll again. Let us say, "We are here", and that Congress has decided to go to work; and what is the first thing to do? Who is the backbone of society, of the country's living and of its prosperity? No. 1, the farmer and the laboring man. Therefore we have an amendment pending. We have had a bill to have bankruptcy for the corporations of the country, to allow all the corporations to wipe off their debts and keep most of their property on terms and conditions satisfactory to them and to the court and to some of their creditors. All right. That being true, we say, "If you are going to have bankruptcy for the corporations, give us a chance to have bankruptcy for the farmers. You have granted bankruptcy to the municipal corporations. You have granted bankruptcy to the railroads, so that they can wipe off their debts and keep their property. Now, you are going to grant bankruptcy to the other corporations. Now, we ask that the farmer be included in this bankruptcy law and allowed to wipe off his debts and keep his place"; that is all.

There is only one difference in these proposals. Flesh and bone is covered under this amendment, and intangibles are covered under the other measure. Property is the consideration of the other three laws. The lives and the living and the existence and the flesh and marrow of humanity are covered under this amendment. If this amendment is adopted, it means that a man can take his wife and children and stay in the house that he built. It means that he can plow the land that he has. It means that he can gather the corn he has planted, that he can kill the meat on the farm, that he can fish in the back of the place if there is a stream somewhere around, and use those products to keep soul and body together, and to sustain the family he has there. That would be done under this amendment.

These other measures that we have passed do not place a single man back in a house. They do not keep any of them in a home. They do not feed any of them or clothe any of them.

Those measures are in order that municipalities can discharge their debts and go free, and that railroads can discharge their debts, and corporations can discharge their debts, under some theory that that is going to help business get started; and yet the man at the bottom, who cannot get started at all because he is burdened with debt and is about to lose the little hovel he has to keep his family in, must be dispossessed because it is thought to be something radical, and a great departure from the theme, if we allow him to wipe off the debts he has, the same as we are allowing these interests to wipe off their debts.

So let us get down to legislating for the man who stands on the bottom. Remember "the man with the hoe." Let us remember him.

So we have before us the amendment offered by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. FRAZIER]. I wish I might claim the honor of having offered that amendment myself. If we are going along the lines we have been legislating in the past few days, in that direction and to that extent, it is one of the most constructive, humane, and meritorious amendments that has been offered since I have been in the Senate. It means and says that we are going to stop these farmers from being sold out.

Three thousand farmers have lost their homes since last night, and 3,000 more will lose their homes by this time tomorrow. Think of it. Three thousand farmers, with their wives and their children, are put out today. They are put out. Three thousand more will be put out tomorrow. We are talking about bringing back conditions, when we know, if we know anything at all, that conditions are bound to grow worse under developments of that kind. It is time to act. It is time for Congress to call a halt.

People talk about our adjourning and going home, as if that would do some good. It did not do any good when we went home the last time. What will do some good is for Congress to do something. That is what will do some good, if we will do it.

This bill reads:

SEC. 8. Section 75 of the act of July 1, 1898, entitled "An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States", as amended, is amended by adding thereto a new subsection "s" to read as follows:

"(s) (1) Any farmer failing to obtain the acceptance of a majority in number and amount of all creditors whose claims are affected by a composition or extension proposal may amend his petition or answer asking to be adjudged a bankrupt. Said farmer may at the time of the first hearing petition the court that all of his property, whether pledged, encumbered, or unencumbered by liens or otherwise, be appraised at its then actual value and that his homestead and exemptions be set aside and that he be allowed to retain possession of any part or parcel or all of the remainder of his property and pay for same under the terms and conditions set forth in this act."

Mr. President, this simply means that if the farmer cannot get the creditors to agree to it to the amount and the number specified, he has the right to come in and effect this bankruptcy and to be relieved of these debts.

Section 2 provides:

"(2) Upon such a request being made in the petition or answer, or at the time of the first hearing, appraisers shall be designated and appointed. Such appraisers shall appraise all the property of the debtor at its then reasonable actual value."

That is, the value it has now.

"The words 'actual value' shall not necessarily imply cash value, but shall imply the reasonable and fair value of the property at the time the appraisal is made. Such appraisers shall be designated and appointed, and their appraisals shall be made in all other respects, with right of objections, exceptions, and appeal, in accordance with this act: Provided, That in case of real estate either party may file objections, exceptions, and appeals within 2 years from date of order approving the appraisal."

Section 3 provides:

"(3) After the value of the debtor's property shall have been fixed by the appraisal as herein provided, the referee shall issue an order setting aside to such debtor his homestead and exemptions, and shall further order that the possession, under the control of the court, of any part or parcel or all of the remainder of the debtor's property, shall remain in the debtor subject to a general lien, as security for the payment of the value thereof to the trustee of the creditors, if a trustee is appointed, such a lien to be subject to and inferior to all prior liens, pledges, or encumbrances. Such prior liens, pledges, or encumbrances shall remain in full force and effect, and the property covered by such prior liens, pledges, or encumbrances shall be subject to the payment of the claims of the secured creditors holding such prior liens, pledges, or encumbrances up to the actual value of such property as fixed by the appraisal provided for herein. All liens herein on livestock shall cover all increase, and all liens on real property shall cover all rental received or crops grown thereon by the debtor, as security for the payment of any sum that may be due or past due under the terms and provisions of the next paragraph, until the full value of any such particular property has been paid.

Section 4 provides—and this is the main section, this is one which really means something—starting with line 19 on page 3:

"(4) At the time of the order setting aside to the debtor his homestead and exemptions, and giving him possession, under the control of the court, of any part, parcel, or all of the remainder of his property, whether pledged or covered by any prior lien or encumbrance, the debtor shall agree and bind himself that he will pay to the secured creditors, as their interests may appear, and to the trustee of the unsecured creditors, as his interests may appear, if a trustee is appointed, the value of the property as fixed by the appraisal.

Think how much fairer this is. This man finds that he paid the amount of the appraisal of the property. In other words, this man agrees to pay him the money. He is not treated as the municipality and the corporation outfits are treated. In those cases in certain instances the debts were wiped out altogether. We are not asking for as much for the farmer as is being asked for these others, because the farmer is not used to getting much anyway. The farmer is used to not expecting much. The farmer is used to expecting a carload of promises and very little in the way of performance. Measured in terms of promises, the farmer would be gliding along the road to ease today. Measured in terms of performance, the farmer is right where we find him now. We provide here:

Together with interest at the rate of 1 percent per annum on the following terms: 2½ percent, together with interest on or before 6 months from date of agreement; 2½ percent, together with interest on or before 12 months; 2½ percent, together with interest on or before 18 months; 2½ percent, together with interest on or before 24 months, and that thereafter he will pay 5 percent principal, together with interest semiannually for the following 4 years and will pay the balance on or before 6 months after the last semiannual payment has been made to the secured creditors, as their interests may appear, and to the trustee of the unsecured creditors, as his interests may appear, if a trustee is appointed.

Does any man mean to tell me that that is giving the farmer a half break when compared with what has been done for the balance of these outfits? We provide here for the collection of the whole debt in 5 or 6 years' time. We would make the farmer pay every dollar the property was worth, but we would give him 6 years to pay it out, and charge him interest. Yet there is talk about this being a radical piece of legislation.

I want Senators to halt and think about this other bill they are about to pass, to which we want to attach this amendment. We would be giving the farmer very little, practically nothing. I would say that this was a good thing for the farm creditors. They would get more under this amendment than they would get without it. This is the best we could do for the farm creditor. It is the very best thing that could be done, if they expect to get anything. The farm will not be worth anything lying out there idle, with nobody on it. We are not going to help the matter just because we put the poor devil into the street and put his family out of their home. That is not going to help. This is the best thing that could be done. Yet it is said to be radical. Why radical?

Mr. President, I love every man in the Senate; they are all friends of mine; but I tell them that they are going to have some tall explaining to do when they get back home next fall. God help the man who voted for the railroad bankruptcy bill, and the municipal bankruptcy bill, and the corporation bankruptcy bill, and then votes against the farmers having this provision. God help that man. I said to a brilliant young man sitting in the Senate 2 years ago who voted against the other Frazier amendment, "Did you vote for the Reconstruction Finance Corporation Act?" He said, "Yes; I voted for it." I said, "Let me give you a little warning, brother. If you voted for the R.F.C. Act, to let the bankers and the big corporations have some money, and vote against this Frazier amendment, which is not a thing in the world but an R.F.C. for farmers, you are going to have one nice time getting back into the Senate." I met him in the Senate after the November election, and he said, "You were right. It kept me out of the Senate."

The Senate passed the municipal bankruptcy bill, which would allow the politicians to pay off their debts and to incur some more. That is all the municipal bankruptcy bill is. The politicians go out and pile up a bunch of debts they cannot pay, and then they come in and wash them out and enter into some more if they can, if anybody has little enough sense to lend them any money. I would not have little enough sense to do that if I had the money, and I have not the money, anyway.

Congress passes a municipal bankruptcy bill and a railroad bankruptcy bill and a corporation bankruptcy bill, and lends Government money to industries on top of that, but turns the farmer down, and will not let him pay his home out in 6 years. If we do that, we will find out how the people back home look on it when we go back. They are going to know about it. They are going to know all about it, and they will understand it a lot better than many people think they will.

Mr. President, I have done my part for them. I have stood here and spoken to the Members of the Senate as long as anyone would listen to me, and when one came in who had not been here I would start right in and make the speech all over, and then when another came in I would go back and argue it again. I have made this speech to all, as nearly as I could. I will not be able to make it to all, but I will stay here and make it to all I can reach.

I have done my part; I have raised my voice for the farmer of my country and of all countries. I have tried to get him the same measure of treatment that is being given to the corporations. We may not succeed in getting it, we may not be able to make our good and proper-motived colleagues see our way, but we will have done the best we could.

It is charged this would be impairing the Constitution. I do not know how anyone can entertain that thought. After I looked up the law I did not think this bill would ever be held unconstitutional. I think this is constitutional legislation. I think, as the Constitution has always been interpreted, this is constitutional. I do not think these other bankruptcy measures are. I do not think the municipal bankruptcy bill is constitutional. But I think this one is constitutional legislation, and I want to say a little something further as to why it is constitutional.

The Supreme Court of the United States has never held an act unconstitutional that was sanctioned by the laws of the Bible. The Supreme Court of the United States has never yet held any act to be unconstitutional that was in accordance with the Biblical law, and this measure is.

They may finally get down to the point where they will say that the Constitution of the United States, which was intended to carry out the divine law, prohibits the divine law, and when they do, that will be about the end of the country, if the people stand for it.

That is what the Bible said. The Bible said that a country which would not honor these laws was not going to last. None of them have as yet. They tried it in Rome. It did not work there. They tried it in Greece. It did not work there. They tried it in Sparta; they applied the laws, as they said, and it worked there for a while, and then it got away from them and it did not work any more. They tried it in Persia and it did not work there. They tried it in Assyria, and it did not work there. They tried it in Germany, they tried it in Russia, and now we are trying it out in the United States, and it is not going to work here, either.

Senators, remember what I am saying today. If nothing I have said up until this time means anything, remember what I say right now. The country is not going to last if we do not go according to the laws of God. Remember what I am telling the Senate. Some of the Senators will live to see it. We are either going to apply the laws which were given from Heaven, or our country is not going to last. It is not going to take very long to find out the truth of that statement. Remember what I am saying. It will not happen when we are all dead and gone. No; Senators will be here then who are here now, and see it. Senators will live to see it. Our distinguished Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] will be alive to see the proof of what I have just stated.

We must either return to the laws of the Lord in this country, or our country shall perish. This country owes $272,000,000,000, and we do not have any more than $5,000,000,000 with which to pay that great debt. If we do not return to the laws of the Lord the Republic of the United States will be talked of as the one of Rome is today. Failure to observe those laws destroyed Rome.

In Rome 1,800 people owned the entire wealth of the city. There are not that many which own the greater part of the wealth of this country, if we take it on the percentage basis.

Twelve men in this country have practically grabbed it. They have it in the bag. A small percent of people own this country. Some of us own something, but if we pay our debts we would not have anything left. The surplus is somewhere among the small element. Those of us who have anything, if we paid up our debts, would not have anything left. So we do not own anything. I do not own anything. I am living on the interest of what I owe. [Laughter.]

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LONG. I yield.

Mr. LEWIS. The Senator from Louisiana has made an allusion to a matter which from time to time, I am sure, has been reflected upon by different historians, and that is the very small number who once controlled the wealth and power of different countries of the world which have passed away. We all recall the passage from Macaulay's essays referring to the time in the distant future—

> When some traveler from New Zealand shall, in the midst of a vast solitude, take his stand on a broken arch of London Bridge to sketch the ruins of St. Paul's.

I desire to ask my friend from Louisiana a question. Alluding to the fact that this country is in debt, without entering into the question of figures, but that it is overwhelmingly in debt, and that ultimately there must be some payment, and my friend the Senator from Louisiana estimates, or the suggestion is, that we have only $5,000,000,000 compared to a very large number of billions of dollars of debt; I ask the Senator, does he rest any hope upon the fact that the foreign nations which owe us more than $30,000,000,000, adding the interest, will contribute their payments to these debts so as to lighten the obligations of the United States?

Mr. LONG. I must reply to the Senator from Illinois that I do not think the foreign debts are going to be paid us or that very much of them are going to be paid. I think the countries who owe us those debts have already written them off their books. The fact of the case, if I properly understand it—my friend from Illinois knows it much better than I do—is that Great Britain did not even put the debt owing to us in the budget this year. They have stopped budgeting it even. It is "Among my souvenirs." [Laughter.] It is all gone. There is no way of getting it back. And this country stands today debt laden to the extent of $272,000,000,000. The United States Government has $32,000,000,000 of its own debt. There are one or two billion dollars in municipal debts. Private debts mount up to from $225,000,000,000 to $240,000,000,000. So, altogether in this country, we have $272,000,000,000 of debt—more than the worth of the entire property of America on present values, and with currency to the extent of only $5,000,000,000. Gold is the only money that is recognized, and a man is not allowed to have gold.

I wonder how many people ever saw the wording on our currency. Here is a $5 bill which I still have. Thank God for one of them. "The United States of America will pay to the bearer on demand $5." Those words appear on this bill. This bill is not money itself. It is like a promissory note signed by an individual—in this case it is the promissory note of the Government—that he will pay you $5 when you bring him this piece of paper.

Mr. President, we have now a law which says that, if I go up to the Treasury and get gold, they will put me in jail. Here is a bill which says, "Come up and get $5"; and we have a law which says "you will be put in jail if you get $5." That is the law today.

That reminds me, Mr. President, of the case of a colored man I knew who ran a hamburger stand. He owed another colored man 50 cents. He kept a six-shooter on the counter and sent word to the other colored man and told him to come and get his 50 cents. "Come and get your 'four bits' when you want it." But that colored fellow was not going to come and get the "four bits."

So it is with our money. What is money today? Does anyone know? This bill which I hold up is not money. Yet is all we can get. It is a note saying that we can go and get some money.

I hold in my hand a piece of silver. Is silver money? No. Silver has been demonetized, also. Yet the Government has $850,000,000 worth of silver as money, and still silver is not money. The only thing which is money, if there is any money, is the gold; and we are not allowed to have it.

Mr. President, we go along in that way, playing along, hoping for something to happen, and something will happen.

I have not read the essay by Macaulay to which my friend from Illinois refers. I must read that essay. I am not a well-read man, Mr. President. I am not a man of learning. I had very little opportunity to acquire learning in my lifetime. I never went through high school. I had very little time in college, and that was only for the study of law, and they got rid of me there as soon as possible. Therefore I did not have the opportunity to become learned in the sciences and in the arts, and least of all in the letters.

However, I know one thing. I was taught in the beginning that there was one book which contained nearly everything. That book was the Bible. I was taught that a man who could read and write and knew the Bible knew nearly everything else. So, in spite of my failure to complete my course in mathematics and in the classics and in the various and sundry sciences and in history, I was able to get along with my knowledge which I gleaned from the Scriptures, and a very imperfect knowledge at that. But I found it all there in the Bible; I found the law there. I found the history there. I found the laws of inheritances, of science, of economy. It is all to be found there. And as I have pursued and perused the histories, the publications ancient and modern, I have yet to find a single historical fact, a single dictum of law, a single scintilla of philosophy which is in the Scriptures that has ever been disputed, regardless of any discovery that has been made by science or by those searching back into the past ages.

Nor have I ever found a prophecy as to the consequences which would come to a nation which failed to observe the law which was not in fact fulfilled.

Sixteen years ago—I believe it was in the year 1918, when I wrote and delivered the first speech in which I said that the concentration of wealth was creeping upon America and was going to mean calamity to the country—16 years ago I prophesied it for the year 1930 and it came in the year 1929. I did not miss it very much. It is of record that 16 years ago I gave the figures and the tables and the statistics which I had gleaned from the archives and documents published by Woodrow Wilson that the concentration of wealth meant the wrecking of America.

In the year 1929 I stood in front of an elevator in the biggest hotel in the South, and the leading banker of the South walked up to me and said, "Governor"—I, at that time, was Governor of Louisiana—"Governor, trouble has come. The market has broke. Everything has gone to pieces in America. There is no market today for anything, and I am afraid it will be 60 days getting straight again." I looked at him a moment and said, "My dear friend, it is not temporary this time. She has come. She is here." And I said to Mr. Rudolph S. Hecht, the president of the Hibernia Bank & Trust Co., "Go back and tell your board that 'hell' is come, and it will not cease until there is a redistribution of wealth in the United States."

In October 1929 the stock market broke. It has not started to correct itself yet, and it is not going to correct itself. Write all the laws you want to. I told you in April 1932 what they would amount to. Go on and write some more; write all the expedients you want to. Write a law, in addition to the one providing for the killing of hogs, to allow the killing of cattle; write one that will allow the killing of wild animals in the woods. You have enacted a law providing for plowing up the cotton; pass one allowing the burning up of wheat. Go on, write them all; write all these experiments you want to. Call in gold and call in the silver. You demonetized gold and then you demonetized paper, so that chicken feathers are as much a legal exchange today as is the paper I have in my pocket. Go on and pass some more of those laws and see where you come out. I have already told you, you are never going anywhere; you cannot do so.

There is one thing about it, however, and that is that the ruling class never abdicates; the ruling class never gives way one inch. They try to ruin the man who tries to make them do it; they caricature him in every way they can. I know something about that. They give you plenty. They try to ruin the man who tries to save them; but the day will come when someone goes to them, that they will come back to somebody to save them, but it will be too late then. They will not be like the thief on the cross. Christ will not be there to give His blessing before their death. They are moving themselves to the cataclysm; the abyss is yawning, and it is yawning for everybody. Their select status will not preserve them. They are going to bring this grand country, established here under the Stars and Stripes, and, better still, under the spirit of liberty and equality, to pillage and ruin. They are going to run the plow of destitution rather than the plow of productivity through the furrows of this country, and when they have done it theirs will be the chief share in what they have brought about in the United States. You cannot make them see. There are none so blind as those who, having eyes, will see not, and none so deaf as those who, having ears, will hear not. You cannot make them see; you cannot make them hear; they are not going to hear; and when they want to hear it is going to be too late. Marie Antoinette was finally brought to the point where she was willing to listen, but it was too late then to listen. They cried for bread, and she said, "Give them some cake if they have not any bread."

You are running farmers out of their homes today. Go on and run them out; keep on; hurry up the process. That is what you are doing. Hurry, hurry; get them all out. "Get out; get out; make way. A law is proposed for you, but you say it will be unconstitutional, and so you cannot stay on your farms; that would be contrary to law. In the case of the railroads it is all right; there is something due to them; it is all right with the corporations; turn them loose; it is all right in the case of municipal corporations; turn them loose; but it will be unconstitutional to help the farmers. You have got to get out." Three thousand families a day. Go on with it. You have had it your way. What is the result?

I wish that I had the speech I made here about April 4, 1932, as I recall. I will ask that the RECORD of that date be furnished me, and perhaps I can find something I said then, shortly after I first came here, and which I should like to read to the Senate. I came here, I think, it was on January 23 or January 24, 1932. I was elected in 1930 but did not take my seat until 1932. I made some kind of a speech here about April 1932 on the conditions then prevailing. Mind you, the conditions were a whole lot better then than they are now. Do not mistake me; conditions were much better then than they are right now. The condition of our Treasury was then much better; the condition of State credit was better; everything was better than it is right now, as I think I can show.

In April 1932, if I remember the month correctly, I said that conditions were not going to improve unless we redistributed some of the wealth of this country, bringing it down from the forces at the top and spreading it among the masses at the bottom. Has that been proved or not? Let us see. I have before me now the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, and I find in it something I said on April 30. There was another speech that I made about April 4, which is the one I had in mind. At the place I have before me, the late Senator from Nebraska, Mr. Howell, was giving the figures with reference to agriculture, and I had something to say then, although it is not exactly what I intended to call to the attention of the Senate at this time. However, I did say to Senator Howell:

I should like to have the attention of the Senator from New York on that point as in line with our President's speech at Indianapolis—that the need of this country is not to take away from these people what they have but to impose these taxes at the top, so that the big moneymakers of this country could supply what is needed in this country and not to have them falling at the bottom.

Mr. Hoover, when this condition developed, received some pretty good advice, or else he advised himself well. Mr. Hoover said, as I recall, that we were going to have a new deal. He referred in his speech to some kind of a new theory or new deal, and he went on to say that we were going to take taxes off the little man and put them on the big man at the top, to bring things down to a more equal condition among all the people. That is what Mr. Hoover said at Indianapolis, but on his way back here to Washington someone got hold of him. He said much in this speech along the lines that President Roosevelt has spoken. There is not much difference between what Hoover said at Indianapolis and at Madison Square Garden and what Roosevelt said during the campaign and before the N.R.A. meeting the other day. Both of them said practically the same thing. After Mr. Hoover made the declaration that he was going to take the taxes from the big interests in order to finance the country from the top they got hold of him when he came back here. This same man, Barney Baruch, appeared on the scene; they began to give him some advice, and the next thing they had Hoover out for a sales tax, advocating taking it from the bottom structure rather than from the top, not in the shape of an income tax on big fortunes but a sales tax on littl purchasers. I said:

What is the tax bill going to contain when it comes out? We have waited a long time to get some help. • • •

Why, if this Congress adjourns—

and does not provide a law for the effective starting of a redistribution of wealth in the United States, you need not be worried about the amount of the deficit that there is going to be in the National Treasury.

I said then, when we owed about $16,000,000,000, "You do not need worry yourselves, if you adjourn this Congress and do not provide for a redistribution of wealth do not worry about what the Treasury owes now." Well, what happened? The deficit has gone up to $32,000,000,000 instead of $16,000,000,000. I proved to be a pretty good prophet that time, I think. I said further:

If we adjourn here with this tax bill before us, with a bill passed as a result of it or with this bill passed, without providing a means for the redistribution of wealth in the United States today, and allow this snowball to go downhill for two or three more years as it is now, and allow this panic to be exploited as it is now being exploited to concentrate every business enterprise in this country, you do not need to worry about the Federal Government nor the Budget of the Federal Government. You will have a problem before you that is a great deal bigger than any problem of the Budget of the Federal Government.

That was in 1932. Have I not been proven to be correct? I do not think a man who was ever in the Senate will say that what I said has not been proved to be correct. In the same speech I said:

We are told that there never was a ruling class that abdicated. A great deal of speculation is made over who is the leader and who are the party leaders of this Nation, who are the leaders of Congress. I have been here long enough to say that if I had any legislation in the United States Congress today, I would a whole lot rather know that it had the sanction and approval of Morgan and Rockefeller and Baruch than to know that it had the sanction and approval of every party leader in both Houses of Congress.

That was in 1932 when I stood on the floor of the Senate and complained about the same men who are here now. I did not care whether they came here under one President or under another. I knew it was disaster, whichever way they came. They are still here. I named some of the same men on the floor of the Senate then that I named a moment ago. Blind guides! Blind guides! We used to hear it said in the old days that we would not expect the blind to lead the blind. Worse still, we do not expect the blind to lead men who have good eyes. These gentlemen have proved to be blind guides. They are a bad set of prophets. They are not good advisers. There should have been a change, but there was not. There should have been reform in the way we were going, but we did not make it.

I will read a little further:

The great and grand dream of America that all men are created free and equal, endowed with the inalienable right of life and liberty and the pursuit of happiness—this great dream of America, this great light, and this great hope—has almost gone out of sight in this day and time, and everybody knows it; and there is a mere candle flicker here and yonder to take the place of what the great dream of America was supposed to be.

The people of this country have fought and have struggled, trying, by one process and the other, to bring about the change that would save the American country to the ideal and purposes of America. They are met with the Democratic Party at one time and the Republican Party at another time—

That shows that I was not partisan, that I was not undertaking to play party politics at that time, because at that time I was clamoring for a liberalization of my own party—and both of them at another time, and nothing can be squeezed through these party organizations that goes far enough to bring the American people to a condition where they have such a thing as a livable country. We swapped the tyrant 3,000 miles away for a handful of financial slave-owning overlords who make the tyrant of Great Britain seem mild.

Mr. President, I am not going to read further. Here was the thing I said then. I said at that time that we could not do anything unless we dethroned the power of mighty finance. I said then the country could not come out of its chaos, and I say now that it cannot. I gave my remedy. That is my prescription. That is how I looked on it, and that is how the facts have been proved by time and experience.

I am submitting to the Senate today, in the closing hours of this day's session, just as we are about to adjourn here today, and just before we adjourn at the end of this week, the simple proposition whether or not we are going to go afield and refuse a moderate amelioration of the debt structure of the farming interests of the country. If I had the time this afternoon—I shall not ask my colleagues to stay with me here, however, for the purpose—but if I had the time this afternoon, Mr. President, I would sketch briefly through the years in point of time from the point of percentages, showing how this concentration had been as a funnel, beginning at the big end of the funnel and going to the little end of the funnel in one group and beginning at the little end of the funnel and going to the big end of the funnel in another group.

In other words, I would draw a triangle, with one group sitting at the apex and the other group sitting at the base, and put them side by side, showing how each year a smaller percentage of the people owned a larger percentage of the wealth and how a larger percentage of the people owned a smaller percentage of the wealth. Perhaps Senators can visualize those angles, one group sitting on the base, the other group sitting on the apex. They will see a line drawn through the angle at a point somewhat about the center. Then, as we begin to go above the line, the few begin to get more; and as we begin to go below the line, the many begin to get less, until an absolutism develops to where the small percentage gets comparatively all and the large percentage gets comparatively none.

Today the masses have nothing. They have not a thing. Seventy-five percent of the American people have not a thing on earth. Can we imagine that condition to exist? Seventy-five percent of the American people have not a copper cent. Seventy-five percent of the American people, Mr. President, have not anything at all. Their debts amount to more than the little property they have.

According to the statistics that have been compiled and the admissions, that is the condition. No longer are the facts disputed now. When Mr. Morgan and Mr. Lamont were down here, they raised their little voices to dispute it, but since then that contradiction has passed out of existence. Statistics have been collected showing the condition so clearly that they make no more murmur against it. There are so many debts owed by the masses at the bottom of the triangle that they have not a thing left; not a thing.

What have we? Some man said to me, "You have already decentralized wealth. Nobody has anything." I said, "No? The property is all here. Everything is here that we have had here. Somebody has it. The masses have not got it. Who has? We know."

Just a few years ago there was a banquet held which was attended by 12 influential capitalists. At that banquet one of the 12 men rose and said, "It has been estimated that 12 men control all the business of the United States," That was his remark. He said, "I am one of the 12 men. Many of you are among the 12. That statement which has been made, that 12 men own all the country, is correct. I am one of the 12."

The report of that meeting and of that statement was given to the world through the efforts of Mr. James Truslow Adams, in a book which he wrote, which he styled "The Epic of America." Mr. Adams stated, in commenting upon that event, that, although that remark had been deleted from the newspaper report of the gathering of that evening, nevertheless, it is well known to the people, and even if it had not been made the facts were understood anyway.

That is the situation we face. As I said, had I the time in the closing hours of today's session to go into more detail, explaining the whys and the wherefores, the history and the authority, I feel sure that no one here, had he the time to look back in retrospection, could have made a prophecy other than that conditions would come as they now exist. We are now at the fulfillment of all our philosophy of laissez faire, the rule of the mighty. We have tried it out to its fullest extent.

But then we have undertaken to relieve the paralysis and to unscramble the congestion through expedients, none of which, however, takes into consideration that we must redistribute wealth, none of which takes into consideration that the masses must be relieved of debt. We have tried to unfreeze. We have tried to get going. We cannot get going. We cannot unfreeze. We cannot relieve the paralysis. The crystallization is too potent. There must be a melting. There must be a spreading.

May I say to the Senator who has just come into the Chamber, who was not here when I made some of these remarks early in the afternoon, which causes me to revert and to somewhat repeat what I have already said, there must be some melting process. It is like a huge cake of ice. The entire wealth of the country is an ice cake, we might say. It is in the hands of a relatively and comparatively infinitesimal minority. Something will have to be done to unfreeze, to decrystallize.

I have never yet been able to find any man who would undertake to defend the order as it exists today. Who is there who will say that he thinks it is possible for the country to come out with the entire wealth in the hands of a few people? Who is there who will say that he thinks the masses can pay their debts if a handful of people own all the property and are the only creditors? How are they going to begin the process of assimilating the resources of the country and distributing them among the people who could consume? How will the process be started?

We might just as well say that during the summertime we would make the Mississippi River flow to flood stage without the ice being melted in the North. It is the same proposition. The Mississippi River is practically at a low stage. It cannot be navigated in certain seasons of the year unless there is water. We might just as well try to start the flow of navigation through the Mississippi River without melting the ice of the North when the winter is over as to try to start the business of this country moving without melting the frozen fortunes that are in the hands of a few people. There is nothing to ride out on. There is no way of coming through. There is nothing to bear up the load; nothing to take the wheat that is in the hands of the speculator and place it upon the table of the hungry; nothing to take the cotton that lies upon the exchange and place it in the homes where it can clothe the naked children in the wintertime; nothing that can take the ownership of these houses and these tenements and all these palaces and place them at the disposal of the man who, with his wife and children, is walking the highways and the byways looking for a place to lay their heads. Nothing can be done unless this congestion is unfrozen, until this paralysis is disrupted, until the crystallization is thawed out and let flow, and until we distribute into the homes of 125,000,000 people the wherewithal that makes this country one of plenty and of luxury except for this false distribution that we have.

Why not? Who is there who does not want to do it? Who is there who does not say it should be done? Who steps in the way?

Well, to answer my own question, in a way nobody steps in the way. They all meet; they all agree that it has to be done, and they will do it. It is signed, sealed, and delivered. That settles it. Then we go in with a convenant with the people. Here we are, the possessors of the Ark of the Covenant. We go in to perform, and along comes Barney Baruch and hands us around a few baby rattles, and gets us off with a few experiments, making fudge at night, making this kind of a thing, killing a few pigs, milking a cow and putting the milk into the stream, shooting the cattle, burning up the cotton, playing around with baby rattles, giving the people something to pacify their minds and make them forget all about it, and the country goes on to the demnition bowwows, waiting around for somebody to come, waiting for the ships to come in laden with the oils of the Orient and the wines of the East. They cannot come in, they will not come in, and we know it.

That has been our trouble. It has been the work of the devil since the beginning of time to divert men's minds from good works and from worthy purposes and to get them confused with some kind of a tangled-up proposition, manipulations or processes that mean nothing. I do not mean the processing tax. I mean things of other kinds. I am trying to leave out anything except figures of speech rather than to deal in realities in some of these illustrations; but we have them. We have a few things.

Law is supposed to be simple. In days of stress, laws should be made workable. Laws should be made sensible. I have previously explained this to some of the other Senators here earlier in the afternoon. Others have come in now, and I wish them to know of it.

Laws should be made simple. Laws should be made workable. Laws should be understandable. It is the theory of the law, gentlemen of the Senate, as I shall explain unless

I am interrupted, that every man is presumed to know the law. That is the way we operate.

In other words, if I go out here on the streets tonight and I pick up a man sweeping the streets, or if I go out here in the country and pick up a man who is growing corn, or if I go out here and pick up a man who is hacking out a few crossties, that man is presumed to know all the law. It makes no difference what he does that is not in keeping with all the law in the State where he is and in the United States; the fact that he does not know what it is does not excuse him for anything.

That imposes upon the lawmaker the same duty to be reasonable. If we are going to have the law as it is, that a man must be charged with knowledge of it, then, forsooth, we should be charged with not asking that man and requiring of him something that we know is impossible. In other words, if this is a sensible Congress that is going to say, "We are going to send to the penitentiary every man who does contrary to what the law is", then this Congress ought to be sensible enough not to require that man to be charged with a knowledge of something that we know he cannot know.

All right. Now, let us have a little test here.

Is there any man here who will rise up and tell me what the price is, under the pressing code, for pressing a suit of clothes? If so, I should like to see him. I should like to see the color of his hair. That is one little law.

Is there any man here who will get up and tell me how long a grocery store can stay open? If there is, I want to see him. I am in the United States Senate, and I should like to see one of them.

Is there any man here who can show me the length that a crosstie must be made? If there is, I should like to see the color of his hair and the size of his eyes.

I should like to know if there is a man here who can tell me what a hotel has to charge for a room in Pelahatchee, Miss. I should like to know anything at all about these codes that any Member of the United States Senate can know; and yet they yanked up a little fellow here in New Jersey, I am told by the newspapers, and put him in jail, because he pressed a coat and a pair of pants for a man and charged him only 35 cents, and they said he ought to have charged the man 40 cents. They fined that poor little old devil, with a tub and a smoothing iron, $150, and sent him to the penitentiary for 30 days, for not carrying out the thing according to law.

Do you call that sensible legislating? Maybe it is, but that is not my way of looking at it. That is not how I look at it. I would have hardly any laws he had to remember. I have made the proposition to Congress, and I have made the proposition to the boards and the departments. I do not need any of these codes. We can simply get down to basic conditions in this country and write into the law that when a man gets so much money, that is the limit of what he is going to get; that when a man gets so much property, that is the limit of what he is going to get; that no man is going to be allowed to get so poor that he and his family starve; that no man is going to be allowed to get so destitute that he or his family are without something to wear.

Limit the size of the big man. Limit the poverty of the little man. In the words of the Scripture:

> Give me neither poverty nor riches; feed me with food convenient for me:
> Lest I be full, and deny Thee, and say, who is the Lord? or lest I be poor, and steal, and take the name of my God in vain.

That is the doctrine of the Scripture. Plato said that a state taking care of its people will see that there is not a great inequality between the citizens; that it will limit the share which one will be allowed to accumulate, and fix by law the amount below which no one will be allowed to fall. That was his theory. So was it the theory of Confucius, of Buddha, of Christ. It was the doctrine taught by the philosophers of all ages, and by the statesmen of America. It was part of the contract of the Pilgrims who landed in 1620, and I have read it into the RECORD today, to keep the people from becoming debt laden, and to have them share their wealth with one another. That was a part of it. It was written into the Declaration of Independence, and into the Constitution of the United States, and then allowed to be forgotten and to be ignored. Nostrums and experiments were undertaken by which they hoped to bypass the results inevitably to come to a country and to a class of people that does not keep its wealth and its prosperity shared and distributed so that the fullness may be enjoyed by the inhabitants of the land.

I had a grandfather, Mr. President, who lived a very peaceful and retiring life down in the great State of Louisiana. That is, he lived there part of the time.

There was a saloon there, and a young man came down from Maine who had never had any experience in mixing drinks, and he got a job in that saloon. My grandfather was a man who needed all his time. He needed it all, but he seldom used any of it. He was told that that young man did not know how to mix drinks. So the next day he volunteered to tutor him, and he went down to the saloon. He said to the young man, "I understand you are about to lose your job." The young man said, "Well, I am afraid I am." My grandfather said, "I have brought with me a book showing how to mix every drink in the category, and I am going to stand here and read you the directions how to mix these drinks, beginning with the A's, and I am going to try each drink until you get it mixed right. Then I will pass on to the next." [Laughter.] He spent the day with that young man. I will spend the day with my friends in Washington, if necessary, to see that they understand the situation.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LONG. I yield.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Does not the Senator believe that the same economic law which governs the price of cotton and the price of wheat and the price of pigs and the price of oil governs the value of money?

Mr. LONG. I do.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Then, if the economic law works so that if we make wheat scarce, wheat will be high in value; if the economic law works so that if we make hogs scarce, pork will be high in value; if the economic law works so that if we make cotton scarce, cotton will be high in value; and if the economic law works so that by making oil scarce, we can make oil high in value, does not the Senator agree that by making money scarce we make money high in value?

Mr. LONG. I think every child in this country understands that except the Secretary of the Treasury. He is the only man I know who keeps disputing it. It does not seem as though he can get the idea.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. The Senator and I agree upon the premise. Now, if the economic law works in such a way that when we make things scarce they become higher in value, will not the same economic law work in such a way that when we make things plentiful they become cheaper?

Mr. LONG. Yes.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Then, if we want to make money cheaper, we can put more money into circulation; and by making money more plentiful make it cheaper. Then if we make money cheaper, that automatically, alone, makes prices higher.

Mr. LONG. Absolutely. And thus people can pay themselves out of debt. It frees them from this calamity to a large extent.

The Secretary wanted to make pigs worth something, so he killed them. He wanted to make the cotton valuable, and we plowed up some of it. Milk was too cheap; that was poured into the creek.

It would seem that anyone would know that the trouble with the money situation and the price structure is that we do not have any money. That is the whole trouble. We are right back to the place we started from. With all my effort to stay away from it, I am inescapably brought back to the silver question.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, will the Senator further yield?

Mr. LONG. I yield.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Some people apparently wonder why it is that individuals cannot pay their taxes. Is it not true that in order to pay taxes the taxpayer must have money?

Mr. LONG. I think so.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. At the present time it is impossible for taxpayers to get money, except in two ways: First, to borrow the money, and, of course, everyone knows that they cannot borrow money, because the banks will not lend. The other way is for them to sell something, and when they have to sell the commodities they produce for so little that they cannot get enough to pay cost of production it is impossible to have profit or any surplus money with which to pay taxes. Does not the Senator from Louisiana think that is the trouble?

Mr. LONG. I think that is our tax trouble today with respect to municipalities, counties, States, and the Federal Government. In other words, if there is no profit to be made out of agriculture, how is a man going to pay? A man must have some profit in order to pay anything. There is no profit in agriculture.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, will the Senator further yield?

Mr. LONG. I yield.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I should like to ask the Senator another question to ascertain if he and I agree, if no one else does. Is it not a fact that the economic system under which we are living in the United States is what is known as the capitalistic system?

Mr. LONG. Yes.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Is it not also a fact that the capitalistic system must depend for its existence upon profits?

Mr. LONG. Yes.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Unless the property owners can make profit from property, they cannot keep the property, and they cannot survive.

Mr. LONG. That is the theory.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Then the capitalistic system must depend upon profits. People must make some money.

Mr. LONG. That is true.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. The second question: Is it not a fact that governments—Federal, State, county, and city—depend upon taxes? In order to get taxes the people must have money with which to pay them. In order to obtain the money they must make profits. Therefore, unless the people, the farmers, the miners, the lumbermen, the merchants, and others can make some money they cannot pay taxes.

Mr. LONG. That is true.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Is it not a fact, then, that both the capitalistic system and the Government itself rest upon profits?

Mr. LONG. Yes.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Unless the people can make profits those two institutions must fall.

Mr. LONG. They must.

We admit that the large majority of the American people are carrying on today without such a thing as profit. Agriculture is carrying on without such a thing as profit. There is no profit. Not only that, we are retiring a large number of people engaged in agriculture from the ranks of prospective activity, because we cannot use the products of too many of them.

We refuse to remonetize silver. We are told now that perhaps there will be a compromise, and we will be allowed to compromise on the question of remonetization of silver.

I consider myself a member of the silver bloc, and of the expansion-of-the-currency bloc. I have been working in that line ever since I have been here. The fact of the case is that I am a kind of an assistant leader in both of them—appointed by myself. I made myself assistant leader of the expansionists and the assistant leader of the silverites. I have offered some of the bills with regard to both those things. That ought to make me some kind of a third-rate assistant leader, at least by my own appointment, in this silver bloc and this expansion bloc.

I desire to say to the other members of this bloc that if they accept any more proposals for permissive legislation I am going to turn them out of the lot, and they will not come back. The next man I hear of who agrees to have a law passed as a compromise, which law is going to let the power be in the hands of someone else to remonetize silver, I will tell that man that I am no longer a member of his bloc.

From now on I am legislating by act of Congress, and that is all. I am not asking anyone's permission to do it either, so far as my vote goes. We have all the permissive legislation we need now, and that does not do any good.

We had the fight for silver won last year. We worked mighty hard, Mr. President. The Presiding Officer knows how hard we worked. We worked day and night to get ready for a vote, and we secured four more votes for silver on this side of the Chamber than there were against silver. It was due to the Republican support that the President was not obliged to carry out the provisions contained in our proposed legislation at that time. Some of the Republicans who criticize the President, remember that. When they criticize the President, let them remember that they helped accomplish the defeat of that helpful legislation.

The next thing we heard was, "We are all right; we have won." So I was agreeable to the proposition to put in a code allowing the remonetization of silver and the expanding of the currency.

I will ask my friend from Oklahoma, since he is the man who handled the bill for us at that time, if he understood the bill to mean that we were going to decrease the currency at that time, or for what reason did he understand he was writing the bill at the time he wrote it?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LONG. I yield.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I had hoped that through the exercise of the powers conferred in the bill we would have more money placed in circulation, and, with the Senator's permission, I will make this observation in justification of my hopes, and likewise in justification of the Chief Executive.

The amendment adopted about a year ago conferred upon the President five powers.

Power no. 1 was to go into the open market and buy bonds through the Federal Reserve System, paying for those bonds with Federal Reserve notes. In the exercise of that power the administration has bought $600,000,000 of bonds, and placed $600,000,000 of new money in circulation. Notwithstanding the placing of $600,000,000 of new money in circulation, the total circulation has decreased something like $700,000,000 since that time. That was power no. 1.

Power no. 2 authorized the Chief Executive to accept silver from our war debtors. The nations which owe us interest and installments were given the privilege of paying us in silver at the rate of 50 cents an ounce. Under this power the debtor nations have paid us 22,000,000 ounces of silver. That power has been exercised to that extent.

Power no. 3 authorized the Chief Executive to remonetize silver. Under that power the President has issued a proclamation as of December 21 whereby he is now taking for the Treasury all newly mined silver. That is, of course, confined to this country. To that extent power no. 3 has been exercised.

Power no. 4 gave the President the right to devalue or cut the gold content of the gold dollar. Under that power he has reduced the content of the gold dollar from 23 grains plus to 15 grains plus, or reduced it from 100 cents to a value in gold of 59 cents plus. The President has exercised the fourth power.

The fifth power conferred was to issue greenbacks and Treasury notes to the extent of $3,000,000,000. That is the only power the Chief Executive has not exercised to any extent whatever.

I think it is only fair to place in the RECORD at this time the fact that, in a sense, the powers conferred have been exercised, but, in my judgment, they have not been exercised to a sufficient extent to do the thing that could be done. Because of that I still think we should take steps now to see that more money is placed in circulation to the end that money may become more plentiful, thereby cheaper, and to the extent that money becomes cheaper prices will automatically be raised.

Mr. LONG. Let me ask the Senator a question. Regardless of all the power we conferred, what we wound up with was $700,000,000 less money. Is not that correct?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. That is correct.

Mr. LONG. We were to get more money. That is what I understood. Instead of that we got $700,000,000 less money. A lot of powers were exercised in some kind of a left-handed way, but we did not get anything out of it. We did not get the commodity values and we did not get the money.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LONG. Certainly.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. For the benefit of the RECORD I think it is perhaps well to place in the RECORD at this time the essential facts taken from the Federal Reserve statement of yesterday. Every Thursday at 4 o'clock the Federal Reserve Board issues a statement relating to finance. This statement is of date May 2. On May 2 there was money in circulation in the sum of $5,359,000,000. The week prior to the past week the circulation decreased some $30,000,000-odd. The report shows that during the past 7 days the circulation has increased $35,000,000. I do not know how that comes about, but that is the statement which was released on the 3d day of May. Instead of losing as much as the Senator stated, the circulation has increased $35,000,000 during the past 7 days.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, in the moving up and down, with the net result of steadily going downward, we need not less than $7,000,000,000 of new money in this country today. We need at least $7,000,000,000. I do not believe we can get out of the situation with $7,000,000,000. We have a law in this country under which we are supposed to be allowed to issue paper money at the ratio of 40 cents in gold to the dollar of currency. In other words, if we have 40 cents in gold in the Treasury we will be allowed to issue a dollar in greenbacks. How much money have we in the Treasury today, since we devalued the dollar? We have about $8,500,000,000 in the Treasury in gold on the 59-cent basis.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. It is not quite so much as that.

Mr. LONG. Will the Senator give me the figures?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. On the 3d of May we had a total monetary gold stock of $7,756,000,000.

Mr. LONG. My figures are a little high but not very much too high. We have $7,756,000,000. That is the amount of gold money we have in the Treasury. We have only about five and one third billion dollars of money outstanding. In other words, instead of having money on the basis of 40 cents gold to $1 in currency, we have $1.35 or $1.40 in gold to every dollar of currency that we have circulating. It is a great financial soundness to argue that we have gold enough to take care of the currency outstanding. The fact of the matter is we are on a worse basis than the gold standard today. We have less money. We have circulating among the people $2,400,000,000 less currency than we have gold. That is our status.

God knows if there ever was a time when the circumstances justified using the full limit of 40 cents gold as against $1 in currency, this is the time; but on the basis of $7,700,000,000 of gold we could issue today $19,200,000,000 in currency and still have no inflation.

Inflation of the currency is supposed to be, by those who argue against it, the issuance of paper money not supported by an adequate sum of gold. Our law, and the law of all nations for all time, has been that 40 percent of gold backing up a dollar of currency does not constitute inflation, but is sound, adequate, and secure financing.

That being the case we can today issue $19,200,000,000 worth of currency less the $5,300,000,000 outstanding, or between $13,000,000,000 and $14,000,000,000 worth of currency. If we are going to get any benefit from devaluing the gold dollar, we must put money out into circulation. It will not do any good to devalue the gold dollar down to 59 cents and then put out no additional money. If we are going to get any good out of reducing the gold content of the dollar, we have got to put out billions of currency. In other words, if we are going to cut the gold content of the dollar from $1 to 59 cents and then not have any more dollars in circulation, there was no use in cutting the gold content of the dollar. We might as well have left it like it was. If we are going to do anything, it is time to do something about this.

We do not ask to inflate. We ask to reflate. Rather, we ask that we expand our currency to its normal requirements. We need to get this country out of debt. We not only need to do that; we have our silver bill here. We have the bill here for remonetizing silver. We have the choice of two routes. We can take whichever one we want, or both of them; but we will have to remonetize silver if we want any world trade, or if we want to dispose of the surplus agricultural commodities we now have. That must be done, and it cannot be done unless we do it. That must be done first. Silver must be remonetized.

India uses silver as the yardstick of money. India and China together, with anywhere from seven hundred and fifty to eight hundred million population—nearly half the entire population of the world—use silver only as the primary yardstick of money. Silver also is the yardstick of money for the South American countries. It is the yardstick of money for many of the European countries—the Orient, Asia, Africa, South America, a large part of Europe, and even America is on a half-way basis of neither silver nor gold and part of both of them. Nobody knows what it is. There is no money of any kind in existence. I gave an example of that before my friend from Washington [Mr. BONE] came in, to show that we did not really have any money.

Here is a bill. It says, "The United States of America will pay to the bearer, on demand, $5." They are going to pay me that in gold. That is all they have to pay the dollar in, and yet they have a law that if I go there and get the gold they will put me in jail. So we have a bill here that gives us a right to go and get a dollar, and we do not dare go and get the dollar; so the fact is, we have no currency at all. Nobody knows what it is all about. Nobody can tell.

We would be a whole lot better off from a legal standpoint if we had the entire amount of currency inflated, and silver made the basis of money. It is argued that it is not a sound thing to do. Why is it not sound to remonetize silver? Where is all this terrible inflation to come from?

Why, Mr. President, the silver proposition, according to the bill I have introduced here, tacked on as an amendment to the banking bill, or according to the bill that is offered as a substitute by the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. THOMAS], would mean an expanding of our commerce and of our trade intercourse so that we might dispose of these surplus commodities which we have, and give these people an immense chance to get out of debt that they never will have otherwise. If we are not going to do that, or if we are going to do it, either way, we have the farm problem to consider from the standpoint of debts. No way is provided to pay out the debts of the farmer.

Therefore, pass this Frazier amendment to give the farmers the same right of bankruptcy you are giving by the main bill to corporations.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The absence of a quorum having been suggested, the clerk will call the roll.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, will the Senator withhold that suggestion for a moment?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I withhold it.

Mr. McNARY. Is it the desire of the Senator to continue this evening, or has the Senator from Louisiana concluded his remarks?

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I do not know whether the Senator from Louisiana has concluded his remarks or not. I did not hear him observe as to that. I understand that the able Senator from Louisiana has yielded the floor in order that his colleague on this question, the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. FRAZIER], may take the floor.

Mr. LONG. If it is the purpose of the Senate to adjourn this afternoon I should think my remarks probably might be concluded, and I would leave the floor to the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. FRAZIER. I desire to make some remarks on the amendment before we have a vote on it, and should be glad to get the floor and proceed in the morning if that would be satisfactory.

Mr. LEWIS. The Senator wants the floor and desires to be recognized now, as I understand. Will the Senator please address the Chair at this point?

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, just a moment. Are we going to recess? Is that all right? If it is, I will give up the floor.

Mr. LEWIS. We are going to recess and go on tomorrow.

Mr. LONG. All right. That is all right with me.

Mr. LEWIS. Then the Senator from Louisiana concludes at this time?

Mr. LONG. Yes, sir.

Mr. FRAZIER obtained the floor.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I think the Senate ought to proceed for a time with the consideration of this bill.

Mr. McNARY. Inasmuch as the Senator from Louisiana has concluded his remarks, and the Senator from North Dakota desires the floor, I suggest to the Senator that the Senate now take a recess until 11 o'clock in the morning.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I am wondering if we cannot have an agreement to vote some time tomorrow.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, most of the Senators have gone. It is rather late. I should rather say we might vote on Monday. I do not even know about that. It would not hurt to adjourn over until Monday. I think there are going to be a considerable number of conferences on this matter tomorrow.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I do not think we can do that, Mr. President. I think we had better proceed.

Mr. LONG. The absence of a quorum has been suggested.

Mr. McNARY. May I make another proposal to the Senator?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. In view of the manner in which we have been proceeding, I think we ought to do some business.

Mr. McNARY. I am in accord with that view. However, on account of the small number of Senators in attendance, and the fact that many Members are at their offices attending to their correspondence, I wonder if we might not then recess until 10 in the morning, with the Senator from North Dakota recognized?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I think we can get a quorum. Let us go on.

Mr. McNARY. The Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. THOMAS] suggested the absence of a quorum and then left the Chamber.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Very well; let us have a quorum.

Mr. LONG. He suggested the absence of a quorum. I renew his request.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I suggest the absence of a quorum, if necessary.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Adams	Carey	Hatch	Neely
Bachman	Clark	Hayden	Norris
Bankhead	Connally	King	O'Mahoney
Barbour	Copeland	Lewis	Pope
Black	Dill	Lonergan	Robinson, Ark.
Bone	Duffy	Long	Schall
Brown	Fletcher	McGill	Sheppard
Bulkley	Frazier	McKellar	Thomas, Okla.
Byrnes	Gibson	McNary
Capper	Goldsborough	Murphy

Mr. NORRIS. I desire to announce that the senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] is necessarily absent from the city.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Thirty-eight Senators having answered to their names, there is not a quorum present. The clerk will call the names of the absent Senators.

The legislative clerk called the names of absent Senators, and Mr. HATCH, Mr. LONERGAN, Mr. PITTMAN, Mr. REYNOLDS, Mr. RUSSELL, Mr. SHIPSTEAD, Mr. STEIWER, Mr. STEPHENS, and Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma answered to their names when called.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Forty-seven Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is not present.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I move that the Sergeant at Arms be directed to request the attendance of the absent Senators.

The motion was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Sergeant at Arms will execute the order of the Senate.

After a little delay, Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana, Mr. NYE, Mr. DIETERICH, Mr. THOMAS of Utah, Mr. COUZENS, Mr. DICKINSON, Mr. THOMPSON, Mr. WAGNER, Mr. VAN NUYS, and Mr. VANDENBERG entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty-eight Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present. Without objection, the order directing the Sergeant at Arms to request the attendance of absent Senators will be vacated.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, I desire to answer some of the objections which have been urged against my amendment to the pending corporation bankruptcy bill.

The objection was made that the amendment would impair contracts. The contracts on farm mortgages are really impaired now. The indebtedness on our farms was incurred when prices were high, when money was plentiful. The condition has changed entirely since that time. Prices have gone down, overhead expenses have gone up, and the values of farm property have gone down materially. They have gone down until in many cases the mortgage would not be covered by a sale of the land at the present price. The farmers' indebtedness has increased for the same reason; so the contract has been impaired on one hand and increased on the other.

If our farmers are to retain the ownership of their land, if they are to retain the ownership of their homes, they must be given a chance to take advantage of the bankruptcy law just the same as business interests have been given an opportunity to take advantage of it, just the same as corporations have been given an opportunity to take advantage of the bankruptcy law.

It will be recalled that at the time the farm bill was before the special session last year I offered a substitute for the refinancing provision, a proposal to refinance the farmers on their existing indebtedness. That substitute was voted down. Some of the Members said it was unconstitutional.

I never can quite agree with some of my friends here who are attorneys and learned in the law on these measures which they claim are unconstitutional. The Supreme Court always has the last guess as to the constitutionality of any law we may pass, and even the Supreme Court is not unanimous in its decisions many times. Oftentimes we have a 5-to-4 decision. So I never worry when anyone says that a bill is unconstitutional, because, in my opinion, no one knows, until the Supreme Court gets through with it, whether it is unconstitutional or not; and, as I say, usually they do not agree upon the question. I am convinced, however, that something must be done to save our American farmers.

The Senate on two occasions has refused to pass a bill I have introduced to refinance the farmers on their existing indebtedness. It refused to do that when the farm bill was up at the special session. The argument was then made that the creditors should scale down their mortgages; that the creditors of the farmers, those holding the mortgages, should scale them down and make a settlement in that way.

Mr. President, that has been attempted under the farm-land bank provision, and in practically every instance the insurance companies and the banks which hold such mortgages have refused to scale down. The farmers have not been able to settle, and thousands upon thousands of farms are being foreclosed upon, and the farmers will lose their homes unless something is done, especially after the moratorium which has been declared in several States shall have ended.

So it seems to me now, inasmuch as the bill which was passed at the special session did not result in having the farmer's indebtedness scaled down, that we should adopt the amendment I have offered to allow the scaling down of farm indebtedness; and that is what this amendment provides. It allows the debts to be scaled down, and allows the farmer, after going through bankruptcy proceedings, to buy back his land, at a low rate of interest, it is true; but, in my opinion, that is not as bad as the conditions at the present time. The creditor now is not getting interest on his mortgage. Practically none of them are getting interest on their mortgages. Some of the farmers have been defaulting for 2 or 3 years on the interest on their mortgages. So if settlement is made under this amendment they can get at least 1-percent interest, and a chance of getting at least the cash value out of their land over a period of 6½ years.

Some of the Senators seem to think there is something sacred about farm mortgages, something sacred about the rate of interest that is being charged by the bankers and money lenders to our farmers. The fact that we have had the high rates of interest in the past on farm indebtedness it seems to me, is largely responsible for the plight in which we find ourselves; at least, it has had a great deal to do with it; and I am very much interested in seeing the farmers given a chance to hold their property and to pay out.

I have had a great many letters from farmers, some of which I have with me, but I am not going to take the time to read them. Many farmers have written me whose applications for loans from the banks have been turned down. I have written to the land bank at St. Paul in each instance, and there are many cases in which they have refused to give the farmer a large enough loan to refinance his indebtedness. These farmers, of course, at the present time are down and out, and there is no chance of their holding their land any longer than the period of the moratorium which now prevails in North Dakota.

I have a letter here that is dated May 1. It is from the land bank at St. Paul. They give their reasons for not renewing a farmer's mortgage. The farmer has a 640-acre farm. He has an indebtedness of about $6,500, as I remember, on his land. He has, in addition, some outside indebtedness. I asked the bank if they could not reconsider and, between the combination of the land bank loan and the commissioner's loan, give this farmer enough to refinance his indebtedness, and give him a chance to pay out. They wrote back that it would be impossible, that under the conditions which exist out there, they would not feel that it was a safe loan.

In many instances the land bank has written to the farmer who has applied for a loan telling him they were sorry, but that they could not make the loan. They will not agree to make a loan of any size on farmers' land. That is absolutely unfair. The refinancing bill which was passed at the special session was said to be for the purpose of enabling farmers to refinance their indebtedness, and to scale it down. The fact is that the indebtedness has not scaled down, and my amendment would compel the mortgagee to scale down the debt to the present value of the land. In other words, an appraiser would be appointed, and the land would be appraised at a reasonable value at the present time. Then, of course, the creditors would have to take their share.

The amendment is simply intended to save the homes of farmers, and can be and is justified under bankruptcy proceedings, and under the bankruptcy provision of the Constitution. All that the mortgagee and the lien holder and creditor ever were entitled to was the reasonable value of the bankrupt property, over and above the exemptions.

Mr. President, it seems to me that there is no logical argument against doing this for the farmer. We have legislated here for the benefit of the banker, for the benefit of the railroad companies, for the benefit of the corporations, and only a few days ago passed a bankruptcy law for the benefit of municipalities. I voted for that measure, because the argument was made that there were thousands of cities which were absolutely broke, and which could not meet their indebtedness unless some such measure were passed. I voted for the bill as indicating my desire to try to help the municipalities. I think they are entitled to some help. But the farmers, who produce the food products with which to feed the Nation, are also entitled to some assistance. So I hope that a sufficient number of Senators will agree to this amendment, let it go to conference, and see what can be done there.

Mr. President, the point has been made that the amendment is unconstitutional. I want to say that, according to the information I have, a subcommittee of the Committee on the Judiciary of the House of Representatives considered a similar measure, one introduced in the House as a separate bill, and there were five lawyers, from various sections of the country, on the subcommittee which considered the measure. They did not seem to think the bill was unconstitutional; at any rate, they made a favorable report to the committee. So it seems to me that even the lawyers in Congress disagree about the constitutionality of the measure.

I have some citations of cases, but I shall not bother to read them. A day or two ago, when the amendment was offered, I think it was the junior Senator from Oregon [Mr. STEIWER] who raised the objection that there should be a time limit in it. This amendment is an amendment to section 75 of the Bankruptcy Act. In paragraph (c) of section 75 there is fixed a time limit of 5 years. Any farmer may come in within 5 years' time and make application, and go through bankruptcy. A little over 1 year has elapsed of that 5-year period, so if the amendment shall be agreed to there will be almost 4 years for it to run.

This afternoon I also perfected the amendment by striking out, wherever it occurred, the word "homestead", so that the amendment would now read, in one case, that "the exemption be set aside", where before it said "homestead and exemption." In another place it will read, "the referee shall issue an order setting aside to such debtor his exemptions." Of course, the reference is to exemptions authorized by law in the State where foreclosure takes place.

Mr. President, to sum up the situation briefly in regard to the amendment, it affects only farmers, and it is to provide for a scaling down of their indebtedness. The amendment provides that the referee in bankruptcy shall appoint appraisers to appraise the actual value of all the bankrupt's property, and, after the debtor's exemptions shall have been set aside, he shall be permitted to select any or all of the remainder of his property and retain possession of it and pay for it on the installment plan, with a rate of interest of 1 percent, and then, on the installment plan, pay it out in 6½ years.

Under the provisions of the amendment, a farmer going through bankruptcy is allowed to retain possession of his property, under the control of the court, and to make the installment payments over a period of 6½ years. The creditors, including the mortgagee and the lienholders, will have to be satisfied with getting from the debtor the value of the property covered by the mortgage or lien, and the unsecured creditors will have to be satisfied with the fair actual value of all the debtor's property after his exemptions are set aside and the liens up to the actual present value of the property have been taken care of. In case the farmer shall wish to dispose of any of his property, or consume it, under the terms of the amendment he will have to pay the appraised value to the lien holders.

Mr. President, I could talk for some time on the farm situation, but I do not want to delay the Senate this evening. It is getting late and I understand the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SHIPSTEAD] is anxious to make a few remarks on the measure.

If our farmers are to be given an opportunity—and I think everyone will agree that they should have an opportunity—to retain the ownership of their lands and their farms, we have either to enact legislation which will allow them to refinance their existing indebtedness or else scale it down. This amendment simply provides that they may scale down their existing indebtedness to the fair value of their property and that they may make a fair payment for it.

I simply want to say, in conclusion, as was said this afternoon—perhaps some of the Senators did not hear it—that, according to figures compiled by one of the leading farm organizations in the Middle West, approximately 3,000 foreclosures and sales are taking place each day. That means that a large percentage of farmers will soon go out of business, so far as their being landowners and home owners is concerned. In my opinion, no greater calamity and no greater catastrophe could happen to those American farmers, who have lived on their lands perhaps a quarter of a century or a half a century and spent a lifetime working there in building up the farms, than to see them foreclosed and lost to them and their families, not because of any fault of their own but lost to them because of the dereliction of the United States Congress.

No one can tell me that the United States Congress could not have saved these farmers if it had wanted to do so. When the railroads were in dire need of help the Congress came to their assistance. When the bankers needed help the Congress came to their assistance. Oh, yes; a moratorium for the bankers was declared over night. Every bank in the United States was closed. What for? To protect the bankers' property; to keep them from going broke.

The Congress has also taken care of municipalities and corporations, and everyone else except the American farmer. It is true that we pass laws here and appropriate money for the Agricultural Department. Ask the average farmer out in the grass roots how much advantage the Agricultural Department is to him. Ask him how much the Department has done for him. Show that farmer the great new Agricultural Department Building, tell him how much the Congress appropriates each year for the maintenance of that Department, and then ask him how he would vote if the question were put to him as to whether or not the Agricultural Department of the United States should be abolished entirely.

I am satisfied as to how a great majority of the farmers of this country would vote on that question, because they say they have never gotten a square deal either at the hands of the Department of Agriculture or at the hands of the United States Congress. I am frank to say that, in my opinion, they are right. They have never had a square deal either at the hands of the Department of Agriculture or at the hands of the United States Congress.

If any other industry in the United States were in the hard, dire straits that the American farmer is in today, we would stay here tonight until we had passed a bill which would take care of that industry. Apparently, however, the American farmer cannot be given the same rights under the bankruptcy law that everyone else is given. The bankruptcy law is only a part of the police power to protect the interests of the country, and the farmers are entitled to that protection just the same as anyone else is. Apparently, however, we cannot get that protection for the American farmer.

I have called this matter to the attention of the Senate so many times that I am almost ashamed of it; but during the special session Senators will remember that in the Agricultural Committee of the Senate, and on the floor of the Senate itself, we put into the farm bill a provision that the farmer should receive cost of production and a fair profit for his products. That provision was stricken out by the conferees. Then when the National Industrial Recovery Act was passed we provided in it that the industries should receive cost of production. It went into the bill. The N.R.A. has put that provision into effect.

The senior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG] said that under the code the price of pressing a suit of clothes was raised 5 cents and that someone was arrested because he kept the old schedule instead of going up to 40 cents, as provided in the code. Under the various codes, cost of production has been guaranteed for every industry except that of farming. I defy any Member of this body to go into any agricultural community in any State of the Union and explain to the farmers why the Congress of the United States has given every other industry in the country a provision covering cost of production, and has denied the same privilege and the same right to the American farmer, who produces the food products with which to feed the Nation, who works harder and works longer hours than any other class of people on earth.

The farmers are obliged to work under difficult conditions, and particularly under severe climatic and weather conditions. In my section of the country there have been no rains this spring. There have been wide-spread dust storms occurring practically every day. It was necessary for the pilot of an airplane to fly at an altitude of 10,000 feet on his trip between Chicago and Minneapolis the other day in order to get away from the dust. The dust storms begin away up in Canada, and come down as far as Kansas. I do not know what the situation is going to be; but, Mr. President, one thing is certain—a square deal was promised to the farmers in the last campaign by the present administration. They were promised a square deal, along with industry, but they have not gotten it. No one can tell me, or can tell any farmer in this country, that the American farmer has had a square deal at the hands of Congress. Unless we shall give the farmers a square deal, unless something shall be done to give them a chance to retain the ownership of their land and the ownership of their homes, they will be forced to go out of business and lose everything they have.

The amendment I have proposed would give the farmers a chance to get out from under their present heavy burden, and pay the fair value of their farms, and retain their ownership.

Mr. President, I hope the amendment will be agreed to.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, I should not detain the Senate at this late hour for the purpose of saying anything on the amendment to the pending bill, were it not for the fact that the amendment has been ridiculed and, I think, a great injustice has been done to it.

There is involved in this amendment a principle which is in perfect harmony with the bill before the Senate. The bill before the Senate is not a bankruptcy bill. The bill, to which this amendment is offered, is a debt reduction bill or a debt repudiation bill.

It is provided that a corporation which owes money shall have permission to file a petition in court. The corporation does not need to show that it is insolvent. All it has to show is that it is unable to meet its debts at the time of maturity. If it can show that it is unable to meet its debts at the time of maturity, the bill provides a plan under which it can have its debts reduced, whether all its creditors agree to the reduction or not. Some of the creditors may think the corporation may pay its debts in time and, therefore, will not agree to a reduction of the indebtedness. That, however, makes no difference. If a certain number agree, those who do not agree and will not consent to the arrangement which is proposed must come into court and take the consequences.

It was said here yesterday, and has been said here today, that we must not interfere with a contract. That rule is applied to a farm mortgage. It is said that the holder of the mortgage is entitled to the letter of the law. Yesterday I ventured to ask whether or not the right of a farm creditor is more sacred than that of a man holding a bond of a corporation or a municipality. It would appear, from the statements made on the floor of the Senate, that the right of a farm creditor is more sacred.

What does the bill before the Senate provide? Under section 79 it is provided that any corporation which could become a bankrupt, and so forth, may file an original petition, if it can show that it is unable to meet its debts as they mature, and that it desires to effect a plan of reorganization. That is one thing the corporation has to show. The inability of the corporation to meet its debts as they mature runs all through the bill. That is the basis of the petition.

Mr. BONE. In effect, it amounts to insolvency.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Very well; let us say that it amounts to insolvency. Then give the farmer the same privilege of calling his creditors into court if he cannot pay his debts as they mature. I dare say that the farmers of the United States who are in debt cannot pay their debts as they mature. If that means insolvency, give the farmer the same treatment that is accorded to a corporation, or a municipality, or a railroad company. Establish equality before the law. What is the plan? It is entirely proper to modify the contract of a corporation, but it is unconstitutional when applied to a farm mortgage.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I yield.

Mr. LONG. Has the Senator been able to learn just what is the difference upon which the contention as to the unconstitutionality of the bill can be based, if it is constitutional as to railroads and corporations? I have been unable to find it. Perhaps the Senator can understand it.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. The basis of differentiation?

Mr. LONG. Yes. The farmer gets his property back at a fair value and he is given 6 years to pay out with interest.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I am able to read English, but I am not a constitutional lawyer and therefore find it difficult to harmonize the arguments made against the amendment with the provisions of the bill.

What does the bill before the Senate provide with respect to violation or changing a contract? On page 6, specifying the plan under which this is to be done, it is provided:

(b) A plan of reorganization within the meaning of this section (1) shall include provisions modifying or altering the rights of creditors generally—

There is a provision to modify or alter the rights of creditors generally—or any class of them, secured or unsecured, either through the issuance of new securities of any character or otherwise.

I should like to have those who say that such a provision should not apply to the farm mortgage explain why it should not, if we can apply it lawfully to corporations.

(2) May include provisions modifying or altering the rights of stockholders generally, or of any class of them, either through the issuance of new securities of any character or otherwise.

That is a provision for the altering and modifying of contracts of creditors in favor of debtors. If we applied that provision to a farm mortgage, we would give the debtor farmer the same privilege under the law that we give to the corporation, provided there is a showing that the farmer cannot meet his debts as they mature.

On page 8 of the bill there is even a provision for the rejection of contracts, not only for their modification and alteration, but also for their rejection. In line 13 it is provided that the court—

May reject contracts of the debtor which are executory in whole or in part, including unexpired leases except contracts in the public authority.

Due to the lateness of the hour, Mr. President, I do not intend to take the time of the Senate in an extended exposition of the bill. I merely wanted to point out that the principle involved in the amendment offered by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. FRAZIER] is in perfect harmony with the principle involved in the bill now pending before the Senate.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I yield.

Mr. BONE. I wish merely to ask the Senator a question. I think we all recognize that all forms of bankruptcy laws include involuntarily an abrogation of certain rights and may impair the validity of contracts and make them unenforceable. I should like to have the Senator express an opinion as to what would happen to a second mortgage on a farm under the bill. Perhaps at the bottom of page 3 he will find a reference to secured creditors and a reference to the interest of secured creditors. What would happen to the holder of a second mortgage or a third mortgage?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Applying the principle of the bill before the Senate, it appears that the bill in dealing with the creditors of the corporation throws them all in one basket. The court can deal with them at will as it finds necessary under the circumstances.

Mr. BONE. Of course, I know the Senator will realize that even in a bankruptcy proceeding, where there is a first mortgage and a second mortgage, the holder of the second mortgage is simply wiped out. I do not believe his position would be any worse under the terms of the bill. I thought the Senator might want to advert to it in his argument, though I know he is anxious to conclude.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. The bill before the Senate, on page 6, item 1, provides that the arrangement for reorganization "shall include provisions modifying or altering the rights of creditors generally, or any class of them, secured or not secured." Then there is the general provision. It seems to me a great deal of latitude is allowed to the court.

The amendment may have some faults in draftsmanship, but the general principle of the amendment is in perfect harmony with the principle of the bill pending before the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. FRAZIER and Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DICKINSON (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY]. Not knowing how he would vote, I withhold my vote.

Mr. FLETCHER (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. HATFIELD], who, I understand, if present, would vote "yea." I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. COOLIDGE] and vote "nay."

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas (when his name was called). I have a pair with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED], which I transfer to the Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL], and will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. VANDENBERG (when his name was called). On this question I am paired with the senior Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH]. If he were present, he would vote "nay", and if I were at liberty to vote I should vote "yea." I withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. LEWIS (after having voted in the negative). I voted under a misapprehension, unconscious that I was paired with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. HEBERT]. I now transfer my pair with him to the junior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE], and will allow my vote in the negative to stand.

Mr. McNARY (after having voted in the affirmative). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. BARBOUR], and will permit my vote to stand. If the Senator from Mississippi were present, he would vote "nay."

Mr. McKELLAR (after having voted in the negative). I inquire if the junior Senator from Delaware [Mr. TOWNSEND] has voted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. That Senator has not.

Mr. McKELLAR. I have a general pair with that Senator. I am informed, however, that if he were present he would vote as I have voted, so I will allow my vote to stand.

Mr. WAGNER (after having voted in the negative). I am paired upon this question with the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. PATTERSON]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH], and will permit my vote to stand.

Mr. LONG (after having voted in the affirmative). I change my vote from "yea" to "nay" in order to be able to move a reconsideration.

Mr. LEWIS. I desire to announce the following special pairs:

The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. KEYES] with the Senator from Arkansas [Mrs. CARAWAY];

The Senator from South Dakota [Mr. NORBECK] with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BAILEY]; and

I regret to announce that the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. OVERTON] is detained from the Senate on account of illness, and that the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST] and the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] are necessarily detained.

Mr. McNARY. I announce the following general pairs:

The Senator from Ohio [Mr. FESS] with the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS];

The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. WALCOTT] with the Senator from California [Mr. McADOO];

The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] with the Senator from Virginia [Mr. BYRD];

The VICE PRESIDENT. On this question the yeas are 11, the nays are 37. Two Senators are present and not voting. The amendment of the Senator from North Dakota is rejected.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was rejected, and move to lay that motion on the table.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I wish to state that I have discussed this matter with the Senator from Arkansas——

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, may I say to the Senator from Louisiana that I do not think there is any occasion to reconsider the vote, or to act upon the motion at this juncture. Let us proceed with the bill. My thought is that what the Senator from Louisiana had in mind was a motion to reconsider the vote on the bill if it should pass. I think the motion to reconsider the amendment should be withdrawn, unless the Senator wants it acted upon.

Mr. LONG. No; I wanted to move to reconsider the votes on this amendment and on the bill, so that the whole matter might be reopened to discussion.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator from Arkansas that when the Senator from Louisiana changed his vote, it was obviously for the purpose of moving to reconsider. We have had a two-day filibuster here without accomplishing anything. I, myself, made the motion to reconsider, and moved to lay that motion on the table, for the purpose of preventing further delay. If the Senator from Arkansas, who is the leader of the party on this side, thinks that procedure should not be taken, I am perfectly willing to ask unanimous consent to vacate my motion to reconsider and my motion to lay that motion on the table.

Mr. BLACK. I object.

Mr. LONG. It is all right, Mr. President. I have been acting in absolutely good faith about this matter.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Louisiana is not in order, because a motion to lay on the table is not debatable.

Mr. LONG. All right.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was rejected and to lay that motion on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I offer an amendment, which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will state the amendment.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 30, it is proposed to strike out line 7 to 14, both inclusive, and to insert in lieu thereof the following:

SEC. 3. In the administration of the act of July 1, 1898, entitled "An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States", approved July 1, 1898, as amended, the district court or any judge thereof shall, in its or his discretion, apportion appointments as receiver equitably among all persons, firms, or corporations, within the district, eligible thereto: Provided, however, That no person shall be appointed as a receiver who is a relative of any judge of a United States court, and no person shall be appointed as attorney for a receiver who is such relative, or who is a member of a law firm any member of which is a relative of such judge. The fee allowed a receiver or an attorney for a receiver shall in no case be excessive or exorbitant, and the court in fixing such fee shall have in mind the conservation and preservation of the estate of the bankrupt and the interests of the creditors therein.

The amendment was agreed to.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I desire to enter a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The motion will be entered.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

FRIDAY, MAY 4, 1934

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

Rev. Dr. Oscar Fisher Blackwelder, pastor of the Lutheran Church of the Reformation, Washington, D.C., offered the following prayer:

Father of us all, Lord of the nations, unfailing source of wisdom and guidance, we turn to Thee on behalf of the Congress. Conceived in prayer, in conscience, in freedom, in dependence on God, may our country sustain today these spiritual qualities of our fathers. May their sturdy faith inspire a like courage in us.

We pray for every public official in America. We pray for world brotherhood and for that security which is based on the recognition of the teachings of the Prince of Peace. Enable us to do our best, and Thy will. We ask in the spirit of Jesus. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

The message also announced that the Senate agrees to the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 2966) to authorize the coinage of 50-cent pieces in commemoration of the three hundredth anniversary of the founding of the Province of Maryland.

LEAVE TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. HOEPPEL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 2 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HOEPPEL. Mr. Speaker, in a local morning newspaper there appeared an article quoting our President to the effect that there will be no further major legislation presented to this Congress. In this connection I wish to call attention to a public resolution which I have received showing that in California, in the county of Los Angeles alone, there are more than 104,000 families on the public-relief rolls and more than 400,000 people on public charity. Their distressing plight demands our attention and, in my opinion we will be shirking our sacred responsibility as representatives of the people if we adjourn without enacting legislation to alleviate the desperate situation of our unfortunate unemployed. If we do not recognize their plight by the enactment of substantial progressive legislation, we at least ought to enact legislation which will permit them to earn their daily bread through the P.W.A., the C.W.A., or some other agency which the administration may suggest.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOEPPEL. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. In addition to the $30,000,000 which the Congress appropriated for this district and Washington, this present fiscal year, the District of Columbia has gotten $11,000,000 more from the P.W.A. and the C.W.A., $9,000,000 of which so far is a pure gift from the United States. Major Gotwals yesterday stated that there are 25,000 persons on the relief rolls here that are frauds, and who ought not to be on relief rolls in Washington.

Mr. HOEPPEL. The gentleman's statement is no doubt true, but I am interested first in my own constituency and my county, and I hope this Congress will not adjourn until we appropriate sufficient billions to put our American unemployed to work.

I ask unanimous consent in this connection to insert in the RECORD a letter received from the Mayor of Covina, in my district, together with a resolution on this same subject.

The SPEAKER. Without objection it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

The matter referred to follows:

COVINA, CALIF., April 28, 1934.

Hon. J. H. HOEPPEL,
Washington, D.C.

MY DEAR MR. HOEPPEL: The enclosed resolution is self-explanatory. The general social unrest and the entire recovery program can be constructively met only by putting men to work. The millions of dollars that have already been expended through direct relief have supplied the needs of the moment, but this plan of helping tends to destroy respect for and dependence on labor.

The citizens of the United States can best rehabilitate themselves through Federal control of work projects. The C.W.A. set-up under the management of the Army Engineers reestablished confidence on the part of the public generally. Their supervision should be continued, and the C.W.A. program carried on. We as a people cannot allow the dole system to be established, and we cannot prevent its establishment if the Government of the United States does not continue along the line of the C.W.A.

The program of a particular community must include the employment of local labor. The set-up we have outlined in this resolution will care for a goodly portion of our suffering unemployed. Our city council meets on the average of three times a week, no member of which receives or wants a cent of compensation. We are doing all we can to put over the recovery program. We need labor and material for our continued work. On this basis we will be able to provide for our people in a way to prevent suffering, the work program supplementing our local community chest, the Red Cross, and the charity work of our civic bodies.

I am urging that you get in touch with Mr. Harry Hopkins, express to him the sentiment of your constituents, and work with the same energy you have demonstrated before, to the end that we may go on, and keep going, until this stimulus shall bring about a return of livable conditions, thus justifying the expenditure of huge sums of money.

Again thanking you for your many past favors, and trusting sincerely that you will again represent us in Washington, I am,

Very sincerely yours,

GEO. H. MAXFIELD.

Resolution 70

Whereas the unemployment situation in the county of Los Angeles, Calif., is grave; and

Whereas the quotas and allotments for relief in this county as announced under the S.E.R.A. are wholly inadequate to care for the local relief problem; and

Whereas a serious unemployment problem exists in Covina, with no adequate provisions to meet the consequent distress which is imminent; and

Whereas the city of Covina made application to the C.W.A. for governmental assistance in meeting the unemployment situation of December 1933; and

Whereas the application was found good and acceptable by the C.W.A.; and

Whereas the C.W.A. did not fully comply with the terms set up in said application, which failure resulted in the inability of the city of Covina to complete the work outlined therein by the 29th of March 1934; and

Whereas the city of Covina is not financially able to furnish material, equipment, insurance, and supervision to complete said project; and

Whereas other constructive work projects are pending which will, if carried through, adequately supplement the agencies now administering the relief program: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the incomplete C.W.A. project no. 448 be resumed immediately and carried to completion as approved, and that the Federal Government pay for materials, insurance, equipment, and supervision as called for in the approved C.W.A. application for the project; that the Federal Government arrange to pay for materials, insurance, equipment, and supervision on new projects; that the administration and control of the emergency program in this city and county shall be handled by the United States Army engineers; that in all cases local labor shall be employed so long as local unemployment is in a critical condition, and only such outside labor shall be brought in as is necessary to make the quota of men employed a practicable working unit.

This resolution was unanimously adopted by the Council of the City of Covina, Calif., April 28, 1934.

SECURITIES EXCHANGE BILL

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H.R. 9323) to provide for the regulation of securities exchanges and of over-the-counter markets operating in interstate and foreign commerce, and through the mails, to prevent inequitable and unfair practices on such exchanges and markets, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the securities exchange bill, with Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 18. (a) The Commission is authorized, if in its opinion such action is necessary or appropriate for the protection of investors—

(1) After appropriate notice and opportunity for hearing, by order to suspend for a period not exceeding 12 months or to withdraw the registration of a national-securities exchange if the Commission shall find that such exchange shall have violated any provision of this act or of the rules and regulations thereunder or shall have failed to enforce, so far as is within its power, compliance therewith by a member.

(2) After appropriate notice and opportunity for hearing, by order to deny, to suspend the effective date of, to suspend for a period not exceeding 12 months, or to withdraw, the registration of a security if the Commission shall find that the issuer of such security has failed to comply with any provision of this act or the rules and regulations thereunder.

(3) After appropriate notice and opportunity for hearing, by order to suspend for a period not exceeding 12 months or to expel from a national-securities exchange any member or officer thereof whom the Commission finds has violated any provision of this act or the rules and regulations thereunder, or has effected any transaction for any other person whom he has reason to believe is violating in respect of such transaction any provision of this act or the rules and regulations thereunder.

(4) And if in its opinion the public interest so requires, summarily to suspend trading in any registered security on any national-securities exchange for a period not exceeding 10 days, or, with the approval of the President, summarily to suspend all trading on any national-securities exchange for a period not exceeding 90 days.

(b) The Commission is further authorized, if after making appropriate request in writing to a national-securities exchange that such exchange effect on its own behalf specified changes in its rules and practices, and after appropriate notice and opportunity for hearing, the Commission determines that such exchange has not made the changes so requested, and that such changes are necessary or appropriate for the protection of investors or to insure fair dealing in securities traded in upon such exchange or to insure fair administration of such exchange, by rules or regulations to alter or supplement the rules of such exchange (insofar as necessary or appropriate to effect such changes) with respect to such matters as the classification of members and the methods of election of officers and committees to insure a fair representation of the membership; the suspension, expulsion, or disciplining of members; safeguards with respect to the financial responsibility of members and adequate provision against the evasion of financial responsibility through the use of corporate forms or special partnerships; the limitation or prohibition of the registration or trading in any security within a specified period after the issuance or primary distribution thereof; the listing or striking from listing of any security; the making available, at appropriate times and upon reasonable terms and conditions, of the names and addresses of holders of listed securities; the manner, method, and place of soliciting business; fictitious or numbered accounts; the time and method of making settlements, payments, and deliveries, and of closing accounts; the reporting of transactions on the exchange and upon tickers maintained by or with the consent of the exchange, including the method of reporting short sales, stopped sales, sales of securities of issuers in default, bankruptcy or receivership, and sales involving other special circumstances; the fixing of rates of commission, interest, listing, and other charges; minimum units of trading; odd-lot purchases and sales; minimum deposits on margin accounts; and similar matters.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. FISH: Page 42, line 12, after the word "by", strike out the words "rules or regulations" and insert the word "order."

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, I trust I may have the attention of the Members of the Committee, because in my humble opinion I believe this to be about the most important amendment that can be considered in the pending bill outside of the Bulwinkle amendment. If the Members will listen to the facts and consider them on their merits, they should support this amendment. As I stated previously, I am inclined to vote for this bill. As I stated, I expect to vote for this bill, and I add that I want to vote for a stock exchange regulation bill, but if this amendment is turned down, it is going to make it very difficult for me, at least, to support the bill. It would be most inconsistent for me to do so, having made the fight on the floor of the House against the cancelation of the air-mail contracts, because the contractors were given no hearing or right to go to court. I merely ask to strike out the words in line 12, page 42, under section 18 (b), "rules or regulations" and insert the word "order." That would permit recourse to the courts by the exchange, whereas under "rules or regulations" the Federal Trade Commission can do about anything it wants to the exchange and its members, even telling them who they are to elect as officers, without the exchange having any recourse whatever to the courts. In the words of Colonel Lindbergh, that is not only unjust but it is un-American. It is an absolutely un-American and an unjust theory. It cannot possibly do any harm to give the members of the exchange recourse to the courts, which is their constitutional right, but it will be exceedingly harmful if the members of an exchange are deprived of this right by any act of Congress.

Let us consider it from another angle. Let us forget the exchange for a minute. At least half the Members of this House are in some kind of business. Most of them are lawyers and take cases when they can get them during the recess of Congress. Suppose the Federal Government should come to Congress and by this sort of bill regulate your business and say to you whom you should elect as your officers, and what you might do with your business and where you could transact it, taking away your personal and property rights, your constitutional rights, without any recourse to the courts.

My amendment simply gives them the right to appeal to the courts. If you apply the same principle of taking away this right to your own business I do not think you would want to do it to any other business. I say that as one who has believed for many years in a sound and firm regulation of the stock exchange, but not in an unfair and un-American regulation.

It is very dangerous for a politician to predict anything, but I predict that if you leave this unlimited power to make rules and regulations you will destroy the purpose of the bill. I have already commended the chairman and members of the committee for rewriting this bill at least a half dozen times since the original financial atrocity and economic imbecility was presented by the members of the "junior brain trust." I repeat my commendations to the committee. There is no committee in this House who has worked harder or more conscientiously than has this committee. Unfortunately, however, there has grown up in this House a very stupid and silly custom.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH] has expired.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 5 additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. FISH. We have built up a Frankenstein. There are sixty-odd pages to this bill. Nine tenths of the provisions are sound, well thought out, and well considered, yet we have built up a legislative Frankenstein that says to us we must not propose any amendment; we must not try to perfect the bill, because it is a reflection on the committee reporting the bill, and the committee is infallible. That is sheer nonsense. We are here to legislate as Members of the House, to try to improve legislation, to try to perfect the bill, to try to make the bill workable. I submit that if you leave this drastic power in, it will not only work a hardship and hinder business recovery and cause a loss of confidence but it will be a target for everybody who is against the bill to say, "This is exactly like the drastic and unworkable provisions of the securities bill." We all know the purpose of the securities bill was excellent. It could not have been improved upon; but that securities bill has already ruined itself by being too drastic. It has prevented business recovery. Everyone of us is interested in trying to get the free flow of capital back into industry. It has prevented that, the very object that we sought. This bill, if you leave it as it is, will prevent the same thing.

Mr. MAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I yield for a brief question.

Mr. MAY. The only fear I have of this bill is the same thing that seems to be in the mind of the gentleman, that there may be too much regulation of business.

Mr. FISH. Of course.

Mr. MAY. Does the gentleman not think that anyone who is aggrieved by the regulations of the Commission will have the power to go into the courts through an injunction proceeding?

Mr. FISH. No. The only power they will have to get into the courts is after they are indicted. As a business man, do you want to be indicted and have your name spread all over the front page, in order to get into court? That is the only recourse they have under this provision.

As the gentleman has raised the question, I should like to make a little comparison. A few days ago the President of the United States said:

We are not in the midst of a revolution.

But he added:

If you take the "r" out, we are in the midst of an evolution.

A quarter of a century ago I went to Harvard University where we were taught about evolution and the Darwinian and monkey theory. The trouble with this bill in this particular section is that there is too much monkey business in it. There is too much monkeying with legitimate business. When you are honestly trying to regulate it, all right, I am with you, particularly in regulating the stock exchange; but when you go as far as to hold a club over their heads and say who their officers are to be and where and how they are to do business and fixing rates of commission, interest, listing, and other charges, it is going beyond the bounds of reason and moderation. It is hard to give you all the facts in a short time. This section is the grab bag. It is the trick in the bill. It is the joker. The Federal Trade Commission takes back all the power in this section that the committee has taken away from it throughout the bill. I can point out section after section that has been rescinded and placed in this grab-bag section 18 (b). The result is that after the committee has done all of its work these young, smart "brain trusters"—and they are smart—these young radicals, visionaries, and dreamers, who know little or nothing about practical business affairs have taken all the power back under this grab-bag section 18 (b).

Mr. WHITE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I decline to yield at this time. I just want to point out what this does. What I am trying to do is to strike out "rules and regulations", in order to give the American business man a fair deal. I do not care whether he is on the stock exchange, or whether he is a farmer, or what he is; he is entitled to his constitutional right to appeal to the court.

In the first place, it provides for the methods of election of officers and committees. It controls the election of officers on the stock exchange, the curb, or any other exchange, and the suspension, expulsion, or disciplining of members. It also takes away the powers from the Federal Reserve Board and gives those powers to the Federal Trade Commission.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has again expired.

Mr. FISH. I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 2 additional minutes, please.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. FISH. It takes away the powers from the Federal Reserve Board in two instances and turns them back to the Federal Trade Commission after we have written it in the bill. For instance, on page 43, lines 4 to 6, it controls the question of the time and the method of making settlements, payments, deliveries, and closing of accounts. This was turned over by section 6 to the Federal Reserve Board. The same thing applies as to making minimum deposits on margin accounts. This again is a provision affecting the control of credit, which, under the act, is vested in the Federal Reserve Board. There are a number of other instances of that sort. The question we have to decide here, those of us who believe in a regulation bill, is whether we want to perfect the bill or whether we want to pass a new securities act and have it fail and defeat its very purposes, which are to protect investors, the public interest, and to prevent destructive and disastrous overspeculation in the stock market. I hope my amendment, which is in the Senate bill and seeks to provide a court review of any action of the Commission changing the rules of an exchange, will be adopted as a matter of justice, common sense, and fair dealing. The bill as it stands will discourage business, destroy confidence, and be another repetition of the Securities Act and cause loss to hundreds of thousands of small stockholders and prevent the much-needed free flow of capital into industry.

The adoption of this amendment will perfect the bill, make it acceptable and workable, and make it do what it was designed to do. Leaving this language in the bill opens the bill up to the very attacks that everybody in this country has made owing to the blunder of the Postmaster General in canceling the air-mail contracts. There is no recourse to a court of law, and I want to see that provided. I hope you will put partisanship aside. I hope you will consider the amendment on its merits; and I hope you will not pass another securities act simply because you want to stand by the committee.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, I join the distinguished gentleman from New York in the hope that we may put partisanship aside in the consideration of this amendment.

I think the gentleman from New York in his remarks has demonstrated how easy it is to fall into extravagance of statement in the consideration of this legislation. Speaking of the exchanges—and I think I quote him verbatim—he said:

> It will give the Commission authority "even to tell them whom they can elect as officers."

This shows the extreme to which the critics of this legislation go. Had the gentleman read the section carefully, he would have seen that it did no such thing. It authorizes the Commission, if the Commission finds it necessary or appropriate for the protection of investors or to insure fair dealing in securities traded upon such exchanges, or to insure fair administration of the exchanges, by rules and regulations to require the exchanges to alter or amend their rules, not to require them to elect any particular man to office. As far as this particular clause is concerned, it requires them simply to amend their rules as to the classification of members and as to the methods of electing officers and committees. The gentleman may as well say that the Congress of the United States has power to determine who the Members of the House of Representatives shall be, because the Constitution of the United States authorizes Congress to determine the times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives. There would be just as much logic in the argument that Congress could perpetuate itself or its personnel because of this provision of the Constitution as there is in the argument that the Commission can force upon these exchanges any officer that the Commission may choose.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a statement?

Mr. MAPES. Certainly.

Mr. FISH. I know the gentleman wants to be fair. I shall read the language of two or three lines of the bill.

Mr. MAPES. I read them.

Mr. FISH. No; the gentleman did not finish them at all. I read:

> With respect to such matters as the classification of members and the methods of election of officers and committees to insure a fair representation of the membership; the suspension, expulsion, or disciplining of members.

That is very clear language, and anybody can interpret it.

Mr. MAPES. I think that is true, Mr. Chairman, that it is clear and that anybody can interpret it. I think the interpretation placed upon it by the gentleman from New York is absurd.

Mr. Chairman, I further call the attention of my Republican colleagues, in particular the gentleman from New York, and others who want to support legislation to regulate stock exchanges, that this particular section relates exclusively to stock exchanges. There is nothing in this section that authorizes the Commission anywhere to control in any way any corporations except stock exchanges; and if we want to regulate stock exchanges, we should leave this provision in the bill. This provision, Mr. Chairman, merely gives the Commission authority to change the rules and regulations of the exchanges, or to require the exchanges to change their own rules in order to guarantee fair dealing on the exchanges. It is a question of policy, Mr. Chairman; it is simply a question as to whether we are going to leave this question of policy to the Commission or whether we are going to delegate it to the courts.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 2 additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

Mr. MAPES. This is the meat of the bill as far as regulation of stock exchanges is concerned, and I repeat that this particular section relates exclusively to the stock exchanges. The question is whether we want to give the Commission some authority over the rules and regulations of the exchanges, whether we want to delegate this power to the Commission or leave it to the courts. A careful reading of this section of the bill shows that the Commission's authority is very limited; it is very closely restricted to certain specific things. I shall not take the time to enumerate these powers, but read the bill and you will find that the Commission is given no power to which anyone could reasonably object. The Commission must have this power if it is adequately to regulate the stock exchanges.

If we are to allow the stock exchanges the right of appeal to the courts from every rule or regulation made by the Commission, we might as well eliminate this section entirely, because it would make the process of enforcing the regulations of the Commission endless.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAPES. I yield.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The gentleman from Michigan states that the Commission is confined to certain specific subjects in its power to make regulations.

Mr. MAPES. Yes.

Mr. WADSWORTH. If the gentleman will notice the language appearing in line 14 of page 43, the gentleman will observe that the Commission can approach any similar matters. This opens the door wide.

Mr. MAPES. I think there is some justification for the statement of the gentleman from New York; but, even so, that clause limits the Commission to matters "similar" to those that have been specified in the section.

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Chairman, I think you will all agree with me that the gentleman from Michigan has just made one of the clearest and best statements for passing this bill as it is that can be made.

I want you to remember one thing that the gentleman from New York said, and I challenge his statement. He stated that one half of the Members of this House are in business. Can you imagine what an insidious, what a damnable position that would be to take before the American people, that one half of the Members of this House of 435 Members are in private or legal business for themselves, hence their views, their voices, and their votes should be colored and determined by their own private business rather than by the business of 120,000,000 people of this great country of ours?

Mr. FISH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TRUAX. No; the gentleman refused to yield to me.

Mr. FISH. I made no such statement as the gentleman attributes to me, and he has no right to put such words in my mouth.

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Chairman, I refuse to yield. I am quoting the gentleman's own utterances.

Mr. Chairman, we may have some "brain trusters" in this administration. The gentleman likes to impress on this House that he has a fine education. I am glad that he has, but the "brain trusters" of this administration are "brain trusting" for all the people instead of a few racketeers and robbers down on Wall Street, United States of America. That is the difference between Democratic "brain trusters" and Republican "brain trusters."

Mr. LEE of Missouri. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TRUAX. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. LEE of Missouri. The gentleman from New York always says that he went to such and such college. Would we know that he went to any college or school unless he said so in his speeches?

Mr. TRUAX. The gentleman from New York will have to answer that question himself.

The gentleman speaks about a "grab bag." It means that the thing that is worrying a great many people, and particularly those from the sidewalks of New York, is, that the "grab bag" is about to be taken away from them, the "grab bag" in which they plundered this country of billions of dollars, the "grab bag" in which the brokers of Wall Street made $2,000,000,000, while the investing public, whom they now have the gall to call "suckers" and "fools", lost $65,000,000,000. Why, this game that they play is nothing more than a legalized poker game.

The fellow who runs a poker table has a little kitty. He has a slot in the top of the table, and every time a hand is played the winner drops in a chip or two chips. This is the way the fellows in New York play the game. What they want is violent fluctuations up and down so that regardless of who loses they win.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TRUAX. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. O'CONNOR. I agree substantially with what the gentleman says, but I am compelled to state to him that New York City is not the only place where they have these stock exchanges.

Mr. TRUAX. Oh, no. They have them in Chicago. They have there the Chicago Grain Exchange. They work the same racket. They have fellows there who "bull" the market and who "bear" the market. They sell billions of bushels of wheat, corn, and oats which they never own or never expect to own. There is hardly one of those fellows in Chicago who would recognize a good Ohio cornfield if he met it in the middle of the road. They want to be regulated, too; but they want to do the regulating. They are like the gentleman from New York, who is in favor of regulation as long as he can prescribe the regulations.

The Wall Street brokers say that they favor law and order. Of course they do, so long as they can write the law and issue the orders.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. BLOOM. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have 5 additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Chairman, we have some other smart men in this administration. One of them is named Ferdinand Pecora. He is one of these "brain trusters." Last summer he had the king of kings, J. P. Morgan, on the witness stand, and Mr. Morgan was rather uncomfortable. He was so poor that he could not pay an income tax, yet it took three floors of the Carlton Hotel to house himself, his secretaries, income-tax dodgers, French chefs, maids, and so on. This gentleman admitted on the witness stand that he had not paid any income tax for the past 2 years. I presume he is in favor of regulation, too, so long as he can control the regulations.

The bare facts are, Mr. Chairman, that this is merely a repetition of the age-old struggle between the idle holders of idle capital and the struggling masses who create all the wealth and pay all the taxes. For the first time in my recollection the idle holders of idle capital, so ably represented by some gentlemen on this floor, are going to get the damnedest licking of their lifetime.

Mr. STUDLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TRUAX. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. STUDLEY. Is it not true that the gentleman from Ohio has boasted on the floor of this House that he is in business as a hog farmer?

Mr. TRUAX. No, not now; not since 1921, when a Republican President was inaugurated. I have been out of the hog business ever since that time. If I had my way about the matter, I would say that every Member of the Congress of the United States should devote all his time to the job to which he was elected by the people or resign from this great body.

Mr. KENNEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TRUAX. I yield to the gentleman from New Jersey.

Mr. KENNEY. Are we not doing that right now?

Mr. TRUAX. I would not say so.

Mr. KENNEY. Some of us are.

Mr. TRUAX. I agree with the gentleman's statement to a certain extent; but when a gentleman rises on this floor and says that one half of the Members are in private business or legal business, then I say that that is a bad condition for the Congress of the United States to be in. This may be the reason why we do not get action on such measures of the people as the Frazier bill, the McLeod bill, and some other bills that the people back home are praying and begging that this Congress enact into law.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Will the gentleman permit a brief interruption?

Mr. TRUAX. I yield.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I drew an entirely different inference from the statement of the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH]. I drew the inference that at least one half of the Members of this House were in some kind of business and that the other one half were not in any kind of business, and therefore were not qualified to pass on this legislation. [Laughter.]

Mr. TRUAX. The gentleman may be right. Possibly he meant one half of the Members were engaged in racketeering business, but again I refute and deny such a statement.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I think, perhaps, the irony of the statement has escaped the gentleman.

Mr. TRUAX. I think a majority of the men and women on the floor of this House—the great majority by and large—are honestly and devotedly giving the best there is in them to give the people of this great country a square deal, something they have not had in decades. I believe that the bill you are debating today is one of the bills that will go down in history as a new declaration of independence, a declaration of independence from the strangling clutch of those long, bony talons of Morgan, Kuhn & Loeb, and the rest of the Wall Street racketeers, who have literally robbed this country of billions and billions of dollars. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

Mr. Chairman, I do not intend to try to discuss this bill in detail, but the general intent and purpose of the whole bill, as I get it from reading the bill and the report and the discussion that have been had of the bill on the floor.

I think my good friend, the genial chairman of this committee, was a little severe yesterday when he chastised some of us because we offered and supported some amendments to this bill. I may say to my good friend that in doing this we thought we were just as honest as he was in opposing the amendments.

I may also say that there are some Members of this House who always vote on the floor just exactly as they talk in the cloakrooms and the corridors, and I am one of those who follow this custom. I am not interested to know by whom or where this bill was written, but I am interested in what is in it and how it affects the small business man if this country. I do not want to put any more burdens on him than he is carrying at present.

I have approached the consideration of this bill with an absolutely open mind. As far as any regulation of the stock exchange is concerned, under this bill or any other reasonable bill, I am for it; and if this bill had been confined to that end of the problem or to what is carried in the first part of this bill, I think it would be passed in this House with a 100-percent vote; but, as I understand the bill, it seems to me to go much further than this. It goes so far in regulating and in regimenting individual and private business, small business in the various towns and communities of this country, that I am not willing to support it. Even if these additional regulations were advisable, this is not time to do it. Give the country a rest for a few days. And while I have no disposition to find fault with the committee, in my judgment, at this time you would have done much more to aid recovery if you had proposed some amendments to the present securities act so it would be more workable, rather than put more hurdles to discourage the business which is trying to get capital to make a pay roll and to buy capital goods.

The real crux of this whole bill, as I see it, is whether in the long run you are in favor of continually building up in Washington Federal bureaucratic control, or believe the Federal Government knows more about your own business than you do. I have said publicly and privately a great many times that this is not my idea of the proper function of the Federal Government, and I cannot understand how anyone who thinks as I do along this line can support the latter part of this bill which is really the major part of the whole proposition.

We have spent billions of dollars in trying to change the sentiment of the people and to increase their hope and courage, to help them get on their feet and go forward; but to offset this, Congress is almost continually, day after day, providing new regulations or restrictions and regimentation of business which I honestly believe is taking the hope and the courage which you are trying to create away from the small business man in every part of this country.

He has been so harassed and interfered with he is about ready to throw up his hands, and he is in no condition or frame of mind to have another Federal regulation put on him.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNELL. Certainly.

Mr. MAPES. Does the gentleman take the position that evils or unfair practices in business should not be corrected?

Mr. SNELL. The gentleman has no right to say that I take that position because I never have taken that position in private or in public life, and no man can point to a single act of mine that would lead him to make that insinuation. [Applause.] The gentleman has no right to insinuate such a thing, because I have not made a statement on this floor now or at any time which would give him the right to make such a statement. I say I am opposed to extremes and unnecessary regulation of every small activity of every small business man in this country, and I stand on that statement, and the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MAPES] can agree with me or not as he sees fit.

Mr. MAPES. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. SNELL. Yes.

Mr. MAPES. The only thing this bill attempts to do is to provide fair and honest market places on the stock exchanges.

Mr. SNELL. As far as that is concerned, I am perfectly willing to go along with you but, as I understand the bill, and as it has been explained here, it goes much further and regulates every detail of the business of the small business man in every little community in this country, and that is the part of this legislation I am opposing.

Mr. MAPES. It seems to me the gentleman's argument would apply against all legislation that tries to correct evils and——

Mr. SNELL. I am not going to yield to the gentleman for a speech, because he has had a lot of time, and I do not think the gentleman has any basis for that deduction. I merely want to say that I am for reasonable and fair regulation. You can go as far as you want against any dishonest or unlawful business, but the average business man is honest and intends to do about what is right, and it is in his interest I am speaking.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 2 additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection?

Mr. SNELL. I think we are making a mistake in placing a new, harassing regulation on business practically every day. The small business man in this country is getting discouraged. He does not have time to recover from the regulation that you put on him yesterday before we put another one on him today. This is the part of the bill I am opposed to.

I shall go just as far as any man on the floor of this House in regulating anything in business that is not right or honest so far as the American people are concerned. I have always followed this in my private business, and I am willing to submit to any reasonable regulation, but there is a limit to the regulations you can provide and have the people do business, and I think this bill goes too far. This is the reason I shall vote against the measure. Let us try for a little while to leave honest business and industry alone; and if we do, I believe they will do their part in aiding recovery and prosperity.

Mr. LEA of California. Mr. Chairman, the remarks of the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL] are directed to a general phase of this bill. They have some application to the section to which the amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH] is offered.

The bill provides that an exchange shall file an application in which it agrees to abide by the regulations of the Commission. These regulations include the right of the Commission to insist on alterations of the rules and regulations of the stock exchange.

The proposal here is whether there shall be an appeal from the action of the Commission requiring a change in the rules of an exchange.

The section provides that an interested exchange be given a right to a hearing, and after the hearing the Commission by rules and regulations determines whether or not the change in rules shall be made. The practical question is whether or not the exchange shall be given an appeal to a court of law from the ruling of the Commission.

It is important that we shall not give exchanges the right to appeal and go into court from the action of the Commission in making rules and regulations. It would subject the Commission to endless harassment.

There are two types of power delegated to the Commission, and that is true of every regulatory act. The first is a quasi-legislative power, and the other is a quasi-judicial power.

When we give the Commission the right, by rules and regulations to require that an exchange shall have a certain rule governing its functions, that is a quasi-legislative power of Congress. The Commission acts for Congress in establishing such rule or regulation. No one living ever heard of a claim that an interested party should have a right to go into court to restrain the action of Congress in passing laws to regulate the affairs of our country.

There would be a quasi-judicial power, perhaps, if under a rule the Commission should attempt to determine whether or not an alleged guilty man should be penalized or subjected to a fine. That the exercise of quasi-judicial power over the exchange would give it the right to go to court. The exchange would not have the right to claim the attention of the court until it claims to be injured by the action of the Commission. If we want regulation, we must give the Commission power to make its action effective.

We have the same situation in relation to the Interstate Commerce Commission. As members of the Interstate Commerce Committee we have had this policy constantly before us. We have a regulatory system controlling the railroads. I would thoroughly deplore the prospect of Government ownership. As I see it, the problem is between successful regulation or Government ownership. We give the Interstate Commerce Commission full power, because regulation without power to be effective would be a failure. This Commission is given broad powers. I will not deny that. If the Commission does not correctly use those powers, if it is not constructive in its purpose, if it does not act in harmony with the spirit of this bill, its regulation would be a failure. The success of the measure is dependent on the Commission, its ability, common sense, fidelity to duty, courage, yet moderation, in administering its powers. If the spirit and purpose of the bill shall be accepted by the Commission to which its regulations is intrusted, then this measure will be a constructive act and an aid to business.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, if no other member of the committee desires to talk, I wish to close debate.

Mr. PETTENGILL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. RAYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. PETTENGILL. To ask our distinguished and able chairman, who has worked so faithfully in the support of this bill, his construction of this language. Line 11, page 43, calls for the fixing of rates of commission and interest that brokers may charge their customers, and so forth. Of course, it would never happen; but in pure theory is it not true that the Commission could fix rates of commission and interest rates so low that no broker could stay in business, and thus destroy his business—and if that were done, is it the gentleman's construction that the exchange and members of the exchange would be absolutely without appeal to the courts? If so, I think a very serious question is raised.

Mr. RAYBURN. They would be without appeal unless the Commission exceeded its jurisdiction and its authority under the act.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes.

Mr. COX. In order that I may propound a question to the gentleman from California?

Mr. RAYBURN. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. COX. The gentleman from California [Mr. LEA] was discussing a very interesting question touching the matter of the delegation of power. Of course, the gentleman concedes that there is a limit to the power of Congress to make delegations of power to administrative agencies?

Mr. LEA of California. That is undoubtedly true.

Mr. COX. In every instance where that delegation of power takes the complexion of a power to legislate Congress must lay down standards for the guidance of the administrative agency. Congress cannot delegate to any agency the power to legislate.

Mr. LEA of California. No; it cannot.

Mr. COX. What troubles me is this. I fail to find in the bill in every instance where there is a broad delegation of power a standard prescribed by the Congress for the guidance of the Commission, which brings the delegation within the decisions of the courts construing acts of Congress delegating power. In other words, there is nothing prescribed for the guidance of the agency. You do not lay down a rule which they must follow, but you simply in broad language delegate to them blanket power to adopt regulations having the force of law.

Mr. LEA of California. There is broad power in the bill, but there are several standards, and in attempting to determine what those standards are the courts have a right to resort to all sections of the bill.

Mr. COX. I concede that.

Mr. LEA of California. The standards of the Commission must be those which are consistent with the purposes of the bill. The establishment of a commission carries ordinary incidental powers to its functioning. This act constantly makes the interest of the investor one of the standards to justify action by the Commission.

Mr. COX. What one body might think to the interest of the investor another body might not.

Mr. LEA of California. A common standard accepted by the courts in the interpretation of the Interstate Commerce Act has been action found to be in the public interest and welfare. Language tantamount to that appears throughout this bill. The committee has been conscious of this situation, and has realized the necessity of setting up standards for the exercise of its powers. We have attempted to establish standards throughout the bill. We believe we have conformed to the requirements of the courts as involved in the interpretation of the interstate commerce and other acts establishing regulatory bodies.

Mr. COX. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last three words. May I call the attention of the Committee to the real significance of this section? As has been stated in the discussion that has taken place so far, under this section the Commission may order an exchange to completely revamp its rules. It can do so by the issuance of regulations, and those regulations have to an extent the force of law upon the exchange. A violation of them, of course, subjects the exchange to the penalties of the act.

It is all very well to say that the matters related upon page 42 and page 43 are merely matters of routine interest in the purchase and sale of securities upon an exchange, but if Members will read some of that language they will see that under it the Commission itself might issue a regulation which would mean the life or death of the exchange. Attention has already been called to one phase of it by one of my colleagues on the committee.

Mr. PETTENGILL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes.

Mr. PETTENGILL. I would much appreciate to have the gentleman's interpretation of the question that I addressed the chairman.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I am not entirely sure that I am competent to interpret the meaning or implication of all the things contained in this section, but certainly they are exceedingly serious. For example, the Commission may make these rules and regulations with respect to—

The fixing of rates of commission.

I assume that that means the rate of commission charged by the broker. Then, it may make rules and regulations fixing the rate of interest, I presume, asked by the brokers for loans. Also, the listing of securities—

And other charges.

What are "other charges"? I do not know myself. I can go through this language and easily visualize that under this section it is within the power of the Commission to tie up an exchange by a regulation in such fashion that the business of purchasing and selling securities in the United States would be hog tied, not only to the injury of the exchange and its members but to the injury of all the business in the country.

Yet under this section there is no recourse to the court. The final regulation of the Commission cannot be appealed from, and the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH] is merely for the purpose of allowing an exchange, in case of an extreme ruling which threatens to injure its legitimate business and the business of buying and selling securities all over the country, the right of appeal.

I call the attention of the Members to the fact that in various sections of this bill the words "by order" are used, and in order to be consistent the words "by order" should be used in this section. On page 40, line 23, at the bottom of the page, I find this:

After appropriate notice and opportunity for hearing, by order to suspend for a period not exceeding 12 months—

And so forth. There are several other instances of the same thing, in which the Commission may, "by order", suspend or put into effect its regulations. The use of the phrase "by order" automatically gives a person or an exchange thus to be regulated the right to appeal.

Have we come to this point in our consideration of legislation of this drastic kind, where we are going to forbid a group of American citizens from appealing to the courts? [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] has expired.

Mr. DONDERO. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last four words.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, I want to get through with this sometime. We have spent almost an hour on this section. I move that all debate on this amendment close in 12 minutes.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. DONDERO. Mr. Chairman, yesterday a statement was made on the floor of the House that a great many Members of this body had been flooded with propaganda in relation to this bill and that most of it was inspired or came directly or indirectly from either the New York Stock Exchange or Wall Street. Now, coming from one of the greatest industrial centers in this country, representing an automobile district in part, I became interested in knowing whether or not that statement was true. I checked up last night the messages that had come to my desk in relation to this bill. Out of 68 appeals I found that 5 came from stock exchanges or stock brokers; 21 came from small industries, 42 from individuals, and not one for this bill. The appeals that have come from the small industries in my district certainly could not have any connection with either Wall Street or the New York Stock Exchange. Therefore, I challenge that statement as being fallacious and not according to the facts.

I am not opposed to the reasonable regulation of the stock exchange. I believe it should be regulated to the extent where honest methods in business may prevail, and where wild and reckless speculation, such as we had in 1929, may be curtailed and prevented; but I am opposed to any bill which goes so far as to tell a small industry any place in this land how far it can go, how little it can do, and so on. I believe there is a great deal of merit to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH]. When any governmental body can fix rates of commissions, interest, listing, and other charges—when you attempt to tell people, business, and industry how much they may charge and what officers they may appoint, we are going too far and we are doing more harm than good. I believe this bill would greatly retard business, the flow of capital into legitimate industry and prevent a return of better times in this country. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, it may be true that only five letters came directly from stock-exchange members or those connected with it, but I am satisfied that all of those letters came to the Members because of the publicity and the propaganda that have been initiated by the stock exchanges, whereby they are trying to instill fear in the small business man who does not know much about this legislation.

Mr. DONDERO. Would the gentleman say that applied to the Detroit Board of Commerce?

Mr. SABATH. Oh, they are interested, of course, the same as Chicago institutions are interested.

Mr. DONDERO. And would the gentleman say that applied to the 42 individuals I mentioned?

Mr. SABATH. Pardon me. Every one of the gentlemen from New York, as well as the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. DONDERO], appears to be very much interested in the small business man, but are, in fact, interested in the stock exchange also. Mr. Chairman, the small business man is not to be injuriously affected by this legislation. He is going to be protected. This legislation is in his interest. This legislation only attempts to regulate dishonest transactions and manipulations of the New York Stock Exchange and other stock exchanges. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH] and others are fearful of governmental regulation in this instance. Do they not know that these stock exchanges are penetrating every section of our country and that during the years 1927, 1928, and 1929 they established offices in the smallest towns in the United States, so that today millions upon millions are being spent on the telegraph service connecting the New York and Chicago institutions with every village and hamlet, for the purpose of encouraging gambling and speculation on the part of the people of the whole United States? The power given to this Commission by this section has been given to every other commission in every act we have ever reported or enacted in this House. It is the power to adopt proper and protective rules and regulations.

There is no man living, there is no committee in existence, that could write in any bill all the desirable regulations for stock exchanges. Consequently, we must delegate this power to the agency we designate to enforce this legislation, namely, the Federal Trade Commission. Personally, I have the utmost confidence in the gentlemen who are given the duty in this bill to administer this legislation. I know they are honest and experienced. I know they are fair, and, because they are honest and because they are fearless, some gentlemen do not want them to have this jurisdiction and power to regulate the stock exchanges.

I repeat, the statements made by some of the gentlemen from New York and others, that this legislation, as well as the legislation which we passed last year and known as the "Securities Act", has retarded business, is unwarranted and not true. Look over the financial pages of the largest Republican newspapers and you will find that we are progressing under Democratic rule. We are improving. You will find that every industry that has made a report within the last few months has shown a gratifying and progressive improvement in business. Where there were losses there are now profits. Carloadings, that dependable barometer, are improving every week. Conditions in the heavy-goods industries, such as iron and steel, are steadily and measurably improving.

Let us observe today's New York newspaper, which shows that bank clearings are up 23.6 percent; that Treasury deposits rise $225,000,000.

That there is a—

Big gain in quarter made by Chrysler; $3,303,805 profit contrasts with $3,038,082 loss year ago—record since 1929.

And from a Chicago newspaper we learn that—

Output of pig iron up 12 percent during April. Steel production has two-point rise.

That—

April sales of new autos in Cook County 70 percent over last year.

That—

Burlington's profits rise—net income $5,598,023, as compared with $1,502,815 in 1932.

That—

Auto, iron, steel exports at high level in March.

Again—

Hibbard April sales 50 percent above same month of 1933.

Again—

New York phone gain 4,474 stations in April.

Again—

The Lumbermen's Mutual Casualty Co. has announced an increase of 23.4 percent in its scale of dividend distribution on compensation policies, compared with rates paid during the last 12 months.

That—

Wage increases of 10 cents per ton for pick diggers and 8 cents per ton for machine diggers were effected today for Iowa coal miners.

That—

The outlook is better for hosiery industry.

All these quotations point unmistakably to improved and progressive business conditions. If some gentlemen here would cease their opposition to this remedial legislation and not permit themselves to unwittingly be the tools of stock-exchange manipulators who are working for the defeat of this good legislation, I feel that the country would make even greater progress. The improvement is in spite of the efforts of some gentlemen here, and it will continue increasingly.

I want to say with confidence that it is absolutely necessary to give to the experienced and trustworthy Federal Trade Commission the duty and the power to prescribe rules and regulations for the conduct of stock exchanges if the clear intent of the Congress is to be properly carried out. As for myself, I should have liked to see some of the restrictive provisions written into the law directly, had that been practicable.

It has been my fervent hope and aim to enact really beneficial legislation that will be full of teeth and which the stock-exchange experts and the stock-exchange corps of attorneys cannot circumvent or evade, so that honest investors of the future would not be at the mercy of these flagitious slickers and confidence men, and that the stock exchange might become an orderly, legitimate market place for the legitimate sale of securities.

In conclusion, though the temptation for me to take the floor to answer some of these reckless statements of opponents of this proposed legislation is great, yet, in the hope that we may pass the bill before adjourning for the day, I shall refrain from doing so.

We had no governmental regulation or interference of any kind between 1920 and 1929—yes; up to March 1933—and what happened! [Applause.]

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, I may say in reply to the gentleman from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] that I do not know of any power of Congress—and certainly it could not be exercised under this bill—to deny a man the rights guaranteed to him by the fifth amendment to the Constitution.

I regretted very much to hear my friend the gentleman from New York, the minority leader [Mr. SNELL], make the statements he did. I do not try to influence his judgment, so I say only that I regret to hear him say he is going to vote against this bill. I cannot follow the course of reasoning the gentleman pursued in arriving at his conclusion. The gentleman made the statement that from the speeches made on this bill in the House it was demonstrated that it was going to regiment business, and especially small business. I do not think the gentleman from New York heard anybody who understood the bill make such a speech.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. RAYBURN. I yield.

Mr. SNELL. I think the gentleman misinterpreted my remarks, or else I do not make myself clear. What I said was that I was satisfied from information in my possession, together with a study and examination of the bill, that that would be the outcome and that that was the purport of the bill. I still think so; but I may be wrong.

Mr. RAYBURN. I challenged these business men who came to my office. I was interviewed by a man appointed by the business men's committee to contact me. I read to him those sections of this bill which it has been said regimented business, and I told him if he could find one line in the bill that regimented or tried to run anybody's business, that I would be the first one to strike it out. He said he could not find it. We do call for reports; we do give the Commission power to call for the information that is absolutely necessary in order that it may formulate rules and regulations for the control of the national-securities exchanges.

In my opinion we have a good bill, a fine, reasonable, sane bill; but if we adopt the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH], we shall defeat practically everything we have done in the preceding 40 pages.

In my opening statement, and again on yesterday, I said that three features must be contained in this law if there is to be effective control of the stock exchanges: One is a reasonable margin of requirement, the second is a strong antimanipulative section, and the third is to give to the Commission which administers this law the power to make it effective. If you are going to say that the Commission may do this by rules and regulations, that is one thing. If you are going to say that the Commission shall formulate rules and regulations and issue them in the form of orders, that is another thing; and every one of them could be tied up in the courts from 12 to 24 months and thus absolutely negative the very things we have done in the preceding forty-odd pages of this bill.

In my opinion, the question involved in the Fish amendment is whether or not after writing a law you are going to give the administrative body the power to make the law effective and the power to enforce it. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH].

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

LIABILITIES OF CONTROLLING PERSONS

SEC. 19. (a) Every person who, directly or indirectly, alone or pursuant to or in connection with any agreement or understanding with one or more other persons, controls any person liable under any provision of this act or of any rule or regulation thereunder shall also be liable jointly and severally with and to the same extent as such controlled person to any person to whom such controlled person is liable, unless the controlling person acted in good faith and did not directly or indirectly induce the act or acts constituting the violation or cause of action.

(b) It shall be unlawful for any person, directly or indirectly, to do any act or thing which it would be unlawful for such person to do under the provisions of this act or any rule or regulation thereunder, through or by means of any other person.

(c) It shall be unlawful for any director or officer of, or any owner of any of the securities issued by, any issuer of any security registered on a national-securities exchange, without just cause to hinder, delay, or obstruct the making or filing of any document, report, or information, required to be filed under this act or any rule or regulation thereunder.

Mr. McCLINTIC. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. McCLINTIC: On page 44, after line 12, add a new section, as follows:

"REPORTS BY ISSUERS IN DEFAULT

"SEC. 20. Any issuer, any of whose securities are registered on a national-securities exchange, when in default of interest or dividend payments on any such securities, shall file a monthly statement with the Commission, which shall include a list of all owners of such securities and the salary, commissions, bonuses, or other forms of payments made to its officers during the time of such default, and such information shall be available to all stockholders of record of such issuer."

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the amendment.

Mr. McCLINTIC. Mr. Chairman, one of the glaring abuses that now exists is the misuse of power on the part of officials of the various companies that are in default on interest or dividend payments. They often misuse such power by raising their own salaries to unheard-of heights and, in addition, in some instances pay themselves large bonuses, notwithstanding the fact the companies are in default.

It seems to me that if we are going to pass a securities bill we ought to strike at the greatest evil that exists at the present time on the part of those who proceed in an unethical manner. I dare say every Member of this House knows that a wild scramble is now being made, or has been made recently, on the part of many officials of certain companies to obtain proxies, for they realize that when they obtain a sufficient number of proxies they have in their hands the power to vote themselves as high a salary or bonus as they desire. Unless we can provide some means by which the partners in a business, who, in the case of corporations, are the stockholders, can have the right to know who each individual partner is, there will be no way to take control from the officers who are robbing their partners, or stockholders, from the inside.

My only object is to afford this kind of protection so that if any person has paid his hard-earned cash for stock in some company when it was paying dividends, that one may have the right and the means to obtain a list of his partners or stockholders when the ethics of sound business is violated. It is my purpose to charge some agency of the Government with the responsibility of collecting the names of these stockholders and make the list available to those entitled to the same.

May I say that I introduced such a bill and it was sent to the Federal Trade Commission for a report. Such a report was furnished to the distinguished chairman, and in substance it said: "There is much to be said in favor of legislation which will provide this kind of relief, and if the committee desires to favorably report such a bill and the Congress decides to act on it, the Commission will carry out the provisions of the same."

That, in substance, is the report filed on this particular amendment in the form of a special bill.

I want to fix it so that companies like the Cities Service, Montgomery Ward, certain utility companies, and others that pay their officers enormous salaries and bonuses will have to furnish the stockholders or the partners in the company with the information necessary to bring about a revolution of policy if needed so as to take away the control from unethical officials, and thus save such investments, or at least a part of them. I hope the distinguished chairman and the members of the committee will accept this amendment.

Mr. PETTENGILL. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I am speaking on behalf of the chairman of the committee. I think we all have a great deal of sympathy with the objects and purposes sought to be achieved by the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. McCLINTIC]. But it is the view of the chairman of the committee and myself that the objectives and purposes sought to be accomplished by his amendment are already in the bill.

With reference to the large and secret bonuses that have been a scandal in corporate affairs in recent years, we think that the matter is fully covered by sections (e) and (g), and others, on page 30, which include bonuses and profit-sharing arrangements, and so forth.

With respect to a corporation whose securities are in default continuing to sell its securities, we think that is fully covered by line 25, page 42, which gives the Commission the power to delist or requiring the delisting of a corporation which has permitted its bond maturities to go into default.

Mr. McCLINTIC. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PETTENGILL. I yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma.

Mr. McCLINTIC. Will the gentleman state whether or not there is a provision in this act which will make it possible for you or me as a stockholder to find out who our partners are in the case of companies that have defaulted in interest or dividend payments?

Mr. PETTENGILL. That is the general law. Any stockholder has the right to see the books of the corporation. That is the general corporate law.

Mr. McCLINTIC. The stockholders may be located in cities thousands of miles away from the headquarters of the company—New York or some other place. If we had some Government agency that had the power and the permission to give to stockholders this information, does not the gentleman think it would be advisable and go a long way toward curing the present evils?

Mr. PETTENGILL. Would it be any easier for a stockholder to get this information by writing a bureau in Washington than by writing his own company?

Mr. McCLINTIC. Does the gentleman say that a stockholder can always get the information?

Mr. PETTENGILL. Or he may write to the transfer agent of his company.

Mr. McCLINTIC. The gentleman states that a stockholder can now obtain this information by writing to the headquarters of the company?

Mr. PETTENGILL. I know that is his legal right; and if it is denied him, why, of course, he is being denied a legal right.

Mr. McCLINTIC. I am sure that the gentleman would not desire to leave that impression with the Members of the House, because I have never heard of a stockholder who was able to obtain such information as provided by this amendment. I do not want to do anything which would disrupt the machinery of the bill, and I was hoping this would be a helpful amendment. I realize that if the gentleman thinks that the subject is already covered my amendment would not be necessary.

Mr. PETTENGILL. I know that is the purpose of the gentleman, but it is the position of the chairman of the committee that the objectives sought to be accomplished are already fully covered by the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. HOLLISTER. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HOLLISTER: Page 43, line 16, strike out subdivision (a) of section 19.

Mr. HOLLISTER. Mr. Chairman, this is another amendment not made with any attempt to defeat the purposes of the bill, which have been so ably expressed by the chairman of the committee within the last few minutes, but in an attempt to see that the orderly processes of American justice are truly followed.

This particular section which I ask to be stricken out is the section which makes an unlawful act the performance by a controlling person of some act. If there is any Member of this House who would like to stand up and define to me what a controlling person is, I should like to know. We know—and I know that I speak to an audience the majority of which are lawyers—what an agent is; we know that if you perform something through an agent you perform it yourself. The term "agent" has a reasonable and well-known legal meaning, but I should like to have someone tell me in what law, in what decisions, or in what textbooks I can be told what a controlling person is. I say that such a provision in no sense belongs in this law.

It is merely another opportunity to open up a so-called "strike" suit. The gentlemen of the committee and those in favor of this legislation have stated on a number of occasions that they themselves fear the strike suit, and they did not wish to do anything which would make it easy to attack an honest man under this bill merely because he may have wealth, or because he might have some connection with a corporation which has made a report of some kind or another. To put in a provision of this kind and allow a jury to have the decision of what a controlling person is certainly makes it most difficult for any defendant.

Let me repeat that my amendment is merely an attempt to protect agains the strike suit and takes out of the bill nothing which in any way is involved in the so-called "teeth" of the bill. It is a protection for the average man who should be able to be assured that he will not have to defend himself from suit when, as a matter of fact, he is not culpable.

I hope the committee will see fit to adopt the amendment.

Mr. LEA of California. The object of this provision is to catch the man who stands behind the scenes and controls the man who is in a nominal position of authority. The man in control is just as well known as a dummy on a directorate. If a case went into court, of course, it would be necessary to establish the charge of control by the evidence.

Mr. HOLLISTER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEA of California. I yield.

Mr. HOLLISTER. Would not an ordinary agency provision cover that? A man is either an agent or he is not an agent.

Mr. LEA of California. There would be no contractual relation, necessarily. It is just the same position as in the control of a dummy on a directorate. The man who stands behind the scenes and dominates the dummy ought to be responsible because he is the real party in interest.

Mr. HOLLISTER. The gentleman means that no matter how honest the man nominating the director may have been in making the nomination, if the director does something unlawful and unknown to the man nominating him, the latter should be held responsible?

Mr. LEA of California. The man charged with control is only responsible to the extent he did control the action complained of, and his actual control must be established.

Mr. HOLLISTER. What would constitute such control? Can the gentleman define to me any legal way a man can decide whether he has such control? Suppose a prominent stockholder names a director and then goes to Europe and the director does something illegal, would the gentleman say that the person who named the director should be held responsible?

Mr. LEA of California. It is a question of fact to be determined by the issues presented in the case. This is not a new question from a legal standpoint.

Mr. HOLLISTER. It is a very new question from a legal standpoint.

Mr. LEA of California. I believe it is a very well-known question in corporate law.

Mr. HOLLISTER. I wish the gentleman would refer me to any such precedent. There is no such law in any State of the Union and no law of the United States to find out what a controlling person is, and I do not believe that the gentleman or any member of the committee can refer me to any such law. I would be pleased to have it stated if there is one.

Mr. LEA of California. The gentleman does not doubt that one man controlling another in a corporate enterprise is a very common thing?

Mr. HOLLISTER. I know there is the test of agency, and I know of no other test which would make a person responsible criminally. We are going far beyond any precedent in providing for criminal actions in this way. It is part and parcel with a number of things that have been put in this bill which are absolutely contrary to all the principles of American jurisprudence.

Mr. LEA of California. It is simply a question of putting the responsibility on the man who is really responsible.

Mr. HOLLISTER. How does he know what that responsibility is?

Mr. LEA of California. Of course, the responsibility must be established.

Mr. HOLLISTER. But what will be the rule by which a man may guide himself to decide whether or not a jury in what we call a "strike" suit may not find him responsible.

Mr. LEA of California. It is a question of proving the case in court on the basis of the facts to show that one man did control the other in doing a wrongful thing, and until you have done that there is no punishment or penalty.

Mr. HOLLISTER. But you are leaving such a man wide open and subject to all kinds of unnecessary and dangerous attacks.

Mr. LEA of California. It is just the same wide-open position you always face when you go into court.

Mr. HOLLISTER. No; because you are ordinarily given proper grounds of defense, but here you are creating a new kind of unlawful act which is contrary to all accepted principles of jurisprudence.

Mr. LEA of California. I think the gentleman is mistaken in stating it is a new kind of responsibility.

Mr. HOLLISTER. I wish the gentleman would refer me to any such precedent.

Mr. LEA of California. I cannot just at the moment. If he will refer to the definitions of the word "control", as established by the courts as set forth in Words and Phrases, he will find the term is well known and its meaning has been long established.

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HOLLISTER].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. HOLLISTER) there were—ayes 30, noes 56.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

INVESTIGATIONS, INJUNCTIONS, AND PROSECUTIONS OF OFFENSES

SEC. 20. (a) Whenever the Commission, either upon complaint or upon its own initiative, is of opinion that it should make an investigation to determine whether any person has violated or is about to violate any provision of this act or any rule or regulation thereunder, it may conduct such investigation, and, in its discretion, either require or permit such person, or any person making such complaint, to file with it a statement in writing, under oath or otherwise as the Commission shall determine, as to all the facts and circumstances concerning the matter to be investigated. The Commission is authorized to investigate, and in its discretion to publish information concerning, any facts, conditions, practices, or matters which it may deem necessary or proper to aid in the enforcement of the provisions of this act or in the prescribing of rules and regulations thereunder.

(b) For the purposes of any such investigation, or any other proceeding under this act, any member of the Commission or any officer designated by it is empowered to administer oaths and affirmations, subpena witnesses, compel their attendance, take evidence, and require the production of any books, papers, correspondence, memoranda, or other records which the Commission deems relevant or material to the inquiry. Such attendance of witnesses and the production of any such records may be required from any place in the United States or any State at any designated place of hearing.

(c) In case of contumacy by, or refusal to obey a subpena issued to, any person, the Commission may invoke the aid of any court of the United States within the jurisdiction of which such investigation or proceeding is carried on, or where such person resides or carries on business, in requiring the attendance and testimony of witnesses and the production of books, papers, correspondence, memoranda, and other records. And such court may issue an order requiring such person to appear before the Commission or member or officer designated by the Commission, there to produce records, if so ordered, or to give testimony touching the matter under investigation or in question; and any failure to obey such order of the court may be punished by such court as a contempt thereof. All process in any such case may be served in the judicial district whereof such person is an inhabitant or wherever he may be found. Any person who shall, without just cause, fail or refuse to attend and testify or to answer any lawful inquiry or to produce books, papers, correspondence, memoranda, and other records, if in his power so to do, in obedience to the subpena of the Commission, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor and, upon conviction, shall be subject to a fine of not more than $1,000 or to imprisonment for a term of not more than 1 year, or both.

(d) No person shall be excused from attending and testifying or from producing books, papers, correspondence, memoranda, and other records before the Commission, or in obedience to the subpena of the Commission or any member thereof or any officer designated by it, on the ground or for the reason that the testimony or evidence, documentary or otherwise, required of him, may tend to incriminate him or subject him to a penalty or forfeiture; but no natural person shall be prosecuted or subjected to any penalty or forfeiture for or on account of any transaction, matter, or thing concerning which he may testify or produce evidence, documentary or otherwise, in obedience to any such subpena; except that no natural person so testifying shall be exempt from prosecution and punishment for perjury committed in so testifying.

(e) Whenever it shall appear to the Commission that any person is engaged or about to engage in any acts or practices which constitute or will constitute a violation of the provisions of this act, or of any rule or regulation thereunder, it may in its discretion bring an action in the proper district court of the United States, the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, or the United States courts of any Territory or other place subject to the jurisdiction of the United States (to enjoin such acts or practices, and upon a proper showing a permanent or temporary injunction or restraining order shall be granted without bond. The Commission may transmit such evidence as may be available concerning such acts or practices to the Attorney General, who may, in his discretion, institute the necessary criminal proceedings under this act.

(f) Upon application of the Commission the district courts of the United States, the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, and the United States courts of any Territory or other place subject to the jurisdiction of the United States, shall also have jurisdiction to issue writs of mandamus commanding any person to comply with the provisions of this act or any order of the Commission made in pursuance thereof.

Mr. HOLLISTER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

Page 47, line 21, strike out subdivision "(f)."

Mr. HOLLISTER. Mr. Chairman, I offer this amendment striking out the subdivision for the purpose of asking the Chairman to explain what it means. If he can explain to the committee the purpose of the provision, I will not press it. I understand a mandamus proceeding to be an order against a governmental officer who is required to perform some ministerial duty enjoined on him by law. Where there is no discretion, he can be mandamused to perform the act. Can some gentleman tell me what it means in this act? Who is going to be mandamused? Is it a private director, an attorney, or an accountant? An explanation may clear it up. I do not understand it, and I have asked several gentlemen on this side and they do not understand it.

Mr. LEA of California. This provision is taken from the Securities Act.

Mr. HOLLISTER. I thought that is where it came from.

Mr. LEA of California. I have not given any special thought to this particular section. However, it is fairly plain from the language that it applies to any person whose duty it is to perform any function under this act.

Mr. HOLLISTER. Then it is not an ordinary mandamus.

Mr. LEA of California. I think it would be the kind of a mandamus the gentleman mentioned a moment ago.

Mr. HOLLISTER. Is it to be against a director of a corporation or an officer who neglects to carry out some order of the commission?

Mr. LEA of California. If the director failed to carry out a court order. If some officer failed to follow the provisions of the act, and the court made an order, and for the violation of that order he could be mandamused. Mr. Perley, of the Legislative Counsel, says this is the same as a subdivision in the Securities Act.

Mr. HOLLISTER. I remember in discussing the question of shifting the burden of proof yesterday, where I unsuccessfully made the attempt to point out that it is un-American, I was answered by the statement, "This is in the Securities Act." Then the principle of the act was apparently taken from the Securities Act, and there is no other precedent in American jurisprudence that we can follow?

Mr. LEA of California. This provision is also in the Interstate Commerce Act.

Mr. HOLLISTER. Mandamus ordering performance of any act ordered by the Interstate Commerce Commission?

Mr. LEA of California. It is section 19 of the Interstate Commerce Act. For the moment I cannot tell the gentleman when that first became a law, but it was many years ago. That has been in the law for at least 12 years.

Mr. HOLLISTER. Has the gentleman section 19 of the Interstate Commerce Act there?

Mr. LEA of California. Yes. I have not had the time to compare it, but I understand the language is about the same—

That the district courts of the United States shall have jurisdiction upon the application of the Attorney General of the United States, at the request of the Commission, alleging failure to comply with or a violation of any of the provisions of this section by any common carrier, to issue a writ or writs of mandamus commanding such common carrier to comply with the provisions of this section.

Mr. HOLLISTER. That is against a common carrier. That is quite a different matter.

Mr. COX. Oh, the mere purpose of the language is to compel compliance with any legal regulation of an administrative agency, which is the Federal Trade Commission in this act. If anybody whose duty it is to obey the law does not obey the law, the Commission resort to the courts by mandamus.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. What is meant by the language on page 47, line 7, "about to engage in any acts"?

Mr. PETTENGILL. It seems to me that the language is plain. This is to permit application for injunctive relief to prevent a threatened violation of the act.

Mr. EDMONDS. It means that the Commission is given power when anybody is under suspicion in the United States, or whom the Commission wants to bring under suspicion, to arrest him and apply the penalties of this bill, or give him opportunity to prove his innocence.

Mr. PETTENGILL. Oh, it says nothing about arresting him or sending him to jail or even to Moscow. It means that this gives the power to the Commission to apply for an injunction where someone is about to violate the law, and the man against whom it is directed can have the protection of the United States court.

Mr. EDMONDS. It means that they can conjure up in their minds some man who is going to do something that is opposed to the act, and that, therefore, they may arrest him and put him in jail?

Mr. RAYBURN. Has anybody complained about a similar provision in the Interstate Commerce Act in that respect, or in the Securities Act of 1933?

Mr. EDMONDS. Oh, there are things in the Interstate Commerce Act that the gentleman knows can well be changed. This language "about to engage in any act" means anybody against whom they have any suspicion.

Mr. RAYBURN. A similar provision has been on the statute books for 12 years.

Mr. BLACK. The same thing is in the Martin act in New York governing securities.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio to strike out paragraph (f) on page 47.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, the pending bill to control and regulate stock exchanges is one of the boldest and most progressive steps thus far taken under the able and far-sighted leadership of the administration of President Franklin D. Roosevelt.

We have listened with much interest to this extended debate for the past few days on this important legislation. The burden of argument against the pending bill is the old cry that it might hurt business. Opponents of regulation are attacking the measure today on the ground that it will hamstring business. I agree with them that it is designed to hamstring some kinds of business—the business of fleecing the lambs by robbing many innocent people. The regulation herein proposed will not, in my judgment, interfere with any legitimate business.

Mr. BROWN of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, is it not the purpose of this act to aid legitimate business, instead of to hamstring it?

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. I think the gentleman is correct in that statement. It will aid rather than hamstring any legitimate business, and if it is not legitimate business, it ought to be hamstrung.

I am sure that many of those now opposed to this bill have been misinformed. I feel that the passage of this bill will prove of benefit to legitimate business.

I was especially interested in the argument of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BRITTEN], who has devoted much of his energy and his fine talents to efforts to belittle the new deal. He attempted to draw a red herring across the trail by attacking this as planned legislation and legislation written by the "brain trust." I am surprised that the gentleman should pick so many quarrels with brains and that he would attempt to frighten us by that word. I did not realize that brains were so much in disrepute in the great city of Chicago, from whence he hails. But I want to say here and now that I would rather support legislation written by the "brain trust" than legislation written by the Money Trust, which was about the only kind of legislation we were offered in the days of rugged individualism.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. COOPER] also went to great lengths to try to convince us that these protests against the bill were not inspired by Wall Street but from investors. Maybe the investors in the gentleman's district were more fortunate than the average and lost nothing in the great crash of 1929. Maybe they want to let things rock along as they have been, with the likelihood that another era of prosperity will be wrecked by another wild orgy of speculation. But it would be my guess that the people the gentleman has been hearing from are more interested in selling so-called "securities" than they are in purchasing them.

I am satisfied that when this bill becomes a law and its value has been tested by actual operation that all of the so-called "investors" now protesting to the gentleman from Ohio will thank this Congress for making it possible for them to buy real securities rather than insecurities when they invest their money.

Mr. MOTT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. Yes.

Mr. MOTT. Will the gentleman tell us what there is in this bill that is calculated to prevent the stock-exchange crash that we had in 1929? Specifically, what provision of the bill will do that?

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. I shall be glad to answer the gentleman. If the gentleman knows anything about the bill, he knows that the margins have been raised to 45 percent. That provision alone will do much to prevent wholesale gambling and thus prevent the major cause of the unprecedented crash of 1929.

Mr. MOTT. That is the gentleman's answer. That is the provision of the bill that will stop a stock-exchange crash?

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. That is one of the several provisions that certainly will curb gambling on stocks and prevent bogus and fictitious sales that have been carried on by the New York Stock Exchange since the memory of man runneth not to the contrary.

There is no question but that bill is an important part of the new deal. In every speech I made in my district last winter I predicted that legislation of this nature would be introduced and passed at this session. I told the people that I had discussed this legislation with the President several times and knew that protection of our investors is very close to his heart.

It has surprised me that some of those protesting against this bill have prior to this time insisted they were supporting the President's recovery program whole-heartedly and have demanded that Members of Congress go down the line for the President's program without the crossing of a "t" or the dotting of an "i."

My State has a blue sky law to protect investors. But that does not prevent our people from sending their money off to Wall Street to invest to the detriment of our State. The Coolidge boom brought on a wild scramble for profits, and millions of people decided they could get rich by speculation. The result was that millions of dollars of wealth was withdrawn from my State and dumped into the whirlpool of speculation. That wealth was needed at home to develop a great new State. It was needed to finance new industries, build new homes, and to promote home business. But a big percent of that sent off to Wall Street never returned. It left our banks, our building-and-loan associations, and our savings accounts, and will never come back. It deprived our farmers of capital needed to finance their farms.

This bill does not go far enough to suit me. At the proper time I shall introduce as an amendment my bill, introduced earlier this session, to tax the sales of the stock exchange 1 per cent. Adoption of this amendment will bring in some $300,000,000 or $400,000,000 a year to provide funds very necessary to finance the new deal and provide relief for our needy people.

I am no recent convert to legislation along these lines. The record shows that during the Seventy-second Congress I supported the so-called "LaGuardia amendment" to tax the sales of securities on these exchanges one quarter of 1 percent, which passed this House. At that time I made a fight to get a tax of 1 percent on these sales. My proposal and the proposal of Mayor LaGuardia were denounced bitterly on this floor, and the assertion was made time and again that should either tax be levied that short selling would be destroyed and the exchanges would be virtually put out of business.

In speaking on the proposed tax, I said on this floor on March 31, 1932:

> Let me say frankly I only wish that the tax proposed to be imposed on the stock gamblers could be placed so high that it would not only curb short selling but stop gambling on products of the farm. If that could be accomplished, Mr. Chairman, it would be the most far-reaching and beneficial legislation ever passed by this or any other Congress. Speculation on the New York Stock Exchange by white-collared parasites who toil not nor spin is largely responsible for our financial troubles. These Wall Street gamblers do not confine themselves to intangible stocks, mythical securities, and bogus memoranda, but they gamble to the tune of billions of dollars on commodities they never see but which are produced by the sweat of the brows of millions of honest, hard-working farmers of America. Instead of prices of farm commodities being based on the law of supply and demand, they are too often controlled by and held at the mercy of Wall Street stock gamblers.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. Yes, with pleasure, to my good friend from Illinois.

Mr. SABATH. Is it not a fact that this bill will preclude the selling orgy and the extending and enlarging of issues by millions and millions, and the sending out of false propaganda day in and day out telling the people that these are good securities, when the people who offer them for sale know they are making misstatements? That will be prevented by this bill if it is passed?

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. The gentleman has stated the situation correctly. That is the primary purpose of the measure.

Some Members of this House possibly were amazed by the revelation of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CROSSER] that in the last 5 years there has been spent nearly $1,000,000 in so-called "publicity", which consisted chiefly of distributing a book called "The Work of the Stock Exchange" to public libraries, school libraries, teachers, public officials, and editors throughout the country.

A short time back a friend of mine, a former resident of Oklahoma but now connected with the New York Stock Exchange, was in my office and told me that the exchange recently had sent 1,500 lobbyists to Washington to fight this bill. He also told me of the flood of letters sent out by the exchange to stockholders of various corporations over the country in an effort to build up a public sentiment against this bill.

The lobby against this bill has been the most powerful and best organized of any in the four terms I have served in this House. I have received hundreds of letters and telegrams from every county in my district, urging me to oppose this bill. If I have received one letter asking me to vote for the bill, I am unable to recall it. The plain people of the country have no lobby here except their Members of Congress, and they are looking to them to pass this bill and carry out one of the major provisions of the new deal to protect innocent investors and the entire financial structure of the country.

Wild speculation which leads to a collapse, such as occurred in 1929, affects every man, woman, and child in the country, regardless of whether they own stocks or not.

I was amazed by the figures presented by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. PETTENGILL] showing that from September 1929 to June 1932 the value of bonds listed on the New York Exchange depreciated $9,387,000,000. In the same period brokers' loans were liquidated to the extent of $8,308,000,000, and the value of listed stocks shrank $74,034,000,000, a total liquidation of $91,729,000,000 in 34 months. As the able gentleman from Indiana pointed out, these figures are for the New York Exchange alone, which is only one of the twenty-odd exchanges in the country. That $92,000,000,000 is three times the national debt. It is exclusive of the depreciation in value of real estate, merchants' stocks, and farm commodities. It does not reflect the loss to investors in banks and building and loan associations.

As the gentleman pointed out, this terrible calamity occurred because we had no legislation to prevent speculation and avert a wild orgy that brings on these booms and the consequent bursting of the bubble.

So, in spite of the high-powered lobbyists that have swarmed in and around the National Capitol for the past several months, and in spite of the insidious propaganda and misinformation that has been scattered throughout the country against the pending bill to control and regulate stock exchanges, now that the final show-down has come, the wild statements and unfounded assertions of opponents of this measure have vapored away, when confronted with facts and figures, like dew before the bright glow of the morning sun. Let us pass this bill today by an overwhelming vote and say to the money changers of Wall Street and all those white-collared parasites who have wallowed in the wealth they did not earn that this Congress will not further countenance such outrages against the public interest. Let us do nothing to disturb or interfere with legitimate business, but let us do everything humanly possible to prevent another such catastrophe as that brought on by the spree of speculation this country went through only a few years ago. [Applause.]

The Clerk read as follows:

COURT REVIEW OF ORDERS

SEC. 24. (a) Any person aggrieved by an order issued by the Commission may obtain a review of such order either in the circuit court of appeals of the United States, within any circuit wherein such person resides or carries on business, or in the Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia, by filing in such court, within 60 days after the entry of such order, a written petition praying that the order of the Commission be modified or set aside in whole or in part. A copy of such petition shall be forthwith served upon the Commission, and thereupon the Commission shall certify and file in the court a transcript of the record upon which the order complained of was entered. Upon the filing of such transcript such court shall have exclusive jurisdiction to affirm, modify, and enforce or set aside such order, in whole or in part. No objection to the order of the Commission shall be considered by the court unless such objection shall have been urged before the Commission. The finding of the Commission as to the facts, if supported by substantial evidence, shall be conclusive. If either party shall apply to the court for leave to adduce additional evidence, and shall show to the satisfaction of the court that such additional evidence is material and that there were reasonable grounds for failure to adduce such evidence in the hearing before the Commission, the court may order such additional evidence to be taken before the Commission and to be adduced upon the hearing in such manner and upon such terms and conditions as to the court may seem proper. The Commission may modify its findings as to the facts, by reason of the additional evidence so taken, and it shall file such modified or new findings, which, if supported by substantial evidence, shall be conclusive, and its recommendation, if any, for the modification or setting aside of the original order. The judgment and decree of the court, affirming, modifying, and enforcing or setting aside, in whole or in part, any such order of the Commission, shall be final, subject to review by the Supreme Court of the United States upon certiorari or certification as provided in sections 239 and 240 of the Judicial Code, as amended (U.S.C., title 28, secs. 346 and 347).

(b) The commencement of proceedings under subsection (a) shall not, unless specifically ordered by the court, operate as a stay of the Commission's order.

Mr. HOLLISTER. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HOLLISTER: Page 51, line 11, strike out section (b) and insert in lieu thereof the following: "(b) Any order of the Commission, a review of which is desired by an aggrieved person, may be stayed in the same manner as is now provided by law for the staying of decrees of Federal district courts."

Mr. HOLLISTER. Mr. Chairman, I am rising again in perhaps a vain hope that we will try to adhere to well-known principles of justice in protecting the individual, protecting the corporation, stock exchange, or whatever it may be, against unjust acts of a commission. I will probably be met here by the statement that the securities bill contains something of this nature. It may be even something which is taken out of the Interstate Commerce Act. The Interstate Commerce Act is quite a different kind of an act than this. This involves many individuals, as well as corporations and exchanges. It brings in the individual in many different ways, not under specific provisions of the act but under rules and regulations laid down by the Commission. Are we going to deny to an individual or to anyone who is involved in this act the right to have an ordinary stay of the action of the Commission until the upper court can act?

Mr. COLE. If the gentleman will read the language of the act, it is entirely in the discretion of the court. If the court thinks that an aggrieved party should have a stay, he will grant it.

Mr. HOLLISTER. Why should it be left in the discretion of the court? Why should it not be a matter of right to stay an order of the Commission if a bond is given?

Mr. COLE. Now, if a bond is given to stay the execution of an order which may be passed for violation of this act, what good would that do? All the damage would be done.

Mr. HOLLISTER. Yes; and the damage might be done to an individual or it might be done to a corporation if the Commission's order were not stayed. The whole purpose of this act is not to give the defendant any reasonable chance. It is to put all the power in the hands of the Commission to do as it pleases, even if it wrecked an individual's business. What good would it do an exchange if it were closed for the year and it could not stay the action of the Commission in that instance?

Mr. COLE. I think the average judge of a district court would stay the execution of an order if it were shown to him that the order would operate to his disadvantage or damage.

Mr. HOLLISTER. I cannot agree with the gentleman. I do not think it should be left to the discretion of anybody. I think there should be a right to stay an order of the Commission until the higher court can pass upon the order. It does not seem fair or just that any kind of an order could be made by the Commission, and the discretion of a single judge might decide whether or not that order could be stayed.

Mr. KELLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOLLISTER. I yield.

Mr. KELLER. What is the gentleman's idea of the right of injunction under any condition?

Mr. HOLLISTER. This has nothing to do with the right of injunction. This is not connected in any way with the right of injunction. The gentleman misunderstands the section.

Mr. LEE of Missouri. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOLLISTER. I yield.

Mr. LEE of Missouri. If we had had this law a couple of years ago our people would not have been loaded up with $50,000,000,000 worth of useless securities.

Mr. HOLLISTER. If the gentleman will ask me a question about what I am discussing I shall be glad to answer him.

Mr. LEE of Missouri. I will ask the gentleman a question. I will ask if he is for or against this bill?

Mr. HOLLISTER. I am against it, of course, in its present form.

Mr. LEE of Missouri. And will the gentleman give his reasons? Its present form is intended to keep the crooks from doing business in this country and the present form does not in any way affect any legitimate business.

Mr. HOLLISTER. Will the gentleman make a stump speech in his own time? My time is very limited, but I shall be glad to answer any question the gentleman may want to have answered.

Mr. MONAGHAN of Montana. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOLLISTER. I yield.

Mr. MONAGHAN of Montana. Would the gentleman vote for this bill if this amendment were adopted?

Mr. HOLLISTER. If this particular amendment were adopted, and if seven or eight other amendments governing procedure were adopted, I would vote for the bill.

Mr. MONAGHAN of Montana. The gentleman wants the whole bill changed.

Mr. HOLLISTER. I want it changed so that it protects the innocent man from all kinds of suits that will be filed against him just as sure as you and I are living, if this bill is passed.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOLLISTER. I yield.

Mr. COX. The implication might arise from what the gentleman states that the rules and regulations adopted by the Commission might be made to apply to any type of business. The gentleman is not contending that it is contemplated or intended to empower the Commission to regulate any business which has not some direct connection with an exchange. That is true, is it not?

Mr. HOLLISTER. That is true.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. BANKHEAD). The time of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HOLLISTER] has expired.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, this is the same amendment that the gentleman has been offering to all these sections. It will result in the same thing—that is, to absolutely stay the order of the Commission until the time has gone and the damage has been done.

I ask for a vote on the gentleman's amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HOLLISTER].

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

JURISDICTION OF OFFENSES AND SUITS

SEC. 26. The district courts of the United States, the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, and the United States courts of any Territory or other place subject to the jurisdiction of the United States shall have jurisdiction of violations of this act or the rules and regulations thereunder, and of all suits in equity and actions at law brought to enforce any liability or duty created by this act or the rules and regulations thereunder. Any criminal proceeding may be brought in the district wherein any act or transaction constituting the violation occurred. Any suit or action to enforce any liability or duty created by this act or rules and regulations thereunder, or to enjoin any violation of such act or rules and regulations may be brought in any such district or in the district wherein the defendant is found or is an inhabitant or transacts business, and process in such cases may be served in any other district of which the defendant is an inhabitant or wherever the defendant may be found. Judgments and decrees so rendered shall be subject to review as provided in sections 128 and 240 of the Judicial Code, as amended (U.S.C., title 28, secs. 225 and 347). No costs shall be assessed for or against the Commission in any proceeding under this act brought by or against it in the Supreme Court or such other courts.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment offered by Mr. RAYBURN: On page 52, in line 9, after the word "have", insert the word "exclusive."

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, I have only this to say—that we thought the bill as drawn meant exclusive, but in order that it may be entirely clear we offer this amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

FOREIGN SECURITIES EXCHANGES

SEC. 29. (a) It shall be unlawful for any broker or dealer, directly or indirectly, to make use of the mails or of any means or instrumentality of interstate commerce for the purpose of effecting on an exchange not within or subject to the jurisdiction of the United States, any transaction in any security the issuer of which is a resident of, or is organized under the laws of, or has its principal place of business in, a place within or subject to the jurisdiction of the United States, in contravention of such rules and regulations as the Commission may prescribe as necessary or appropriate to prevent the evasion of this act.

(b) The provisions of this act or of any rule or regulation thereunder shall not apply to any person insofar as he transacts a business in securities without the jurisdiction of the United States, unless he transacts such business in contravention of such rules and regulations as the Commission may prescribe as necessary or appropriate to prevent the evasion of this act.

Mr. BULWINKLE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word in order to ask a question of the chairman of the committee as to the next section dealing with registration fees. Does not the bill now pending in the Senate provide that the entire cost of this regulation shall be paid by the exchanges of the country?

Mr. RAYBURN. I do not know.

Mr. BULWINKLE. The fee is fixed at an amount equal to one five-hundredth of 1 percent of the aggregate dollar amount of the sales of securities transacted on the exchanges. Has the chairman any idea what the cost of administering this act will be?

Mr. RAYBURN. No; I have not. We appropriated $250,000 for the administration of the Securities Act, but its administration will require still more money.

Mr. BULWINKLE. From the information I can gather it is my opinion that the cost of administering the provisions of this bill will run to practically $1,500,000 or more.

Mr. RAYBURN. The best information I have on this is that the fees will range in the aggregate from $600,000 to not more than $900,000 a year.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I could not hear all of the answer of the gentleman from Texas to the inquiry of the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. RAYBURN. I said that it was stated in our committee I think several times that, in all probability, this would provide from $600,000 to $750,000, or not more than $900,000.

Mr. WADSWORTH. In revenue?

Mr. RAYBURN. I am speaking of the fees required in section 30.

Mr. BULWINKLE. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman from New York will yield and if the chairman of the committee will pardon me, the fees to be collected from the New York Stock Exchange will be between $500,000 and $700,000; and about $300,000 will be collected from the other exchanges of the country. But the cost in addition to the fees collected will be something between $500,000 and $1,000,000 at the minimum.

Mr. RAYBURN. The additional cost of what?

Mr. BULWINKLE. The additional cost of administering the act.

Mr. RAYBURN. The gentleman means it will cost the institutions that, not the Government.

Mr. BULWINKLE. It will cost the Government that much in addition to the fees collected. That is the reason I brought the matter to the chairman's attention.

The Clerk read as follows:

REGISTRATION FEES

SEC. 30. Every national securities exchange shall pay to the Commission on or before March 15 of each calendar year a registration fee for the privilege of doing business as a national securities exchange during the preceding calendar year or any part thereof. Such fee shall be in an amount equal to one five-hundredth of 1 percent of the aggregate dollar amount of the sales of securities transacted on such national securities exchange during the preceding calendar year.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. WADSWORTH: Page 56, beginning at line 5, strike out section 30.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Chairman, this particular section may not seem of very great importance to the members of the committee. Scarce any discussion took place in the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce with regard to the question of the expense of enforcing this law.

The policy contained in section 30 of the bill runs contrary to the policy contained in the so-called "Meat Inspection Act." Those Members of the House who have been here for many years may remember that a great controversy arose in the House at the time of the passage of that act. The first bill on that subject was passed by the Senate and came to the House. That bill contained a provision to the effect that the cost of the inspection of meat products during the course of their preparation in the so-called "packing houses" should be met by those concerns that were being inspected. In other words, the inspected person should pay the salary of the inspector. The House of Representatives at that time rejected that theory and clung to the theory that the person to be inspected should have nothing to do with the payment of those who did the inspecting, that the Government should pay the cost of inspection and the costs of the administration of the law. The same principle should apply with regard to this bill. The chairman stated that one exchange alone would be taxed $500,000 a year.

Mr. RAYBURN. The chairman did not make that statement; it was made by the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. BULWINKLE. I said, upon the basis of the business done by the New York Stock Exchange it would run from $500,000 to possibly $600,000 or $650,000.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes; but at any rate it will be a very substantial sum.

Mr. MONAGHAN of Montana. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield.

Mr. MONAGHAN of Montana. Does the gentleman know that in the last 5 years the New York Stock Exchange has spent approximately $1,000,000 to flood the channels of public education with propaganda designed to make people believe in some of the nefarious practices that have existed on the exchange?

Mr. WADSWORTH. In other words, the gentleman wants to punish somebody by this section.

Mr. MONAGHAN of Montana. Not punish them.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Then what is the object of it?

Mr. MONAGHAN of Montana. I ask the gentleman if it is not fair to assess a license fee to clean up the stock exchanges so the people can buy with a reasonable degree of confidence the stocks listed on the exchanges?

Mr. WADSWORTH. The gentleman from New York believes that if the bill is drawn upon the proposition that it will clean the channels, as the gentleman uses the phrase, why tax the exchanges at all?

Mr. MONAGHAN of Montana. It may not entirely clean up the exchanges, but since the nefarious practices of the stock exchange necessitated the bill it is only fair to assess the cost of regulation upon those who occasioned the need.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I cannot yield further. The imposition of a fee against the San Francisco Stock Exchange, the Chicago Stock Exchange, or the Boston Stock Exchange is not going to make the members of those exchanges more honest. The purpose of this section is punitive. It is to get even with somebody. It is to tax somebody. That is what it is for.

Why should it cost any concern in the United States $500,000 to do business legally? It is being assumed that after the passage of this act, with many of the provisions of which I am utterly in disagreement, exchanges are going to be honestly conducted. That is to be assumed, according to the claims set forth by the authors of the bill. If so, why tax them?

Mr. WHITE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield to the gentleman from Idaho.

Mr. WHITE. If we have to pay for the regulation of a business why should not the business stand the cost of regulation?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I think it is a bad principle. Government says to business, "We are going to regulate you in the interest of the whole people", and then government in the same breath should not say to business, "You will have to pay the cost of our inspection." That is one thing we should keep clear of. When government exercises the power to regulate, to inspect, and to control, if you please, it does it in the interest of 123,000,000 people, and the 123,000,000 people should pay the bill.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. OLIVER of New York. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment.

Mr. Chairman, may I say to the gentleman from New York that the Federal Reserve Board is supported by fees contributed by member banks, and I do not see any different principle in this bill than is involved there. A number of Government institutions are supported by fees paid by the companies which they regulate rather than by a general tax. There has not been any evil. The whole history of government shows that the Government is just as honest and business is just as honest. The only question is, How are you going to support the particular commissions or the particular officials who are governing these different characters of business? Are you going to do it by placing a tax upon the public, or are you going to allow the Government to be supported by the business that is regulated? If there was any definite connection between the officials themselves and the money derived from these fees, I would say it would be a corrupting influence; but since the fees go into the Public Treasury and not into the officials' pockets, there is no corrupting influence.

Mr. BRITTEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OLIVER of New York. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. BRITTEN. Is there anything in the pure food law which provides for a tax in connection with the enforcement of those laws?

Mr. OLIVER of New York. We did have such provision at one time many years ago, but I think it was repealed.

Mr. BRITTEN. I do not think there is any such provision at this time. The gentleman referred to the Federal Reserve Board. That is not a governmental institution.

Mr. OLIVER of New York. The Federal Reserve Board is a governmental institution. It is the governing board over the Federal Reserve banks. The Federal Reserve banks are private corporations whose stock is owned by member banks.

Mr. SNYDER and Mr. SHALLENBERGER rose.

Mr. OLIVER of New York. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. SNYDER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] said if this law was passed it was assumed that it would do away with all dishonesty in the management of stock-exchange affairs. This bill does not assume that at all.

Mr. OLIVER of New York. It is hoped it will.

Mr. WADSWORTH. That is the object of the authors of the bill.

Mr. OLIVER of New York. It is hoped it will do this. We hope it will do away with dishonesty and give the people the benefit of honest business. As I read the bill, it is filled up with the hope that it will do away with crooked securities, crooked brokers, and crooked manipulators of the mechanism of the exchange, whether they be within or without the exchange. Nobody is going to disagree with that hope, and if I did not feel that very strongly in my heart I would not vote for the bill.

Mr. SNYDER. As long as human nature remains the same we will always have a little crooked business going on, no matter what the law is.

Mr. OLIVER of New York. If we reenacted the Ten Commandments and doubled the penalties of hell we would still have that situation.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OLIVER of New York. I yield to the gentleman from Nebraska.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I call attention to the fact that the national banking and State banking business is something that needs to be regulated by law similar to the attempt which is now being made to regulate the stock exchange. Every bank is required to pay a fee for the inspection. When the examiner comes in he is paid a fee in proportion to the amount and volume of business of the bank, so that that fee is comparable exactly with the one asked for here.

Mr. OLIVER of New York. Yes. There is not any intention to get square with anyone on earth. The stock exchange got square with itself. It has ruined itself, and until we get it back to the point where the public has confidence in it, I say the stock exchange is going to lose, lose, and lose. I am for a bill such as this because, first, it makes securities liquid and keeps them liquid. It does not cause a wave of liquidation to occur. [Applause.]

The fears and apprehensions of the opponents of the bill are not well founded. It will build up the business of the exchange. There is nothing radical in it. It will protect the honest buyer, the honest broker, and the honest trader.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I think this is a very good place to make a few observations, possibly in justice to the members of the New York Stock Exchange. I do not represent the district in which the exchange is located. In fact, I do not live within 50 miles of it.

The New York papers, through their editorials, I think, are justified in the statements they made in criticizing the publicity releases of Mr. Pecora just before this bill was brought up for consideration in the House, pointing out that the members of the exchange and the stock houses had made excessive profits, leading the public to understand they had made the enormous profits of $833,000,000 in the past 6 years and put this profit into their pockets. I think it is only fair to point out that that only amounted to three tenths of 1 percent of all the transactions on the exchange, which is not a very excessive amount for conducting a legitimate work of buying and selling stocks.

Furthermore, over $110,000,000 of that money went back to the Federal Government in income taxes. Someone took the trouble to check up on the main stock houses that were listed by Mr. Pecora, and it was stated that between 20 and 25 percent of the money which was supposed to have gone into the pockets of stockbrokers and brokerage houses, amounting to about $110,000,000, went back into the Federal Treasury as income taxes.

Now, the New York Tribune has this to say about it:

> The figure of $833,000,000 is less impressive when you know the facts. It amounts, to be precise, to less than three tenths of 1 percent on the amount of business transacted. Indeed, it is only a little more than twice as large as the stamp taxes on security sales that went to the Federal and State Governments during the period, which item Mr. Pecora conveniently forgets to mention. Transfer taxes on this huge turnover amounted, the records show, to more than $360,000,000.

That is another item of $360,000,000 that Mr. Pecora forgot to tell the public about.

In view of the fact we are talking about registering the stock exchange and getting additional fees, I think it is only fair at this juncture to show there are two sides to this picture. The stockbrokers and stock houses have been making certain profits, of course, but about half of that $833,000,000, referred to by Mr. Pecora, went back to the Federal Government in some form of taxes.

Mr. DONDERO. Where did the $360,000,000 go?

Mr. FISH. It went to the Federal and State Governments as transfer taxes.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to vote on this amendment at an early date, but I may say that people who deal with the Patent Office pay a fee, and, as has been said here, national banks pay a fee. They do not have to pay the fee, because they can be a private bank. No one has to pay this fee unless the exchange is a registered exchange. It can remain unregistered and not pay this fee.

Today we are collecting from the railroads of the country $1.50 a mile to pay the cost of the Coordinator-Administrator. I did not hear any complaint about this at all.

If I recall correctly, and if I am mistaken I hope I may be corrected, I heard no representatives of the exchange complain about this fee which they would have to pay.

We did have in the first draft of the bill, I may say to my friend from New York, the very thing he said this House struck out some years ago, and that was that the representatives of the Commission were allowed to make these inspections and the brokerage houses paid for the inspection. We struck that out, which I quite readily agreed to myself, but it does appear to me that if these people are going to be registered and are going to have the standing of being registered exchanges, they ought to be willing to pay a little for it.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Will the gentleman be kind enough to allow me to make a very brief statement?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes; I yield.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I am not at all concerned, I may say to the gentleman from Texas, about the amount of this fee. It is the principle involved that appeals to me as being important. I do not believe we should reach the point in this country when we would impose licenses of substantial figures for the conduct of honest business, I do not care what business is involved. We have got to assume when we pass these statutes that the overwhelming majority of people engaged in the business to be regulated are honest people, and this proposed law, as I understand it, intends to see that there shall be a greater degree of honesty in the business. Now, why charge a fee for it? I cannot understand why you should impose any such financial conditions.

Mr. SABATH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAYBURN. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. SABATH. The gentleman from New York has read, I presume, some of the evidence that was presented before the Senate committee investigating this matter. Does he still maintain that it was honest business that they conducted over there, or does the gentleman believe that the dishonesty that was practiced forced this legislation?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I am not talking about what forced the legislation; I am talking about the average man engaged in business, including the security business. Of course, I realize, just as the gentleman from Illinois realizes, there have been some very grave abuses. They have been confined, however, to a very small minority of the people engaged in the business. They stand out like sore thumbs, conspicuously, and deserve punishment and prevention in the future, but I do not believe it is sound Government policy, generally speaking, for the Federal Government to begin to charge licenses for the conduct of business.

Mr. RAYBURN. I agree with the gentleman up to a certain point. I want just as little licensing by the Federal Government as possible, but the exchange that is licensed here is given a privileged status, and it appears to me it would be perfectly all right in this instance.

I yield to the gentleman from California, who has had some experience along this line.

Mr. BUCK. It is a fact, Mr. Chairman, that every commission merchant and every dealer in perishable commodities throughout the United States engaged in interstate commerce is licensed and required by the Department of Agriculture to pay a fee. Every grower of fruits or every shipper of fruits who uses the inspection service of the Department of Agriculture is required to pay the fee himself, and I have never heard any intimation that any corruption resulted therefrom.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Are they not nominal fees? They do not reach $500,000.

Mr. BUCK. They are sufficient to maintain the expense of the service of the Department in connection therewith.

Mr. RAYBURN. I should think, in all probability, they are larger than these fees in comparison with the business they do.

Mr. MOTT. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment. I cannot agree with the gentleman from New York that it is not a proper policy to charge the persons regulated for the expense of such regulation.

This policy is one which has been universally in operation for the last 30 or 35 years in the regulation of securities under the several State securities acts.

There has never been any objection to it on the part of those engaged in the sale of securities under any of the thirty-odd State blue-sky laws, and I think objection to it in Federal legislation having as its purpose the regulation of securities sold in interstate traffic or on stock exchanges would not be a valid objection.

However, I do have some other objections to this bill which I am going to take occasion to state at this time. I was corporation commissioner in charge of securities regulation in my own State before coming to Congress. I am supposed myself to know something about securities regulations, and I have been under the impression that I knew, or at least had heard of most of the recognized authorities on securities legislation in the country.

So I was very much surprised yesterday when the gentleman from Ohio, in his discussion of the bill, named the people who conceived this legislation and those who had to do with the drawing of this bill.

Mr. Chairman, so far as I have been able to learn no one who has had anything to do with the making of this bill has ever had any practical experience in the regulation of securities, either interstate or intrastate. The list of authors, sponsors, and collaborators read by the gentleman from Ohio does not contain a single name that any securities commissioner in the United States ever heard of.

This, Mr. Chairman, is the principal reason why this bill is so impractical, so visionary, and, I am afraid, unworkable. It contains the germ of a good idea, and that is all. The good idea in it is that unwarranted speculation—that is to say, gambling—on the stock exchanges ought to be curbed and regulated. The bill makes a feeble effort to do this, and to that extent it is good. But in trying to get at this evil and to stop it the authors of the bill, whoever they are, have ignored every fundamental rule and principle that there is in securities regulation and have wandered off into fields of theory altogether new and untried.

If I were attempting to properly characterize this bill, I would say that it is amateurish. That describes it as well as anything I can think of. It is a gesture, the same as the Security Act which was passed in the last special session of the Congress was a gesture.

When I discussed that bill last session I referred to it as a gesture, and that is what it has turned out to be. Like this bill, the Federal Securities Act was written by men who knew nothing about the regulation of securities. It, too, contained the germ of a good idea, and nothing else.

The Federal Trade Commission has not attempted to enforce the Federal Securities Act, and I doubt if it can while the act remains unchanged. The people who issue and deal in legitimate securities are afraid to put their securities on the market under the weird provisions of that act, and it will have to be drastically amended before it will work.

And unless this pending bill is drastically amended either here or in the Senate, its administration will do no more practical good than has the National Securities Act to date.

Now, why do I say this bill is impractical? Because while its ostensible purpose is to curb and regulate illegitimate speculation on stock exchanges it subordinates this chief purpose to an attempt to control this evil indirectly by regulating the issuance of the security itself. It goes even further than that, because it undertakes to control and regulate the actions of the corporations issuing the securities. This is perhaps a proper thing to do in a Federal securities act. It has no legitimate place in a bill the purpose of which is to regulate and supervise operations on stock exchanges.

In my opinion, what is necessary in a bill of this kind is, first, to provide for the issuance of licenses for those who deal in securities in any capacity on stock exchanges, and to make the issuance of such licenses a condition precedent to the right to operate a stock exchange or to engage in stock-exchange operations as brokers, dealers, or other agents.

The bill should provide, as most security acts provide, that those people, aside from purchasers who sell and trade in securities or exchanges, shall put up a bond to insure compliance with the act, and that the penalty for the violation of the law itself or for the violation of any regulation issued by the Department or the Commission should be cancelation of the license. Violation of the law, not of a regulation, should also be punished by fine and imprisonment.

If you do that, that is all the regulation necessary, because few dealers will violate regulations issued in pursuance of law if they know that the penalty is the cancelation of their licenses or the suspension of them. [Applause.] For an operator to violate the regulations would be to put himself out of business, and any dealer or broker, either on a stock exchange or elsewhere, would rather abide by proper regulations and stay in business than to violate them and go out of business. This is the fundamental theory upon which practically all State blue-sky laws are based. And let me say this: That the State blue-sky laws of this country constitute the entire corpus juris of securities regulation in the United States and that the authors of this bill would have done well to consult some of them before trying to draft a Federal securities law.

As for willful violation of the law itself, if the law is definite, plain, and sensible, and the operator knows it is going to be enforced, experience has shown that it is seldom violated. When it is violated the prosecution and punishment should be swift and sure, as it always is under a proper State securities act properly administered.

I shall vote for this bill, poor as is the opinion I have of it, because, as I have said, although it is amateurish, visionary, and largely impractical, it does contain a germ of good. Regulation is needed, and we must have it even if the bill in which we get it is not the kind of a bill it ought to be. It is the administration bill, and that being the case it is the only bill on this subject we are going to have a chance to vote on this session.

I hope the bill will be amended here. If not here, I trust the Senate will take hold of the fundamental motive behind the bill and build a good, workable piece of legislation around it, so that in a year from now the country will not say of it, as it is now saying of the Federal Securities Act, "What has happened to it and what good is it doing?" This can be done if you will eliminate the camouflage and propaganda and the visionary provisions in the bill and confine it to its legitimate purpose of regulating speculation on the stock exchange. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York to strike out section 30.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma: Page 56, line 15, add a new section, to be known as "subsection C", to read as follows:

"That there shall be levied, collected, and paid on all transfers of stock or securities on any stock exchange a tax of 1 percent of the sale price of the securities sold. Such tax shall be paid by the person, partnership, association, or corporation to whom the transfer is made."

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on that.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order.

Mr. RAYBURN. It is clearly subject to a point of order.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I have offered the pending amendment for the purpose of calling attention to the fact that this House more than 2 years ago, after discussing this subject in the revenue bill, passed this amendment with practically the same language, in what is known as the "LaGuardia amendment", except it proposed one quarter of 1 percent instead of 1 percent. It was shown at that time that the stock exchanges had done a yearly business of more than $34,000,000,000—more money than there is in circulation in all the world. The stock exchanges, through their gambling activities and juggling of bogus stocks, were able to do a business of $34,000,000,000 in 1 year, much of which was robbed of innocent people, and it is just such business on fake stocks and bogus memoranda that has caused the demand for this legislation. This body discussed the LaGuardia amendment for several hours, as I recall, during the consideration of the revenue bill, and gentlemen will remember Mayor LaGuardia, then a great progressive member of this House, made a heroic fight for the amendment to tax stock sales. The House adopted the amendment by an overwhelming majority. It went to the other body, where it was eliminated after one Andrew W. Mellon, then Secretary of the Treasury, had appeared before the Senate committee in opposition to taxing stock exchanges. I should like very much to see a vote taken at this time to find whether the Members of this House have changed front on the matter of taxing sales on the stock exchange.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. Yes.

Mr. BRITTEN. Do I understand from the gentleman's remarks about his amendment that if it were carried into the bill it would provide a tax of $340,000,000 a year on the stock exchange?

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. That is the understanding, assuming that the business amounts to $34,000,000,000 a year.

Mr. BRITTEN. That would be a considerable tax.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. Oh, yes; a considerable tax, but why should not those white-collared parasites who deal in commodities they never see pay considerable tax? Frankly, I would go further if I had my way. I would make the tax so much that it would tax the damnable stock exchanges out of business. Some of those opposing the amendment passed by this House but defeated in the Senate argued that the proposed tax would force the stock exchanges into Canada. It might be a good thing for legitimate business if they went there or elsewhere, but they are not going to Canada. Will anyone seriously argue that a tax of 1 percent would drive those gamblers out of business?

Mr. SABATH. Would not the gentleman like to see them go a lot further than Canada, where it is somewhat warmer?

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. Well, I cannot say I would seriously object. Now, may I call your attention to the fact section 30 provides for only one five-hundredths of 1 percent to be charged as a fee, and although that will bring in several thousand dollars, it is not enough to pay for the administration of this bill. Certainly those who have been dealing in fake stocks, and we hope they will not be able to continue to do so, ought to pay the cost of the bill that regulates them. It occurs to me that when we have a depleted Federal Treasury it would be a good way to get some needed revenue into the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. CANNON of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. Yes.

Mr. CANNON of Wisconsin. Regardless of any regulation that may be made here by this House or of how high the tax may be, you cannot keep those fellows honest down there.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. Oh, no. We cannot legislate honesty into Wall Street, but we can legislate to make that gang toe the mark. I am sure that this House desires to make every possible effort to curb gambling in farm commodities by those who never saw those commodities.

Mr. HASTINGS. I suggest to my colleague that he change his amendment to strike out one five-hundredths and make it 1 percent now.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. I agree that is where it belongs, but it was suggested to me that it be taken care of in a separate section.

Mr. HASTINGS. We are still on that section.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. I should be glad to do that.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Oklahoma has expired.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman reserve his point of order?

Mr. RAYBURN. I reserve the point of order.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment. The gentleman from Oklahoma spoke about fake stocks, and the statement was somewhat aggravated by the suggestion of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. CANNON]. Mr. Chairman, I do not care how many bills you pass, you will not be able to put oil into those empty oil wells in Oklahoma, nor are you going to help out those poor eastern fellows who bought the stock from the breezy westerners who came east with oil stocks. And you are not, with this bill or any other bill, going to put money into the pockets of the poor gullible eastern widows and orphans who bought stock from those snappy westerners on the last round-up in their mining ventures.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLACK. Is the gentleman with me or against me?

Mr. TABER. I am with you.

Mr. BLACK. I yield.

Mr. TABER. Is there anything in this bill that will stop that?

Mr. BLACK. Not a thing. There is nothing in this bill that will keep the farmers from carrying out their own racket that they have been carrying on ever since I have been here, always on the verge of bankruptcy, the country always collapsing, blackmailing the country, shaking down Congress, shaking down the Treasury year after year by prospectuses in the mouths of Congressmen from the West as to the terrible condition of the western country. This proposition of fake stock is not one-sided at all. Stocks on the stock exchange had some decent supervision and decent regulation. The damage that was done in many cases to the investor was done by the fellow who had no connection with the stock exchange, and therefore the stock exchange could not control him. At least they could not control these gentlemen who had billion-dollar propositions, paying dividends out of stock sales. You could not stop that with your speeches from Oklahoma and Texas.

Mr. BRITTEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLACK. I think the gentleman is with me. I yield to him.

Mr. BRITTEN. Does the gentleman think I am with him?

Mr. BLACK. I yield, anyway.

Mr. BRITTEN. Is there anything in this bill that will stop another murderous boom in Florida?

Mr. BLACK. Oh, leave Florida out of it. I am just talking about the West.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. JOHNSON] that is not germane.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado). The amendment offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. JOHNSON] provides for raising revenue. The bill under discussion provides for the regulation of stock exchanges. Therefore the Chair is of the opinion that the amendment is not germane and sustains the point of order.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I offer a further amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma: On page 56, line 10, strike out all after the word "be" up to an including the word "of" where it occurs the first time in line 11.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against the amendment, that it comes too late. The gentleman offered an amendment a moment ago adding a new paragraph to the section.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. But we are still on this section, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman says he will not address the House on the amendment. Therefore I withdraw the point of order and let the committee vote on the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. JOHNSON].

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 31. (a) The Federal Trade Commission shall hereafter be composed of seven Commissioners, who shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and not more than four of whom shall be members of the same political party. The two additional Commissioners, who shall be appointed pursuant to this act, shall continue in office through September 25, 1936, and September 25, 1937, respectively, the term of each to be designated by the President, but their successors shall be appointed for terms of 7 years, except that any person chosen to fill a vacancy shall be appointed only for the unexpired term of the Commissioner whom he shall succeed. No Commissioner shall engage in any other business, vocation, or employment, or hereafter effect any transaction in any security (other than an exempted security) unless 10 days prior to such transaction he shall notify in writing the other members of the Commission of his intention to effect such transaction, and shall also notify in writing the Commission that such transaction has been effected, which later notice shall immediately be made a matter of public record by the Commission. The Commission is authorized by order to divide the members of the Commission into as many divisions (each to consist of not less than three members) as it may deem necessary, which may be changed from time to time. Any Commissioner may be assigned to and may serve on such division or divisions as the Commission may direct, and the senior in service of the Commissioners constituting any of said divisions shall act as chairman thereof. In case of vacancy in any division, or of absence or inability to serve thereon of any Commissioner thereto assigned, the chairman of the Commission, or any Commissioner designated by him for that purpose, may temporarily serve on said division until the Commission shall otherwise order. The Commission may by order direct that any of its work, business, functions, or powers arising under this act, or under any other provision of law, or with respect to any matter which has been or may be referred to the Commission, be assigned or referred to any of said divisions for action thereon, and may by order at any time amend, modify, supplement, or rescind any such direction. All such orders shall take effect forthwith and remain in effect until otherwise ordered by the Commission. In conformity with and subject to the order or orders of the Commission in the premises, each division so constituted shall have power and authority by a majority thereof to hear and determine, order, certify, report, or otherwise act as to any of said work, business, functions, or powers so assigned or referred to it for action, and with respect thereto the division shall have all the jurisdiction and powers now or then conferred by law upon the Commission, and be subject to the same duties and obligations. Any order, decision, report made or other action taken by any of said divisions with respect to any matters so assigned or referred to it shall have the same force and effect, and may be made, evidenced, and enforced in the same manner as if made or taken by the Commission. The secretary and seal of the Commission shall be the secretary and seal of each division thereof. After a decision, order, requirement, rule, or regulation has been made by any said division, any party aggrieved thereby may, according to such regulations as may be prescribed by the full Commission, make application for rehearing of the same, or any matter determined therein. If sufficient reason be made to appear for granting such a rehearing, the full Commission in its discretion shall do so, and the rehearing shall be held before the full Commission. In case a rehearing is granted, the proceedings thereupon shall conform as nearly as may be to the proceedings in the original hearing, except as the full Commission may otherwise direct; and if, in its judgment, after such rehearing and the consideration of all facts, including those arising since the former hearing, it shall appear that the original decision, order, or requirement is in any respect unjust or unwarranted, the full Commission may reverse, change, or modify the same accordingly. Any decision, order, or requirement made after such rehearing, reversing, changing, or modifying the original determination shall be subject to the same provisions as an original order. No such application for a rehearing shall excuse any person from complying with or obeying any decision, order, or requirement of a division, or operate in any manner to stay or postpone the enforcement of any decision, order, requirement, rule, or regulation without the special order of the full Commission.

(b) For the purposes of this act and of the Securities Act of 1933, the Federal Trade Commission may select, employ, and fix the compensation of such attorneys, examiners, and other special experts as shall be necessary for the transaction of the business of the Commission with respect to such acts without regard to the provisions of other laws applicable to the employment and compensation of officers or employees of the United States.

Mr. BULWINKLE. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. BULWINKLE moves to strike out subsection (a) of section 31, and the title thereto, beginning at line 15 on page 56, down to and including line 24 on page 59, and insert in lieu thereof, on lines 15 and 16, a new title, and the new section, section 31 (a), to read as follows:

"MEMBERS AND EMPLOYEES OF THE FEDERAL STOCK EXCHANGE COMMISSION

"SEC. 31. (a) There is hereby established a Federal Stock Exchange Commission, to be composed of three members, to be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. Not more than two of such appointed Commissioners shall be members of the same political party. No appointed Commissioner shall actively engage in any other business, vocation, or employment than that of serving as Commissioner. Each appointed Commissioner shall receive a salary at the rate of $10,000 a year and shall hold office for a term of 6 years, except that (1) any Commissioner appointed to fill a vacancy occurring prior to the expiration of the term for which his predecessor was appointed shall be appointed for the remainder of such term, and (2) the terms of office of the Commissioners first taking office after the date of the enactment of this act shall expire, as designated by the President at the time of nomination, one at the end of 2 years, one at the end of 4 years, and one at the end of 6 years, after the date of enactment of this act."

Mr. BULWINKLE. Mr. Chairman, when the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce had under consideration the first so-called "stock exchange bill", which was drafted by Mr. Corcoran, Mr. Cochran, and others, at the close of the hearing, it was apparent that that bill was entirely too vicious, unworkable, and the consequences that would have ensued from its enactment could not be foreseen.

At this time, with the aid of the legislative drafting service, and this alone, I drafted a stock-exchange regulation bill, which I believed then, and believe now, that, if enacted into law, would have been far better for everyone concerned in this country. In that bill I provided for a separate and distinct commission to be appointed by the President to consist of three members. The amendment that I am offering and that the Clerk has just read follows the lines of that which I proposed originally in the bill.

During 1933 the President had appointed a committee to investigate the question of stock-exchange regulations. On that committee Mr. John Dickinson, Assistant Secretary of Commerce, was chairman. Mr. A. A. Berle, Jr., Mr. Arthur H. Dean, Mr. J. M. Landis, and Mr. Henry J. Richardson were the other members.

In the early part of this year this committee made a report to Hon. Daniel C. Roper, Secretary of Commerce, and the President sent a copy of the report of the committee, with Mr. Roper's letter, to Senator FLETCHER, Chairman of the Banking and Currency Committee of the Senate. The Roper committee had given careful consideration to the organization of the Federal stock-exchange authority, and while they presented the facts as to each—a new stock-exchange authority or a Federal Trade Commission—yet I believe that from reading the report that a separate commission was favored. And I am quoting various sections from this report, in order to give to the House the views of this committee:

Your committee believes that at this time a mechanism ought to be set up which is—

(a) Capable of collecting necessary information;

(b) Capable of being used to carry out a policy as it shall be developed; and

(c) Flexible enough to permit meeting of situations, both specific and general, as they shall have been fully disclosed and developed.

* * * * * * *

At the same time, it must be recognized that a Government agency operating in this field, and endowed with wide powers to license or close exchanges, coupled with a reserve power to license individual brokers as more fully discussed hereafter, and to make rules and regulations concerning a delicate mechanism like the stock exchange must be in the highest degree effective, nonpolitical, able to act rapidly, and at the same time so constituted as to place responsibility to the fullest extent possible on the private bodies now handling the work of security exchanges. * * * Technical specialization in financial matters of this character together with practical problems of administration might dictate as to the wisest course the setting up of a new and separate authority in which the administration of the Securities Act and the regulation of stock exchanges would be vested.

I am firmly convinced that the fair and just administration of this bill, if it were enacted into law, that a separate commission should be established. We all know that this legislation today is one of the most important that has come before this session of Congress. Everybody in the country is affected by it. It affects credit. It may mean deflation. It may mean on the one hand a partial paralysis of business. All of these things being involved in it, why not let us try to give it the best administration possible?

I am not speaking detrimentally, nor do I know anything against the Federal Trade Commission or any members thereof, but I do know this: that the manifold duties of the Federal Trade Commission are enough for it. I know well enough and you do too, that it is best not to overburden any man or set of men with work. We all know that the Senate bill provides for a separate Commission, and we all know that it has been rumored around here that the only reason to keep the Federal Trade Commission in this bill in the House is to give the conferees ground to trade upon. I do not believe that is either fair or just to the Federal Trade Commission or to the Members of the House.

I ask the members of the committee to adopt my amendment, because I believe that in the long run that it will be better for all concerned. After the adoption or rejection of the amendment that I have offered there is very little else to consider in the few remaining pages of this bill, and it will be passed by an overwhelming majority in the House and sent to the Senate. To a great extent the bill was not considered on its merits in the House. To a great extent, I have noticed that in the debate on the bill and under the 5-minute rule that it was in some of the Members' minds to penalize the stock exchanges for their past misdeeds. We are not here passing ex post facto law. We are here attempting to provide for permanent legislation for the control, regulation, and supervision of the stock exchanges. The idea, through the legislation that we are considering, is to permit and require men in dealing in public securities to do business legitimately, honestly, and under proper supervision and regulation in the interest of the public.

It is unfortunate that no one who offers an amendment could do so without being termed a "chisler" or being branded as offering a stock-exchange amendment for the purpose of weakening the bill. It is also unfortunate that the bill was not passed upon its merits.

During the course of practicing law, in many cases, I have seen an attorney representing a client in a case in court who either was not sufficiently acquainted with the law and the facts in his case, or who had a weak case, spending a great deal of the time of the trial not upon the merits of the case but upon a denunciation of the witnesses and others connected with the other side.

I hope and trust that the Senate will amend it in a great many particulars in order that a workable bill may be finally enacted into law. I hope and trust that whatever bill may pass will not in any respect cause any deflation and further restriction of credit to industry. I am vitally interested in all legislation that has for its purpose aiding in employing the unemployed, and I do not want any legislation passed which would in any way retard recovery, and with legislation of this type which we are passing here today that is the great danger that we face. I believe that even now, though it pass in the House, that this bill could, by the Senate and in conference, be made a far better bill.

The second paragraph, which is the argument of its passage, should be omitted. The so-called "section in regard to the margin requirements" should be clarified. The unnecessary burden thrown upon corporations in reporting should be lessened. The multitudinous criminal and penal sections and a great many others could be, to a great extent, done away with. A separate commission should be established. In short, the Roper report should be followed more closely.

We are legislating today for the public interests. We are not legislating to penalize the stock exchanges of the future and the business of the future for what has been done on the stock exchanges in the past.

I trust that this bill, if it should become a law, will do all that the proponents of it think that it will, although I have grave misgivings and doubts.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, we are approaching the end of the consideration of this bill, and before we conclude I want to say that I have supported this legislation, and that I supported the legislation which resulted in the Securities Act.

I have not been impressed at all with the argument directed against these two pieces of legislation that they will bring about a regimentation of industry. The Securities Act was based upon the theory that anyone who made a false representation of a material fact and benefited by it at the expense of an innocent investor should reimburse the innocent investor whatever he suffered because of that false representation. I stand upon that policy. I think perhaps the Securities Act might be amended to advantage in some particulars, but for one I think the purposes of the legislation were good and that the act itself should not be weakened.

I am supporting this legislation because I believe that if we provide fair and honest market places for the transaction of the purchase and sale of corporate securities in this country, it will be a desirable thing and will be to the benefit of the general public and to the benefit of business.

As I have said, Mr. Chairman, I am not impressed with the argument directed against these two pieces of legislation on the ground that they regiment business. I may say to my Republican colleagues that we have passed act after act based upon the theory which lies behind the pending legislation. A few moments ago I referred to the Congressional Directory to see how many governmental commissions are in existence. I shall mention some of them. I submit that most of them have greater discretionary power over business than this legislation proposes to vest in the Federal Trade Commission with regard to the stock exchanges. Let us start with the Federal Reserve Board. Has any board or agency of the Government power approaching that which this agency has over the banks of the country? I think those familiar with the banking legislation of this country will admit that the Federal Reserve Board exercises a discretionary power so great that by comparison it makes the power conferred upon the Federal Trade Commission by this legislation seem almost insignificant. To continue with governmental boards, we have the War Finance Corporation, the Tariff Commission, the Federal Power Commission, the Radio Commission, the United States Board of Mediation, and the Interstate Commerce Commission, to name only the important ones. All of these agencies have a much greater degree of discretionary power over business than is conferred upon the Federal Trade Commission over stock exchanges by this legislation.

Mr. HOLLISTER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAPES. I yield.

Mr. HOLLISTER. How many of those commissions have the right by rules and regulations to make criminal offenses?

Mr. MAPES. The Federal Reserve Board and the Comptroller of the Currency have the power to close all the banks of the United States.

Mr. HOLLISTER. I did not ask the gentleman that question; I asked the gentleman how many of those boards to which he has referred have the right by rules and regulations to make criminal offenses? This is the great objection to the pending bill.

Mr. MAPES. I have heard that argument made many times.

Mr. COX. If the gentleman from Michigan will yield, have those boards and commissions not the right to adopt rules and regulations the violation of which constitute a criminal offense?

Mr. MAPES. Why, certainly they have.

Mr. HOLLISTER. Will the gentleman name those boards which have such power?

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, I decline to yield further. If agencies of the Government have not some power with which to enforce their rules and regulations, what is the sense of giving them any power to make rules and regulations, whether it be with regard to the stock exchange or something else?

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAPES. I yield.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. I wish the gentleman would point out to me any specific provision in the law creating the commissions the gentleman has mentioned, from the Federal Reserve Board down, which gives them the power to adopt a rule or regulation which would send a man to the penitentiary and fine him, if that rule or regulation is not written into the law itself?

Mr. MAPES. I may say to the gentleman from Ohio that the Federal Trade Commission is given no such power under this law.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Will the gentleman yield for a further question?

Mr. MAPES. Not until I have answered the gentleman's first question.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. I disagree with the gentleman.

Mr. MAPES. Yes; I know the gentleman disagrees with me; but I insist on answering the gentleman's first question before I yield further.

Mr. COX. If the gentleman will permit I may call attention to the National Recovery Act.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, the Federal Trade Commission is given power to prescribe rules and regulations; but it is not given power to punish anyone. The matter must be taken to the courts and a case made out, and then it is left to the judge to determine whether the violator of the rules and regulations shall be punished by sentence of fine or imprisonment.

Mr. CROSSER of Ohio. Is it not a fact that the Banking Act of 1933, the Agricultural Adjustment Act, and the National Recovery Act all give the power to which these gentlemen have just referred?

Mr. MAPES. I think so, but I have not the act before me. Mr. Chairman, may I get to the particular amendment of the gentleman from North Carolina? I expressed myself on this amendment in general debate. I have not considered that it was a matter of first importance whether this act was administered by the Federal Trade Commission or a separate commission, but it seems to me that the organization of the Federal Trade Commission is particularly well adapted to take on the administration of this act. That Commission administers the Securities Act. It is organized for the purpose of maintaining fair practices in business. The Federal Trade Commission will be divided into divisions, as I pointed out in general debate, and one division will be charged with the duty of administering this act.

Anyone who is aggrieved by any order, rule, or regulation of the Commission, may I say to those who are so afraid of the rules and regulations to be promulgated by this Commission, or anyone who is aggrieved by any order of the division of the Federal Commission having this matter in charge has a right to appeal to the full Commission and to have a hearing before the full Commission of 7 members, not by the 2 or 3 making up the division that is centered on this act. In that way he will have the benefit of getting the view of the other members of the Commission as well as those who have the direct administration of the act.

Commissioner Landis, of the Federal Trade Commission, said before our committee in the hearings that the Commission had taken on a personnel of about 65 to administer the Securities Act. A good deal of the same kind of investigation and research work will be required to administer this act as the Securities Act, and it would be a simple duplication of authority if a new commission were established.

May I say further, and I say this without any desire to do anything more than state the facts, I think it may be assumed that everybody who is opposed to this legislation, who wants to see it defeated and who wants to see it fail, will vote for this amendment for a new commission. I think the friends of the legislation should see to it that the amendment does not carry.

Mr. MERRITT. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I am heartily in favor of the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. BULWINKLE], providing for the administration of this act by a commission not connected with the Federal Trade Commission.

The fundamental objection which I have to the bill now before the House is, as I indicated in my minority report, that it goes beyond necessary legislation for stock-exchange regulation and gives the Commission, directly or indirectly, control over securities and therefore the corporate life of practically every corporation in the United States. The amendment proposed by the gentleman from North Carolina will to some extent modify this difficulty, because the commission which would be appointed under his amendment would start with the fundamental idea that they are to control stock-exchange activity, and not business management and business practices. But I go further than the desire to have this amendment of the gentleman from North Carolina adopted, and should like very much to have substituted for the pending bill a bill which he introduced during the discussion of this matter before our committee, which is known as "a bill to establish a Federal Stock Exchange Commission, to provide for the licensing of stock exchanges, and for other purposes", and is numbered 8575. Its main provisions follow:

First. The bill provides first for the establishment of a Federal Stock Exchange Commission, composed of the Secretary of the Treasury, the Governor of the Federal Reserve Board, and three others, to be appointed by the President.

Second. After 6 months no stock exchange can do business without a license. The Commission shall grant the license applied for if it finds that the provisions of the constitution of such exchange reasonably guard against undue speculative activity, manipulative practices, and otherwise afford reasonably adequate protection for investors.

Third. The Commission has power over the future rules and practices of the exchange after a license shall be granted, and to see that the exchange takes such disciplinary measures as are necessary to enforce its rules.

Fourth. The Commission has power to suspend and revoke the licenses of an exchange, to make all necessary inquiries and investigations to see that its rules are carried out, and to summon witnesses, administer oaths, and so forth. It may call for the production of any documentary evidence which may be required from any part of the United States to any designated place of hearing.

Fifth. It provides a penalty for violation of the provisions of the act of a fine not exceeding $10,000, or imprisonment for not more than 5 years. Any person knowingly violating any of the rules or regulations promulgated by the Commission may be fined not more than $1,000, and without any provision for imprisonment.

This bill completely meets the objections which I and a number of other Members of the House have to the present bill and is, as its name implies, a bill strictly for the regulation and government of stock exchanges. It will at the same time carry out the views of President Roosevelt as expressed in his letter of March 26 to Chairman RAYBURN:

> That the Government be given such definite powers of supervision over exchanges that the Government itself will be able to correct abuses which may arise in the future.

It is perfectly clear from the discussion which has extended for several days in connection with the bill that there is great diversity of opinion in this committee and throughout the country as to the effects of the bill before us. Rightly or wrongly, it engenders great fear and prevents the feeling of security which is necessary to a renewal of business. I submit that whether the bill before us or the bill offered by the gentleman from North Carolina is enacted the efforts of the commission appointed either under one bill or the other must be preliminary work for a large part of the first year, certainly for 6 months. If the Bulwinkle bill is substituted the commission can, during these 6 months, make a full examination of existing stock exchanges and the rules under which they act, and can also provide and insist upon such changes in the rules as will fully protect investors. If they find that additional legislation is needed either to increase their powers or legislation which directly affects the exchanges they can recommend it to the next Congress with fuller knowledge as to the necessity for the legislation and as to its effect.

No possible harm can be brought about by the delay in the enactment of the many specific provisions of the present bill, while their enactment into law may do much present harm and will make any change very difficult.

I have made this explanation so that when I have an opportunity to make a motion to recommit and to substitute the Bulwinkle bill the House will understand the reasons underlying the motion. I have no objection and I think no Member of the House has any objection to proper regulation of the stock exchanges, but there is grave fear on our part and on the part of the Nation of the effect of many of the provisions of the pending bill.

Mr. BULWINKLE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MERRITT. I yield to the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. BULWINKLE. I call attention to the fact that I was informed that the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MAPES] stated that my amendment would take some of the powers away from the Federal Trade Commission. It takes away none of the existing powers.

Mr. MAPES. If the gentleman had been here I do not think he would have interpreted anything I said to that effect. I certainly did not have any idea of conveying such an impression.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MERRITT. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. O'CONNOR. If the gentleman is so enthusiastically in favor of this amendment, I am curious to know why in his minority views on page 32 he wrote these words:

> The creation of new commissions having power over business and the creation of new regulations and penalties do not tend to quiet and confidence but to the contrary, and thus retard business.

Mr. MERRITT. I was referring, of course, to the present commissions that have the power.

Mr. O'CONNOR. The gentleman is advocating a new commission?

Mr. MERRITT. Yes; in a way.

Mr. TABER. If the gentleman will yield—it will be the lesser of two evils.

Mr. MERRITT. May I point out for the benefit of the committee that Mr. BULWINKLE's original bill is H.R. 8575, which can be had, and I hope the Members will secure a copy of this bill before we vote on this bill.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have 5 additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

Mr. MERRITT. Mr. Chairman, this Bulwinkle bill to my mind, has every advantage that the other bill has and none of its disadvantages. May I suggest to the committee that whether the bill before the House is passed, or whether the Bulwinkle bill is passed, it will take 6 or 8 months for the preliminary organization work. The Bulwinkle bill has everything of advantage in it that this bill has, so far as the stock-exchange business is concerned. That commission, after looking over the field for 6 months, will know whether they have enough power or whether they should ask for additional power. I say it is much safer to enact a bill which we know cannot do much harm than a bill which may do great harm and which will be very difficult to correct hereafter. I advise the Members of the House that when the proper time comes I propose to offer a motion to recommit this bill and to substitute for it the Bulwinkle bill.

So, when the motion to recommit is offered, which cannot be debated, you will know the object I have in mind in offering the motion.

Mr. TABER. Will the gentleman tell the House the number of the bill?

Mr. MERRITT. As I stated a moment ago the bill is H.R. 8575. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, I am sure everyone sees the very close and intimate relationship between the Securities Act and this stock-exchange bill. The Securities Act deals primarily with the original distribution of securities, while the Stock Exchange Act deals with trading in outstanding securities. Since this is true it would appear that both acts should be administered by the same agency. If a special commission—as is proposed by the pending amendment—is to be set up to administer the pending bill, then certainly the administration of the Securities Act should be withdrawn from the Federal Trade Commission and put in the hands of the new commission. But, in view of the experience of the Federal Trade Commission in the administration of the Securities Act, and in view of the fact that this Commission has built up an organization made up of the best talent obtainable, I respectfully submit that if the purpose of the Congress is to enact a law which shall be promptly put into effect, its administration should go to the Federal Trade Commission.

This Commission primarily deals with trade and commerce. This bill deals with trade and commerce and I am sure that any Member of the House reading this bill will be impressed with the view that the Federal Trade Commission is the agency to which its administration should be entrusted.

From whence comes the urge for the setting up of a special commission? Does the suggestion come from friends of the bill? Is it something that would make the legislation less objectionable to the exchanges which are to be regulated?

We have proceeded in the consideration of the measure upon the idea that we would follow the committee that wrote the bill, trusting and believing in the committee as friends of the public, and if the committee is to be sustained then I submit it is important to vote down the pending amendment.

By what I have said I do not mean to in any way question the sincerity of the author of the amendment. He invoked the report of the Roper committee or commission in support of the amendment which he offered. In this connection may I direct your attention to the fact that Commissioner Landis was a member of the Roper committee or commission, and the commissioner appeared before the committee sponsoring the legislation and urged very strongly that its administration be put in the hands of that commission. That commission is set up and ready to go, and if you want effective and prompt administration of the law, its administration should be entrusted to this body. [Applause.]

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, it has been very amusing to me to hear some gentlemen on the floor, especially on the other side, oppose this measure to regulate the stock exchanges, and at the same time say they are strongly in favor of some method of regulating the stock exchanges. When did they get that way? What method do they favor? I wonder where these gentlemen were from 1926 to 1929. "Oh, where was Roderick then?" No blast upon their bugle horns then to warn the American people of the grave dangers that confronted them; no protest came from them at that time against the unjust, dishonest, cruel, and inhuman practices on the stock exchanges.

They talked about prosperity then—Hoover prosperity. The truth is, there was no prosperity. That jamboree on the stock market, fostered by the four M's—Morgan, Mellon, Mills, and Meyer—was simply an artificial stimulation, a drunken orgy, a saturnalia of speculation, graft, fraud, and corruption, the like of which the world has never seen. It wrecked fortunes, blasted hopes, destroyed lives, ruined homes, made beggars of innocent women and children, and thieves of honest men.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANKIN. No. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH] ought not to interrupt me now. He should have spoken then. His party was in power at that time, and this misconduct was going on in his own State, right under his very nose. He and his colleagues who are now exhausting themselves critizing this bill were too busy shouting "prosperity" to warn the American people of the approaching disaster. At a time when our farmers were being bled white, when the small business men were losing everything they had, when the country was going to rack and ruin, they were shouting "prosperity" from one end of the country to the other, while the Federal Reserve Board, which had been created to protect the American people, was then being engineered by Eugene Meyer, Ogden Mills, and Andrew Mellon, and was financing this jamboree on the stock market, aiding and abetting, with Government credit, the most gigantic scheme of highway robbery the world has ever known.

"Oh, where was Roderick then?"

Where, then, were these Republican leaders who are now criticizing this bill and proclaiming so loudly their desire to regulate the stock exchanges by some other method and at the same time fighting this measure which they know will regulate then? Where were they when these financial buccaneers were unloading onto the American people $2,000,000,000 of Central and South American bonds, selling them to the widows and orphans and to the aged and infirm—bonds that are now scarcely worth the paper they are written on? Their loud professions of a desire to regulate the stock exchanges comes too late. They have sinned away their day of grace.

Let us see what happened at the time when we were going down into the pit of this depression. We find that in 1921 there were in the United States 21 people with incomes of $1,000,000 a year or more. In 1928 it had grown to 511, and in 1929 it reached the peak of 513 individuals with incomes of more than $1,000,000 a year. Where did these millions come from? They came from the American people. Who reaped those fortunes? Did the manufacturers make them? No; they did not. Did the farmers make them? No, indeed. Did the merchants make them? Not on your life. Did they come from our international trade? No, no. Our international trade was already dead. They came from the highway robberies on the stock exchanges, which we are now trying to prevent in the future by the passage of this bill. [Applause.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to say a few words in opposition to this amendment which would take the supervision of the exchanges out of the hands of the Federal Trade Commission.

By all means, this amendment ought to be defeated. In the first place, as the gentleman from Michigan has said, we already have too many commissions. You remember we Democrats used to chide the Republicans because every time they got into trouble they created a new commission. And every time they created a new commission they made it worse. [Laughter.] Let us not fall into that error ourselves. [Applause.]

The Federal Trade Commission is doing some of the greatest work that has ever been done by any agency of the Government. By its investigation of the utilities in the last few years, it has brought relief to the American people through a reduction of utility rates to the ultimate consumers, amounting to $118,000,000. Only yesterday, in the State of Illinois, the Power Trust, seeing the handwriting on the wall, undertook to placate the people of Illinois and reduced their light and power rates $1,300,000 a year. If they had lowered them to the rates provided by the yardstick of the Tennessee Valley Authority it would have saved the people of Illinois $6,000,000 a year.

It is estimated that this program of the Federal Trade Commission will bring a reduction in utilities to the ultimate consumers of the country in the next 10 years amounting to $1,000,000,000. Yet they have done this work at a cost of less than $2,000,000.

No man can question the efficiency of the Federal Trade Commission. No man can question the effectiveness of its work. No one questions the sincerity of its present membership.

Let us see what it will cost to create another commission, such as this amendment provides. It is estimated that it will add an extra expense of not less than $500,000. You would have to have new quarters. You would have to have new personnel, additional clerks, stenographers, and so forth. You would have to have a library. All this would be additional expenses piled onto the American people, without bringing them any additional relief.

I sincerely trust that the amendment will be voted down and the bill passed as it is written. I congratulate the committee on its efficient work. It is a long step in the right direction—one of the most important that has ever been taken by the Congress of the United States. [Applause.]

Mr. SUTPHIN. Mr. Chairman and Members of the Committee, this is one of the most important bills that has been presented for consideration on the floor of the House. Twenty millions of people who hold securities are interested in it. Every man, woman, and child who may own 1 foot of real estate is interested or jeopardized by it. Every person who owns a life-insurance policy or building-and-loan stock is interested in it. It may have a tendency to cause immediate deflation more than we have at the present time. But let us profit by the action of this body a number of years ago, when they enacted legislation, the McNary-Haugen bill, which resulted in the migration of billions of American capital to foreign countries, giving employment to hundreds of thousands of foreign workmen, while millions of American men and women walked the streets seeking food and shelter. There is no question but that that was an error, and we might err again.

Only a few days ago we read where a former distinguished Secretary of State had condemned that measure. Let us not also overlook the prohibition measure of years ago.

In my judgment this bill is a misnomer. A word came into frequent use during the war which acquired quite a vogue. I refer to the word "camouflage"—making something look like what it is not. That is what this bill amounts to. It is a camouflage bill. Everyone is in favor of the regulation of the stock exchange to prevent the marketing of fraudulent securities, but this bill regulates all business. Have we arrived at such a condition? I sincerely trust that this amendment will be adopted, and we will not place additional unnecessary burden on industry that is making a noble fight to recover. We must not aggravate the unemployment situation.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, I rise to see if we cannot agree on some time to close debate. We are likely to have two roll calls this afternoon.

Mr. ANDREWS of New York. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes.

Mr. ANDREWS of New York. There is one point which, I think, would be interesting to the House in connection with the amendment proposed by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. BULWINKLE], which I intend to support. Can the gentleman give me any information, as the leading Democratic conferee when the bill goes to conference, as to what his attitude will substantially be in respect to the Bulwinkle amendment which is included in the Senate bill?

Mr. RAYBURN. It is not included in the Senate bill. The Bulwinkle amendment provides for 3 and the Senate provision provides for 5. I shall never agree to it unless I have to, in order to get a bill or have to give up something I think is more important.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I do not believe there is anyone on this side who desires further to discuss the Bulwinkle amendment. I want the House to understand that, if the Bulwinkle amendment is adopted, it gives to the Commission the same power that is given to the Federal Trade Commission under the act that we are considering.

Mr. RAYBURN. I ask unanimous consent that all debate upon this amendment close in 20 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Chairman, I have not spoken in respect to this bill, and I would not speak now except probably for some mutterings I have heard around here about the New York delegation. I do not pretend to speak for that delegation in any respect. I speak for myself; but I think I know the views of some of the members of that delegation, and I want to dissipate any thought that the Members of Congress from New York are in any fear of the "big bad wolf" of Wall Street or the New York Stock Exchange. We have lived with them. We know them. I have practiced law in the Wall Street district for over 20 years. I have sued them, I have represented them, and I have defended them in criminal cases. I was amused the other day when my dear friend from North Carolina [Mr. BULWINKLE], who now offers this amendment, said to some Member, "Will you point out one person in your district who has been robbed by a member of the exchange?" Why, Mr. Chairman, the courts of New York are filled with such cases, and my office and every law office in New York is filled with just such cases in which the charges certainly do constitute "robbery." Furthermore, the largest bureau in the office of the attorney general of New York is one which has recently grown to an organization greater than the whole attorney general's office was a few years ago, because it devotes its entire time to prosecuting frauds in Wall Street.

But it must not be forgotten that there are exchanges in cities other than New York that have been just as guilty of these unfair practices. I heard the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. MERRITT] support the Bulwinkle amendment, contrary to the direful expression he used in his minority views against any new commissions being created. The gentleman comes from a district up there in Connecticut where most of the Wall Street brokers live. They live there to dodge the taxes in New York State and to evade jury service, and so forth.

I understand the minority report in the other body will be written by the senior Senator from Connecticut, in whose district the Wall Street brokers form such a large part of the population.

Mr. MERRITT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. O'CONNOR. Yes.

Mr. MERRITT. Does the gentleman know where the senior Senator from Connecticut lives?

Mr. O'CONNOR. I understand it is in a district beyond Greenwich.

Mr. MERRITT. The gentleman is wrong. His home is in the middle of the State.

Mr. O'CONNOR. I have campaigned in the gentleman's district, and I have seen the posters, "Wall Street Brokers Association", and so forth.

Now, as to the employees of Wall Street, hundreds of whom live in my district: The Members from New York have received thousands of letters from them, all compelled to be written, stating that they would lose their jobs if this bill passed. Those people need their jobs, and I want to help them, but they are not going to lose their jobs. This bill will correct the evils in the business and make more jobs. Let me say this. Of any industry or business organization in America, the poorest employees who perform similar work to the work done in Wall Street are the Wall Street employees. But worse than that, their employment is the most uncertain of those in any other business.

They fear losing their jobs, which they never really had. For instance, if there is a 3,000,000-share market today and a 2,000,000-share market tomorrow, tomorrow night one third of the employees will be laid off in every brokerage house in New York. They are not employed by the week. They are employed by the day. They are more uncertain of their employment than the employees of any other industry. They know it. They have been frightened into writing this propaganda to Members of Congress against this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York [Mr. O'CONNOR] has expired.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 5 additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. O'CONNOR. These exchanges cannot and will not regulate themselves. That has been proved. Just a few weeks ago a man came to me and said, "You do not mean to say you are going to pass that bill to regulate the stock exchanges?" I said, "Yes; I think we are." He said, "Why, that would put us out of business." I said, "By the way, what are you doing now?" He said, "I am manager of a house down in the Street." I said, "I hope you take care of yourself and do not get into trouble again, because it is within the year I had you paroled, after doing between 4 and 5 years for robbing people in the same business." There are many such employed in these exchanges, and there is no denying that. During the boom days of the exchange every bookmaker at the race track in New York was in a brokerage house holding a seat or connected with a firm. We from New York know them personally. They are nice fellows, but a few years ago the way to rise to prominence in the Street was to gain a reputation of betting thirty or fifty thousand dollars on a horse race.

Now, in the opposition to this bill, the same lobby that has been and still is lobbying for the Whisky Trust, the very same individuals are lobbying for this bill in the city of Washington. I do not have to tell you who they are. You know them. It is not strange because the headquarters of the Whisky Trust is in the Kuhn-Loeb Building, at 52 William Street, in the Wall Street district. Of course, when the exchange wanted lobbyists, they knew the boys who had lobbied so well in behalf of the Whisky Trust were the best operators in Washington. They had entree everywhere.

It is not easy for me to oppose the distinguished chairman of my ex-committee, the "Wirt" committee [laughter], on his amendment, but I sincerely believe that the Federal Trade Commission, from its experience with the Securities Act, and because of the type of the members of that great Commission, possibly augmented in its membership, is well qualified and experienced to administer this act, without setting up another commission and falling into the danger of the "bureaucracy" that helped so much to elect our party to office.

Mr. BULWINKLE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. O'CONNOR. I yield.

Mr. BULWINKLE. I might state that the Senate bill provides for a separate commission. Rumors are that the only reason they want to give this to the Federal Trade Commission is to give them a trading point between the House and Senate. Now, I do not care whether this is carried today or not or whether it is defeated or not. In the end you will come back here from the conference report and vote for a different commission.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Of course, the gentleman's prophecy may be correct. In my experience with the recent tax bill, which to my mind was one of the greatest surprises that ever came out of a conference in my experience, we may expect anything to happen in conference if our managers are not adamant. I believe firmly, however, that we should not establish this new commission, at least not now. We should place the powers in the Federal Trade Commission; and as to the bill in main, however, I do believe that if any industry with an unchallenged reputation for unfair practices ever needed regulating, it is those of our stock exchanges, whose unfair practices have been carried on brazenly and defiantly in our country for the last generation, resulting in the loss of billions of dollars to many millions of our people. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York [Mr. O'CONNOR] has again expired.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, the reason for this amendment and its advocacy, I presume, grow out of the conversation that has been going on around Washington for several years. The Federal Trade Commission has been under fire. It is more under fire right now than it has ever been, because, in response to resolutions of the Senate, it has dug into and found out some things about people in this country who have been violating moral law, if not statutory law.

I echo the sentiments of my distinguished friend from Michigan [Mr. MAPES]. This so-called "Bulwinkle amendment" will get the vote of every man in this House who is opposed to this bill.

Now, the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. BULWINKLE] offers an amendment to provide for a separate commission of three members to administer this act. It is known, of course, that if a separate commission is provided for, it will have the administration of the Securities Act also.

There has been a great deal said around this Capitol and whispered throughout about Mr. James M. Landis, a so-called "member" of the "brain trust" and present Federal Trade Commissioner. I do not know whether there is a "brain trust" or not, but I say this about Jim Landis—that if there is a "brain trust" in this Government, he is entirely capable of being a member of it. [Applause.] What will happen, therefore, if you want to get away from Landis and Mathers and the other members of the Federal Trade Commission in the administration of this act? If the Securities Act is transferred to this new commission—if there is such a commission, and I hope there never will be—what would the President necessarily and naturally do, being a man of sanity and having appointed two men on the Federal Trade Commission to administer the Securities Act? He would transfer them to this new commission that is provided for under the Bulwinkle amendment, and there would be 2 to 1 in the administration of this act. I hope there will never be any such commission, and whatever has been said around here I am not going to yield on that point in conference unless I have to in order to save the bill at all.

If you want no effective regulation of the stock exchange, vote for the motion of the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. MERRITT] to recommit this bill and instruct the committee to bring back the original Bulwinkle bill.

The question involved in the vote upon this amendment and in the vote upon the motion to recommit is whether or not you want effective regulation of the stock exchanges.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAYBURN. I yield.

Mr. McCORMACK. There is just one observation I want to make with reference to the Federal Trade Commission, and that is that since its inception there has not been, without regard to administration, the least breath of scandal directed toward it. [Applause.]

Mr. DUNN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAYBURN. I yield.

Mr. DUNN. Is not the main question, Will the public in the future be robbed? [Applause.]

Mr. RAYBURN. That may be; but I say in closing that if you want effective regulation of the stock exchange, vote down this amendment. [Applause.]

If you want effective regulation of the stock exchanges, vote down the motion to recommit, and send your House conferees into conference with the Senate with a satisfactory, original bill—something upon which they can stand—and bring back to the House a report of real regulation and not a sham or a fraud. [Applause.]

Mrs. GREENWAY. Mr. Chairman, I feel that the speech just made puts some of us on the spot unjustly.

For one, I am for this bill; but in supporting the amendment just proposed I do not feel that I am in any way forfeiting my right also to support the bill.

Reform legislation is always commendable, but sometimes it is not wholly practicable at first. Today as we vote upon this all-important legislation there are millions of people who have put their savings into a few stocks listed on the stock exchanges, and they are profoundly worried. Some of us who will vote for this amendment will do so in the belief that the President may well choose if he so desires from the Federal Trade Commission some of its experienced executives to constitute this stock-exchange commission and, in setting up such an amendment as proposed by the Bulwinkle amendment, protect these investors and also create a smaller unit or body which will not be so difficult to cope with when emergencies arise, and the defects of this reform legislation must be corrected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. BULWINKLE].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BULWINKLE) there were—ayes 95, noes 143.

Mr. BULWINKLE. Mr. Chairman, I ask for tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and the Chair appointed as tellers Mr. BULWINKLE and Mr. COLE.

The Committee again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 102, noes 145.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. COLE. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. COLE: On page 57, line 12, after the word "The" where it appears the second time, strike out the word "Commission" and insert the word "President."

On page 57, line 18, strike out the word "Commission" and insert the word "President."

On page 57, line 25, strike out the word "Commission" and insert the word "President."

Mr. COLE. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of this amendment is to make very definite and very certain that the commission administering this act will be appointed by the President and not changed by anyone else.

The original bill on this subject introduced in February, upon which extended hearings were held by the committee over a course of many weeks, provided that the Federal Trade Commission should administer the act. After these extensive hearings a second bill was prepared—we have had 5 or 6. The purpose of the second bill was to reflect as nearly as possible a cross- section of the views of the committee at that time. Then for the first time was the appointment of two additional members to the Federal Trade Commission proposed and a direct division of the Federal Trade Commission called for.

I hope the Committee realizes that as provided in the pending bill the President appoints two additional members to the Federal Trade Commission, with the approval of the Senate, but 5 minutes after the appointment is confirmed the Federal Trade Commission can change the personnel of the division of three to administer this important act, change it every day if they please, without the approval of the President. I feel, and I believe this Committee does, that such should not be.

In 25 different places in the present bill the commission administering this act has the power to make rules and regulations to which the penalty clause of the act applies; that is, rules and regulations the violation of which is made a crime, if you please; I believe that the business people of the country, the stock-exchange people, and especially this Congress has its eyes riveted more upon the personnel which is to administer this act than upon anything else.

Mr. PETTENGILL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COLE. I yield gladly to my distinguished colleague on the committee.

Mr. PETTENGILL. Is it not true that under the language now carried in the bill should a difference of opinion arise between the Federal Trade Commission and the President with reference to procedure or policy, the Federal Trade Commission might even checkmate the President of the United States?

Mr. COLE. The gentleman is absolutely correct. I am glad to see the distinguished gentleman from Indiana, a member of this committee, who has rendered such valuable service during the consideration of this bill, in favor of this amendment.

Mr. PETTENGILL. I shall support the gentleman's amendment.

Mr. COLE. Mr. Chairman, this is not a new thought, because throughout the great mass of bills prepared at different intervals in an effort to present to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, what the drafters thought was a cross-section of the views of the committee, the word "President" appeared in them. Not until about the last week of our entering in executive session was the word "President" taken out and the word "Commission" substituted. The purpose of my amendment is to put back the word "President" in three important places so that when the three men who administer this act are named and appointed, no one can change them except the President of the United States.

Mr. BRITTEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COLE. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. BRITTEN. The gentleman just indicated that the word "President" was in the former bills and finally taken out. Can the gentleman without violating any confidences indicate to the House why the word "President" was changed to the word "Commission"? That is a very material change.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. COLE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed for 5 additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Maryland?

There was no objection.

Mr. COLE. The word "President" was in the bill where I seek to return that word during a large part of the hearings on this bill. During the weeks and weeks of testimony the word "President" appeared. Not a word of testimony from any witness was directed to this language because, answering the gentleman's question, it came to the committee from the subcommittee after we had concluded our testimony and in executive session had given the subcommittee as near as we could a fair idea as to how the whole committee stood. Why the subcommittee changed it I do not know.

In the committee meeting this amendment was offered to put the word "President" back. I do not mind telling the gentlement of the committee that the amendment failed by a very close vote. I am not going to take much more time, but I think in all seriousness, the success or failure of this bill depends on the administration of the act. Everyone will have an eye upon those men who are going to carry the responsibility of administering this important measure and will look at the names of the two men who will be sent to the Senate. Judge Landis would be acceptable from my viewpoint as one of the commission.

Business and everybody would know that the three-named gentlemen named by the President were the ones to administer this bill, and not three men on the present Federal Trade Commisison, unless the President should so decide, and I say this without reflection upon them, but they were not selected, with all due respect to them, with the idea of administering this law. I feel the country had great confidence in the President; so let us adopt this amendment and assure the country as to the personnel of the commission to administer this extremely important legislation.

Mr. RAYBURN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COLE. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman has stated that in the original bill the word appearing was "President." The Interstate Commerce Commission and all the other commissions that I know anything about have been allowed to form on their own divisions. I do not think it makes a great deal of difference one way or the other; and as far as I am individually concerned, if the House wants to put the responsibility entirely on the President, it is all right with me.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I do not think I will consume 5 minutes, but I should like to follow the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. COLE] with a word or two. I think he is entirely correct when he said to the House that the most important feature of this bill is the personnel of the commission, whatever it might be called, that will by rule, which may be changed from day to day, actually regulate the industries of the United States, to say nothing about its control and regulation of the stock exchanges. I am not nearly so much interested in the regulation of the stock-exchange features of this bill as I am in this direction of industries by the rules of a commission. If, perchance, the division of the commission within itself is made as the act is now drawn, let us consider for a moment the gentleman who has just been mentioned. James McCauley Landis probably had more to do with the writing of all these various bills from the first one to the last one than any other individual, and this work was done in collusion with the boys from the "little red house" in Georgetown. [Laughter.] I am serious about this.

Mr. CHAPMAN. May I ask the gentleman how far it is from the "little red house" in Georgetown to the "little green house" on K Street?

Mr. BRITTEN. I know there are two very distinctive houses in town today—the "little red house" in Georgetown and the "little green house" on K Street. Each of them has played an important part in the administrations of their time. The "little red house" is playing a bigger part than the baby faces in the gallery would indicate.

It is understood, Mr. Chairman, that Judge Landis has no sympathy whatever with the stock exchange. It is understood that he is not at all sympathetic with the stock market.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRITTEN. I yield to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. COX. Has not the stock exchange employed or engaged Mr. Landis in a number of instances?

Mr. BRITTEN. I do not know. I am not a lawyer, and I would not know that; but I do know that Judge Landis has on more than one occasion indicated his lack of sympathy with stock exchanges.

Mr. RAYBURN. If the gentleman will yield, may I say that my genial friend himself has not been in sympathy with all the stock exchanges.

Mr. BRITTEN. I should say I have not.

Mr. RAYBURN. That does not disqualify the gentleman.

Mr. BRITTEN. No; but if the language of this bill prevails, and a man who is unsympathetic has the selection of the other two members of a commission that will regulate all the industries and stock transactions of the country, he may, and probably would, select men who think about that particular operation as he does. That is the reason the amendment now pending should be adopted.

Mr. RAYBURN. It is going to be adopted by unanimous consent. I have already agreed to that. I was wondering what the gentleman from Illinois was thinking about. I stated that the amendment was agreeable to me.

Mr. BRITTEN. I understood the gentleman to say that, as far as he was concerned, it could go one way or the other; that he was agreeable to allowing the House to use its own judgment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. COLE].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MAPES: Page 60, strike out paragraph (b), lines 1 to 8, inclusive.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, in view of the rather persistent habit which this Congress has had of putting provisions in new legislation providing for the appointment of the personnel without regard to the Civil Service and the rather organized opposition to a similar provision proposed in the Home Owners' Loan Corporation bill a short time ago, I am not very hopeful this amendment is going to prevail; but I did not want a piece of legislation reported by a committee of which I am a member to go through the House without expressing myself upon such a provision.

Over 20 years ago, when I was a member of the State Legislature of Michigan, I introduced a civil service bill in the legislature and I have consistently supported civil-service legislation from that time on.

I think it is a great disappointment to the people who believe in civil-service reform that this Congress has so persistently and consistently put provisions in new legislation ignoring civil-service regulations, and in this bill particularly, which is a constructive, progressive piece of legislation, it seems to me it is entirely out of place to have this provision in the bill.

Mr. Chairman, I think it is a great disappointment, as I have said, to the people who believe in civil-service reform. They do not look upon the question of reinstating the spoils system as a new deal, but distinctly as an old deal.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MAPES].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. PETTENGILL. Mr. Chairman, I offer a perfecting amendment. On page 58, line 12, at the end of the line, appears the word "other", when it is obvious it should be "otherwise." The "wise" was left off. It ought to go in, because I think this bill ought to be as wise as possible.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, the amendment that should be adopted is a little more than adding the word "wise." Clearly, the lines were transposed.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. PETTENGILL: On page 58, strike out line 13, and insert "wise act as to any of said work, business, functions, or powers."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BRITTEN. I should like to know if the amendment just adopted brought about the use of the word "wise" for the first time in connection with this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. That is not a parliamentary inquiry.

The Clerk read as follows:

PENALTIES

SEC. 32. Any person who willfully violates any provision of this act, or any rule or regulation thereunder the violation of which is made unlawful under the terms of this act, or any person (including any director or officer, or any accountant or other expert) who willfully and knowingly makes, or causes to be made, any statement in any application, report, or document required to be filed under this act or any rule or regulation thereunder, which statement was false or misleading with respect to any material fact, shall upon conviction be fined not more than $10,000 or imprisoned not more than 2 years, or both, except that when such person is an exchange, a fine not exceeding $500,000 may be imposed.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. COOPER of Ohio: Page 60, line 11, after the word "act" strike out "or any rule or regulation thereunder."

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Mr Chairman, not having a legal mind I somewhat hesitate to discuss what I believe is a legal question, but I believe this amendment affects one of the most important provisions in the legislation which we are now considering.

Section 32 provides that "any person willfully violating any provision of the act, or any rule or regulation, the violation of which is made unlawful, upon conviction, provides for a fine or not more than $10,000, or imprisonment for not more than 2 years, or both."

Under this act either the Commission or the Federal Reserve Board is given the power to make rules and regulations which, by the terms of the act, have the force of law in at least 40 cases.

In nine sections of the act, where conduct is declared unlawful, the crime is specifically defined.

In at least 20 other places in the act things are declared to be unlawful without any definition of the act other than to provide that the doing of such things shall be unlawful when in violation of rules and regulations to be made by the Commission or the Federal Reserve Board.

Such wide delegation of power to create criminal acts by as yet undetermined rules and regulations appear in section 6 (c–1–2), sections 6 (d–1), section 7 (a–2–3), section 8 (a–6), section 8 (b–1–2–3), section 8 (c), section 9, section 10 (a–b), section 11 (d–e–f), section 13 (a–b), section 14, and section 29.

It is doubtful whether ever in the history of Congress such a wide and sweeping delegation of power has been given to any administrative body to create by rule and regulation crimes punishable by severe fine and imprisonment, or both.

By rule and regulation not only are the exchanges and members of the exchanges affected but individuals, corporations, stockholders, and banks.

The creation of such new crimes might be justifiable if it appeared that this was the only way of enforcing this act. However, under the provisions of the act not only is the Commission given power, by mandamus or injunction, to enforce its rules and regulations—section 20—but also in case of violation of the rules and regulations, or failure to put them into effect, exchanges and members of exchanges or dealers or brokers dealing through such exchanges can be expelled if they are found to be violating the rules.

Finally, the Commission is given the broadest power to investigate any person who is suspected of violating any provision of the act, in order to enable the Commission to obtain evidence upon which to take action, through court order or by suspension or expulsion.

The criminal provisions should be confined to willful violation of the act.

I want to call the attention of the House that my amendment does not in any way interfere with the specific violation of any provisions that are now in the bill.

Running all through this measure you find provisions that give to the Federal Trade Commission the power to set up additional rules and regulations other than those specifically provided in the bill.

For instance, on yesterday we were told by Mr. RAYBURN, and rightly so, that the committee eliminated some objectionable features in the bill as it was first drafted. Take section 11: We struck some very objectionable features out of this section.

However, if you examine paragraph (b) of section 12 you will find it contains these words:

Except that this provision shall not be construed to prevent the Commission from imposing such additional requirements with respect to such reports within the scope of this section and section 11, as may deem necessary.

In other words, this provision gives the Federal Trade Commission the power to put back in section 11, by rules and regulations, the objectionable features which we took out of the bill.

Now, I wonder if this Congress is going to authorize one of its subordinate agencies to have the power to write rules and regulations that are not in the bill, for the violation of which provides for fine and imprisonment.

A few days ago the gentleman from California [Mr. LEA] said: "Give a commission power and it will use it." Of course, they will use it, and yet we are writing into this bill a provision giving the Federal Trade Commission the power to adopt rules and regulations any time they see fit, which will send a man to the penitentiary and impose a fine upon him for the violation of such rules and regulations.

During the last year or so we have passed legislation granting great powers to commissions and boards, but this was all done under the theory of emergency legislation.

I want to call attention to the fact that the first important piece of legislation which this Congress passed a little over a year ago was the Economy Act, and there we delegated broad powers to the President of the United States, but we specified in the law what his powers should be. What was the result of giving that power to the President of the United States? You all know what was the result. It is very evident that this Congress only a short time ago believed that power given to the President was abused, and it took away from him the power given him under the Economy Act of 1933.

Then we passed other emergency legislation giving broad powers to commissions and boards. There is a vast difference between emergency legislation and this measure we are considering here today. I think the American people are a little bit fearful about some of this legislation we are passing.

I read in the newspapers a few days ago where a poor tailor got haled into court for pressing a pair of pants for 35 cents when he should have charged 40 cents under the code. He was taken into the court, and the judge sentenced him to 30 days' imprisonment and fined him $100.

Again, a woman and mother went into a delicatessen store in Rochester, N.Y., to buy a quart of milk. The proprietor knew she was poor and needy and he gave her a quart of milk and threw in a loaf of bread. He was taken into court and fined for giving a hungry woman a loaf of bread. It was a violation of the code.

How much farther are we to go on giving this power to Federal boards and commissions? I think the American people are just getting a little bit tired of it all.

I believe in criminal penalties, but they should be confined to the specific things which are intended to be made criminal. However, I wonder if we want to write into this bill a provision which provides a fine and imprisonment for the violation of a rule or regulation which is not now in the bill but may be made hereafter by the Commission. Should we go so far as to subject any person, business man, bankers, officials of industry, and their employees to the hazards of criminal prosecution for the possible violation of any rule or regulation which the Commission may adopt?

This provision gave the committee much concern when we were writing the bill.

It will be said that the criminal provisions are confined to willful violation of the rules or regulations made by the Commission. The proof of whether the violation was willful or not will have to be made in court. We should remember, however, that it is the indictment of the individual which is likely to destroy his standing and reputation. The proof of his innocence by showing that the violation was accidental and not willful is not news, and is not given the same publicity as the mere indictment of a prominent citizen. When some district attorney goes to a Federal grand jury and gets an indictment, that is the thing that is going to ruin the reputation and standing of the individual in the community in which he lives. I hope the House will carefully consider this amendment.

Let me repeat, and say again, that the amendment I offer does not in any way interfere with the violation of any specific rule or regulation now in the bill. As I have stated running all through this measure there are provisions which delegate to the Federal Trade Commission the power to set up rules and regulations that are not in the bill, the violation of which is a criminal offense punishable by fine and imprisonment. Personally, I am not ready to delegate to any Government commission or board the power to write a criminal code. The Constitution delegates this power to Congress. As a member of the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, who was charged with the duty of drafting this measure, I want to support the provisions of the bill which relates to the regulation of the stock exchanges. I cannot, however, vote for the measure as long as it gives to a commission unlimited power to draft rules and regulations the violation of which is a criminal offense. I appeal to you, my colleagues, to accept the amendment I offer. [Applause.]

Mr. MONAGHAN of Montana. Mr. Chairman, as I said to the distinguished gentleman from Ohio [Mr. COOPER] the other day, the gentleman unintentionally, no doubt, is creating the false impression that this provision goes farther than anything that is made unlawful in this act. Mr. WOLVERTON, a member of the committee, suggested an amendment which specifically limits the rules of the Commission so that this provision applies only to those commissions which are unlawful under the act. The President of the United States has asked for a bill with teeth in it. If the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio is adopted, the teeth are literally taken out of this measure.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, I have only a few words to say. We were urged by gentlemen who came before the committee and by gentlemen in the committee, amongst whom was the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. COOPER], not to go into so many details in the bill, but to leave the matter to the rules and regulations of the Commission. If we should adopt the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio, it would be tantamount to repealing four fifths of the law that we have just gone over.

Mr. OLIVER of New York. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes.

Mr. OLIVER of New York. The only amendment that could be suggested as a logical one by the gentleman from Ohio is that we write into the statute now a strait-jacket law. If you do not write a strait-jacket law into the statute, you have to leave it to the Commission to enact rules and regulations. You have the choice of one or the other, as I understand the proposition now, and no one at this time wants a strait-jacket law.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Has the gentleman any objection to having the amendment again reported? Some of us have not heard the amendment.

Mr. RAYBURN. No; I have no objection, and ask unanimous consent that the amendment be again reported.

There was no objection, and the Clerk again reported the Cooper amendment.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to have the section read in full.

Mr. RAYBURN. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. COOPER of Ohio) there were—ayes 70, noes 135.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk concluded the reading of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Committee automatically rises under the rule.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that Committee had had under consideration the bill H.R. 9323, and, pursuant to House Resolution 363, reported the bill back to the House with sundry amendments adopted by the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. Under the rule the previous question is ordered. Is a separate vote demanded upon any amendment? If not, the Chair will put them en gros. The question is on the adoption of the amendments.

The amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

Mr. MERRITT. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following motion to recommit, which I send to the desk.

The SPEAKER. Is the gentleman opposed to the bill?

Mr. MERRITT. I am.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. MERRITT moves to recommit the bill to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce with instructions to that committee to report the bill back to the House forthwith with the following amendment:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert the following: "That this act may be cited as the 'Stock Exchange Act of 1934.'

"STOCK EXCHANGE COMMISSION

"SEC. 2. There is hereby established a Federal Stock Exchange Commission (hereinafter referred to as the 'Commission') to be composed of the Secretary of the Treasury and the Governor of the Federal Reserve Board, who shall be members ex officio, and three members to be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. Not more than two of such appointed Commissioners shall be members of the same political party. No appointed Commissioner shall actively engage in any other business, vocation, or employment than that of serving as Commissioner. Each appointed Commissioner shall receive a salary at the rate of $10,000 a year and shall hold office for a term of 6 years, except that (1) any Commissioner appointed to fill a vacancy occurring prior to the expiration of the term for which his predecessor was appointed shall be appointed for the remainder of such term, and (2) the terms of office of the Commissioners first taking office after the date of enactment of this act shall expire, as designated by the President at the time of nomination, one at the end of 2 years, one at the end of 4 years, and one at the end of 6 years, after the date of enactment of this act.

"LICENSING PROVISIONS

"SEC. 3. (a) After 6 months after the date of enactment of this act it shall be unlawful to transmit or cause to be transmitted through the mails or in interstate commerce by any means or instruments of transportation or communication (1) any quotation of prices, or any other advice, report, or information concerning transactions on any stock exchange in any security listed, quoted, or dealt in on such exchange; (2) any offer to buy or sell any such security on such stock exchange; (3) any contract, agreement, or memorandum of purchase or sale of any such security arising out of any transaction on such stock exchange; and (4) any security sold or to be sold on such stock exchange, unless such stock exchange shall have first obtained a license from the Commission as hereinafter provided and such license is in effect at the time of such transmission.

"(b) Any stock exchange may make application to the Commission for a license, and such application shall be in such form and accompanied by such information as the Commission shall by regulations prescribe. Within 30 days after the receipt of any such application, and after full opportunity for hearing, the Commission shall enter an order granting or denying the license, unless the applicant therefor withdraws the application or consents to postponement of action thereon for a period to be designated by the Commission. The Commission shall grant the license applied for if it finds that the provisions of the constitution and rules of the stock exchange reasonably guard against undue speculative activity and unwarranted manipulative practices on such exchange, and otherwise govern the activities of the exchange and its members so as to afford reasonably adequate protection for investors.

"CONDITIONS OF LICENSES

"SEC. 4. Each license issued to a stock exchange under this act shall contain the following terms and conditions:

"(1) That no change will be made in the constitution or rules of the exchange unless the Commission, after full opportunity for hearing, has first approved such change as being consistent with the requirements of subsection (b) of section 3 for the granting of a license;

"(2) That the exchange will make such changes in its rules as the Commission may from time to time require, after full opportunity for hearing, as being necessary to make such rules consistent with the requirements of subsection (b) of section 3 for the granting of a license; and

"(3) That the exchange shall take such disciplinary measures as may be necessary properly to enforce the provisions of its constitution and rules.

"REVOCATION AND SUSPENSION OF LICENSES

"SEC. 5. (a) The Commission shall by order, after due notice and opportunity for hearing, revoke the license of any stock exchange in any case where it finds that such exchange has failed or refused to comply with any of the terms and conditions of its license; except that if, in any such case, the Commission is of the opinion that the revocation of such license will not be in the public interest, it shall suspend the license of such exchange for such period as it deems consistent with the public interest.

"(b) Any order of the Commission revoking or suspending a license may be reviewed by the Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia, or the circuit court of appeals for the judicial circuit in which the stock exchange is located, if a petition for such review is filed within 1 month after the date such order was issued. The judgment of any such court shall be final, except that it shall be subject to review by the Supreme Court of the United States upon certiorari, in the manner provided in section 240 of the Judicial Code, as amended. The review by such courts shall be limited to questions of law, and the findings of fact by the Commission, if supported by substantial evidence, shall be conclusive. Upon such review, such courts shall have power to affirm or, if the order of the Commission is not in accordance with law, to reverse the order of the Commission, with or without remanding the case for a rehearing, as justice may require.

"SPECIAL POWERS OF COMMISSION

"SEC. 6. (a) The Commission shall have authority from time to time to make, amend, and rescind such rules and regulations as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this act.

"(b) The Commission is authorized to recommend to stock exchanges licensed under this act such standards with respect to stock-exchange practices, and to gather and compile such information and make such investigations concerning transactions on the various stock exchanges, stock-market operations and practices, and related matters, as in its judgment are necessary and proper in the public interest and for the protection of investors.

"(c) For the purpose of all inquiries and investigations made by the Commission under this act, any member of the Commission or any officer or officers designated by it are empowered to administer oaths and affirmations, subpena witnesses, take evidence, and require the production of any books, papers, or other documents which the Commission deems relevant or material to the inquiry or investigation. Such attendance of witnesses and the production of such documentary evidence may be required from any place in the United States at any designated place of hearing.

"(d) The Commission is authorized to appoint and fix the compensation of such assistants and experts, and, subject to the civil-service laws and the Classification Act of 1923, as amended, to appoint such employees, and to make such expenditures (including expenditures for rent and personal services in the District of Columbia and elsewhere and for law books, books of reference, and periodicals, and for printing and binding), as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this act.

"(e) The Commission is authorized to prescribe reasonable fees for licenses required under this act.

"TESTIMONY AND PRODUCTION OF EVIDENCE

"SEC. 7. (a) In case of contumacy or refusal to obey a subpena issued to any person pursuant to this act, any United States court, within the jurisdiction of which said person guilty of contumacy or refusal to obey is found or resides, upon application by the Commission may issue to such person an order requiring such person to appear before the Commission, or one of its members or officers designated by it, there to produce documentary evidence if so ordered, or there to give evidence touching the matter in question; and any failure to obey such order of the court may be punished by said court as a contempt thereof.

"(b) No person shall be excused from attending and testifying or from producing books, papers, or documents before the Commission, or in obedience to the subpena of the Commission or any member thereof or any officer designated by it, or in any cause or proceeding instituted by the Commission, on the ground that the testimony or evidence, documentary or otherwise, required of him may tend to incriminate him or subject him to a penalty or forfeiture; but no individual shall be prosecuted or subjected to any penalty or forfeiture for, or on account of, any transaction, matter, or thing concerning which he is compelled, after having claimed his privilege against self-incrimination, to testify or produce evidence, documentary or otherwise, except that such individual so testifying shall not be exempt from prosecution and punishment for perjury committed in so testifying.

"PENALTIES

"SEC. 8. Any person who knowingly violates any of the provisions of this act shall upon conviction be fined not more than $10,000 or imprisoned not more than 2 years, or both. Any person who knowingly violates any of the rules or regulations promulgated by the Commission under the authority of this act shall upon conviction be fined not more than $1,000.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the motion to recommit.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion to recommit.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, on that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 83, nays 278, not voting 70, as follows:

THE BRIDGE ACROSS THE COLUMBIA RIVER AT ASTORIA, OREG.

Mr. MOTT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks on toll bridges.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oregon?

There was no objection.

Mr. MOTT. Mr. Speaker, I have just introduced a bill (H.R. 9436) creating the Oregon-Washington Bridge Commission, to which is to be transferred the authority to build the bridge across the Columbia River at Astoria which was authorized by the bill, S. 2545, which passed the House on April 5, and which has been signed by the President.

This Commission will have all the attributes of a public body that it is possible to give it. Its function will be to build, operate, and maintain the bridge, under the terms, conditions, and regulations provided in this bill, to create a sinking fund out of the proceeds of the tolls, to pay the bonds, and to deed the bridge upon the liquidation of the costs thereof to the States of Oregon and Washington.

I want to state very frankly that the purpose of making this Commission a public body is to facilitate the procuring of a loan from the Public Works Administration for the building of this bridge, and if this bill is passed we should not encounter a great deal of difficulty in that regard.

We had no difficulty whatever in procuring a loan from P.W.A. for the purpose of constructing the five bridges on the Oregon Coast Highway. These bridges, of course, are owned and are to be operated and maintained directly by the State of Oregon, and they were among the soundest projects anywhere in the United States for which P.W.A. loans were asked. It was for the purpose of putting out public money upon projects of this kind that P.W.A. was brought into existence, so that unemployment could be relieved as quickly as posssible and at the same time sound, self-liquidating public projects could be created.

I think I am correct in saying that every application made last year to the Public Works Administration for a loan to construct a State owned and operated toll bridge on a main State highway anywhere in the United States has been approved.

Now, while the Columbia River Bridge will not, in a technical sense, be a State-owned project to begin with, nevertheless, it is now as nearly that as we can make it. I hope, therefore, when this bill is reached on the Consent Calendar, it may, with this explanation, be speedily passed so as to give us the best opportunity possible in presenting this meritorious project to the Public Works Administration.

BRYAN MEMORIAL STATUE

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. Speaker, it is timely and appropriate, I believe, to bring to the attention of the Members of this House a short tribute to William Jennings Bryan, "the Peerless Leader" in whose honor and memory a statue was dedicated in the Capital City only late yesterday afternoon.

With several hundred other persons I stood in a drizzling rain during the addresses of President Franklin D. Roosevelt, Josephus Daniels, and other notables, as they spoke feelingly of this "prince of peace" whose voice was once heard as a Member of the House of Representatives following his election to the Fifty-second Congress at the age of 30 years.

Midway between the memorials of Abraham Lincoln and Robert E. Lee, at Constitution Avenue and Riverside Drive, was unveiled the bronze statue showing the crusader in speaking pose with his right arm lifted to the heavens. The sculptor was Gutzon Borglum. In speaking at the dedication yesterday he said:

> Man is finally chosen for the hall of fame for what he thinks and tries to do and not for the crown he wore.

As I left the impressive exercises, my eyes could see through the mists across the Potomac the shrine to Lee. I recalled the story about him which should be told and retold to every schoolboy in America. It is this:

At the close of the war between the States, Lee found himself a loser in a cause which he had thought right. His earthly goods had been swept away, and those who banded together in an infamous lottery enterprise came to him with an offer of $50,000 if he would allow his name to be used as one of the sponsors of their crooked scheme. He did not hesitate in his answer. He simply said:

> Gentlemen, I have nothing left but my name. It shall never be for sale.

That was a splendid answer for a defeated warrior with a lost cause behind him, and as we think of William Jennings Bryan today we can well say of "the Great Commoner" that he was a leader who stood for certain principles; and even though we may or may not agree with those ideas, yet we can well pay tribute to his sincerity and to the zeal and devotion with which he fought throughout his colorful and worth-while life.

President Roosevelt brought this out yesterday in his well-chosen remarks when he said:

> We can look back and scan his record without being able to point to any instance where he took a position that did not accord with his conscience or his belief. He did not have to dare to do what to him seemed right; he could not do otherwise.
> We can all agree that he fought the good fight, that he finished the course, that he kept the faith.

To the Membership of this House I submit the deep feeling and offer the thought that we should attempt in our services here to follow Bryan's course as outlined in one of his campaign speeches before his election to this body. In reply to a question as to what might be expected from him when the protection of the sugar-beet interests of his district were at stake, he replied:

> I will not vote in Congress to injure my own constituents for the benefit of others, nor will I vote to injure others for the benefit of my own constituents.

My colleagues, I offer the belief that the problems of this Nation will never be settled right until the hearts of its chosen spokesmen speak again and again, as did the heart of William Jennings Bryan, for the welfare of the great mass of the citizenry of our Republic.

THE TROUBLES OF A CONGRESSMAN

Mr. CARTWRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, so much has been said about the honor of being a Congressman, the prestige, social distinction, and pleasures supposed to be enjoyed by Members of Congress, that I think the other side should be pictured, too. I believe it is no more than right that while the whole Nation is pouring its trouble upon Congress, people should realize that Congressmen have their troubles, too; and that their path is not as rosy as many seem to think.

It is not my intention or desire to paint a pessimistic view of our life in Congress, for regardless of troubles, a Congressman is never willing to give up his seat to another unless he is ready to retire; but I want to mention a few things to show both sides of this so-called "honor and distinction", "society and life of ease" that we hear so much about every 2 years during campaign season.

CONTINUOUS OPPOSITION

Owing to the short 2-year term and the necessity for running for office every other year, a Congressman is forced to be a walking petition and a living prayer for votes. He does not have a chance to do his best work on legislative matters, because he is constantly being irritated and pecked at by sharp-beaked opponents. If it were possible for a new Congressman to accomplish anything worth while in the first few years he is in Washington, there might be some merit in electing a new one often; but since seniority counts for so much in Congress, people are just working against their own interests when they vote to unseat their Congressman.

About the time a serious, hard-working Congressman climbs the ladder of seniority to a point where he really has influence and can do some good for the people of his district, some fellow will come out against him with the declaration that "he has been there long enough, and it is now time to make a change." An experience of my own is even more humorous. About the time I was recently honored with the Chairmanship of the Committee on Roads in Congress a man possessed with speech-making proclivities came out against me declaring that "the people of the Third District need leadership up there." This fellow evidently did not stop to think that should he replace me he would have to start at the bottom of the ladder, and he would be extremely lucky if in 7 years he should be able to climb to the round of leadership that I hold today, which is ordinarily not achieved under 15 or 20 years of service.

FINANCIAL TROUBLES

People do not realize the many financial troubles Congressmen have. They look at the salary we used to get and think we should get rich. I thought that, too, before I was elected to Congress, but I do not think it now. All hotels and apartment houses in Washington boost their prices when Congress convenes and reduce them again the day after Congress adjourns. At the same time we have to keep up a home in our district, as the people expect us to return when Congress is not in session. It has been my practice to establish at my own expense a branch office each summer and fall in my home town, McAlester, for the convenience and accomodation of the people of my district. During this time I divide my office force, keeping one clerk in Washington and the other in McAlester. Of course, having only one room in the McAlester office, which is usually full of people, it is impossible for me to do much real work or dictate letters there, and I have actually been criticized for not spending my entire time in that office which I provide only for the accommodation of my constituents, with a clerk always there to assist them.

But I am speaking just now of a Congressman's expenses. During the busy seasons when Congress is in session I have always found it necessary to employ extra office help at my own expense to keep up with the tremendous amount of daily mail and departmental business. Besides this, my wife works regularly in my office at no expense to the Government. She understands me, knows my work, and the people I represent, and no one could take her place. She is not on the pay roll, and in order to make it possible for her to help me, I must pay a helper in our home out of my own pocket. To show the misconception some people have of this, a lady recently remarked to another as they passed our house in McAlester, "This is the Cartwright home, and just think, Mrs. Cartwright is in Washington on a big salary, playing society." As a matter of fact, there are no big salaries attached to my office, and Mrs. Cartwright does not draw a cent for her services. The most amusing charge was "playing society." A Congressman and his wife seldom find time to attend social functions after the first term or two in Washington. Up to that time he has little influence and cannot do much anyway, so he usually attends all the receptions, teas, and dinners in the catalog. I could count on the fingers of one hand the social functions my wife and I have attended in Washington this year.

But to get back to the expenses a Congressman must bear: He is expected to belong to every club and lodge in his home town, and contribute to all the churches, charitable institutions, and other organizations in his district. I pay out a fair salary each month in dues and donations, besides the great expense that comes in campaigning every 2 years, which is a constant drain.

Because of the fact that Congress is always in session up to the primary election, a Congressman cannot make a personal campaign, so it is quite necessary for him to advertise in all the papers, pay the Government printing charges of his speeches in Congress to send out over the district, provide campaign literature, and sometimes pay people to campaign for him. The last method I have not indulged in much, because, first, I do not have the money to pay them, and, second, I usually get into trouble when I do. People will ask a Congressman for a certain amount of "expense money" to work for him, then after he gives them a liberal amount of expense money and does not follow that up with a major job, they get sore and work against him in the next campaign. I have in mind a certain man whom I scarcely knew until after I had won my first nomination. He declared he had worked hard for me and so impressed my friends to the extent that they asked me to make him my secretary. I offered the place to him, but after a month's thought over the matter he declined on the ground that the salary was not big enough. Time went on, and my race 2 years ago came up. He was out of work, and a mutual friend wrote me and suggested that I employ him to do some campaigning for me. I finally borrowed the money and employed him along with two or three others. As a result he wanted the post office, one of the largest in my district. As we never know who will make the eligible list, I suggested that due to the uncertainty of the post office, he accept another position I was able to get for him. He declined because he wanted nothing but the post office. He failed to make the eligible list, so now he is out fighting me.

Such are the financial troubles of a Congressman, with his salary gone at the end of the year, and a lot of sore spots to boot.

JOBS AND POST OFFICES

Speaking of jobs and post offices, these are the ruination of Congressmen. We have only a few jobs to offer and over 50,000 voters. In many cases an applicant for a job seems to think he is the only friend a Congressman has. At any rate, when we have 15 applicants for a certain job and 1 gets it, the other 14 usually go out fighting us. The Civil Service Commission trims the list of post-office applicants to not more than three, nevertheless they blame the Congressman for not getting on the eligible list. With all my many duties, if I had little enough sense to try to interfere with the Civil Service Commission in making up the eligible lists for the 270 post offices in my district, even if I could, I ought to be defeated for lack of brains. After an eligible list is certified it is the duty of a Congressman to make his recommendation, but even then he must recognize the county and precinct endorsements of the party in power. Regardless of which applicant stems the tide of all these limitations and secures the office, the others nearly always go out fighting the Congressman.

LETTER WRITING

Members of Congress are always criticized for writing letters. How are we expected to run our offices if we do not try to answer and handle through the departments the hundreds of letters and requests we receive from constituents every day? I have received in my office so many letters, requests, and petitions relating to everything imaginable that I find it utterly impossible to make proper reply to them all. If it were physically possible, every letter, telegram, and petition would have a personal reply. I lose many hours of sleep laboring until the wee hours of morning and pondering over the problem of how to dispose of so much work, and at the same time try to take care of a campaign 1,500 miles away.

The Federal Government has taken on so many new duties that it has materially handicapped a Congressman as a legislator. He does not have time to properly study legislation, prepare bills, or make speeches. He is kept busy 95 percent of his time answering letters and calling on different departments of Government. For example, if someone is not satisfied with a code, they take it up with the Congressman; if they are not satisfied with the P.W.A. set-up or any other form of relief work, they take it up with the Congressman; if they want a C.C.C. camp, they take it up with the Congressman; if a member of the C.C.C. camp gets 2 pairs of pants when he thinks he should have had 3, he takes it up with the Congressman; if the patrons of a fourth-class post office want the postmaster removed, which is strictly civil service, they take it up with the Congressman; if anybody wants a job of any kind in any part of the United States, he usually takes it up with the Congressman. Despite all this, opponents are constantly in the field—for they have plenty of time, and some of them on the taxpayers' money—criticizing us for "writing so many letters." Could anything be more absurd, inconsistent, and ridiculous?

FEDERAL PROJECTS SECURED

Charges are being made by opponents that no Federal projects have been secured for my district since I have been in Congress. Such statements are either utterances of colossal ignorance or willful and malicious misrepresentations. I need only to name a few Federal projects secured within the last year or two to show the fallacy of such a statement:

The Red River Bridge near Durant; Lake Murray in Carter and Love Counties; C.C.C. camps at Stapp, Talihina, Muse, Smithville, Wilburton, Battiest, Eagletown, Broken Bow, and Ardmore, and one recently in McAlester; C.W.A. airports established at Hugo, Durant, McAlester, Heavener, Poteau, Talihina, and Ardmore; road projects too numerous to mention; applications for P.W.A. funds recently approved for a courthouse at Antlers; for schools in Pittsburg County; for waterworks and schools in Durant; and schools at Brock and Kemp. We are expecting P.W.A. approval for a gas project at Atoka and Stringtown and have hopes of getting others. There have been more C.C.C. camps and C.W.A. airports established in my district than in any other district in the State, and yet my opponents say I have "done nothing" for my district. The fact is the real duties of a Congressman are to make laws and appropriations for the Nation as a whole, and it is more the duty of such citizens as certain district judges and county attorneys, who boast of leadership, influence, and power, to look after these local matters. Instead of that those fellows are spending their time out running against me on the taxpayers' money, while I remain on the job fighting for and securing these projects and other things for the Third District. They never mention the important bills I have secured passage of, the many claims I have put through for ex-service men and others in my district, nor any other good I may have done. Such acknowledgment would defeat their purpose.

A MULTITUDE OF DUTIES

To mention a few of my legislative duties, I am Chairman of the Committee on Roads (the only chairmanship held by any Congressman from Oklahoma), I am Acting Chairman of the War Claims Committee, Vice Chairman of the Indian Affairs Committee, and ranking member on two other committees. With so much important legislation passing through all of these committees, the battles of which I must either lead or help fight on the floor of the House; other measures to study and vote on; the unemployment situation to deal with; farm, industrial, and school problems pressing for attention; inflation, stock market, the tariff, ex-service legislation; and many other matters of national importance before us; together with post offices, departmental work, and other things previously mentioned, a Congressman who takes his duties seriously and works at the job is completely swamped. It is no wonder 32 Congressmen died during the last Congress from overwork and nervous strain as diagnosed by physicians, including 2 members ahead of me on the Roads Committee, leaving me the chairmanship of that important committee before my time. Not such an encouraging outlook, is it? Yet my opponents are making great promises of what they will do, and complain that I have done nothing.

MISREPRESENTATIONS AND POLITICAL CHICANERY

Such are the troubles of a Congressman, but I like my work and have no complaint to make except for the misrepresentations and the fact that I am being used as a target back home in all sorts of political chicanery manipulated by opponents in an effort to defeat me. It is not pleasant to hear of their game of filing six candidates from all parts of the district to force me into a run-off; of their agitating post-office troubles, and of false charges being made either privately or in public speeches that I voted to raise my own salary, that my wife plays society and I have her on the Government pay roll, that the Choctaws and Chickasaws have lots of money and should have a per capita payment, that I do nothing for my district but write letters. Such unjust and unfounded charges, together with many others going on in my district while I am on the job in Washington, 1,500 miles away, laboring 16 hours a day, is enough to kill a man with nervous prostration.

And yet they say a Congressman gets a big salary and lives a life of ease and luxury. The Lord forgive them, for they know not what they say!

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. BULWINKLE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 3 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina?

There was no objection.

Mr. BULWINKLE. Mr. Speaker, this afternoon the Chairman of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce made the statement that in the committee I had done more to emasculate this bill than probably anyone on the committee. I am sorry the gentleman from Texas is not in the Chamber. That was in executive session, and I take it that no man, be he chairman or member, has the right to say what happened in executive session. But unfortunately the statement was not correct, and I suppose that he will correct this statement. But this is immaterial to me.

It is true that when the first bill came in I did help to emasculate it; I did my full part toward improving it, and some others did their full part, too; there is no question about that. It is equally true that I attempted to perfect as much as possible the bill that finally came out of the committee. I think every member of the committee knows that I did nothing out of order, nothing which some of the others did not do themselves.

In justice to myself I think I should make this statement, because I have made it a rule when serving on a committee of Congress to pass upon the proposed legislation that comes before the commitee. I intend in the future, as I have done in the past, to try to perfect the legislation both in the committee and the House. That is part of my responsibility, and I intend to do it regardless of all the innuendoes and threats that may come at any time. [Applause.]

Mr. COLE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BULWINKLE. I yield.

Mr. COLE. As a member of the committee I may say to the gentleman from North Carolina that his service on the committee, so far as I have observed it, has been most helpful. I have no doubt that some of the suggestions the gentleman made in executive session might be construed by the chairman as he interpreted them this afternoon; but I know the gentleman has acted with entire good faith.

Mr. BULWINKLE. I thank the gentleman. When I serve on a committee I intend to do my duty as I see it.

Mr. PETTENGILL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BULWINKLE. I yield.

Mr. PETTENGILL. I would like to say in behalf of the gentleman that while at times there were some disagreements between various members of the committee, my friend, the gentleman from North Carolina, was at all times actuated by the highest and most patriotic motives in everything that he did.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's desk the bill (H.R. 5950) to amend an act entitled "An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States", approved July 1, 1898, and acts amendatory thereof and supplementary thereto, with Senate amendments, disagree to the Senate amendments and agree to the conference asked by the Senate.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

The Chair appointed the following conferees: Mr. SUMNERS, Mr. MONTAGUE, Mr. MCKEOWN, Mr. KURTZ, and Mr. PERKINS.

OUR NATIONAL PLAYGROUNDS

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include therein an address by Horace M. Albright concerning the national parks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Colorado?

There was no objection.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include an exceptionally interesting and informative radio address of Horace M. Albright, former director of the National Park Service, at New York, April 14, 1934.

I have often expressed my sincere appreciation of the character and effective work of Mr. Albright in behalf of our parks and monuments. The history of our national parks will forever pay a grateful tribute to the long, patriotic, and splendidly efficient services of Stephen T. Mather and Horace M. Albright in developing our great national-park system and creating our superb National Park Service that is one of the prides of our country and is the admiration of all the visitors from every nation in the world.

The address is as follows:

REMINISCENCES OF PARKS AND PEOPLE

There are folks from Indiana,
There are folks from Idaho,
There are folks from Maine to California,
There are folks from North to Mexico.

Thus visitors to the national parks sing about themselves around the camp fires and in the community halls, and thus I found them during the 20 years I spent in the National Park Service of the Department of the Interior; and thus President Harding found them as he held an impromptu reception at Old Faithful while visiting the Yellowstone in 1923, just a month before his death. His guests were asked to name their home States as they shook his hand. They represented every State in the Union. As the reception proceeded, the President time and again turned to me and said, "Here is a cross section of America." The privilege of meeting these cross sections of America, of mingling with folks from the lowly home to the great mansion year after year makes my memories of parks and people the richest reward of my long public service.

Folks came to the national parks then, as they do now, by train, by automobile, horseback, or afoot, and sought the accommodations most suited to their tastes or their pocketbooks—the comfortable hotel, the lodge with its well-equipped cabins, even de luxe cabins with bath, the public auto camp where they pitched their own tents, or, if not outfitted for camping, where they rented furnished tents or cabins and cooked their own meals or resorted to the convenient cafeterias. Our park guests were always resourceful and soon adapted themselves to the living conditions best suited to their tastes and purses.

I remember seeing a Massachusetts car one day. It was a well-known car of a very ancient vintage and was driven by two young ladies. I asked them if they had driven all the way from Massachusetts. They said they were school teachers out to see America first and had come all the way from New England without any trouble whatever. They added that they did not even know what was under the hood of the car. I expressed surprise that they had such a perfect experience, and then one said, "Oh, yes, we did have trouble finding hay one night." I remarked that I understood that even their car used gasoline. They replied that it did, but that they had not taken a mattress and depended on hay for a bed, and one night they could not beg or steal any hay.

Then there was the middle-western farmer who came in an improvised house built on a truck. In the house rode four of his children; on the seat beside him, his wife and 6-month-old baby; and on the running board in a wired crate a goat. He explained to me that the baby had a very delicate stomach and that only goat's milk agreed with him. If the trip was to be made, the goat had to go along.

Our visiting folks were of all ages, some over 90, some very young. One day we were passing a car parked on the side of the road and heard a baby cry. A mother was holding an infant in her arms. My wife spoke to the mother and said, "That sounds like the cry of a very young child." "Yes," she replied, "the baby is just 2 weeks old today." And what's more, that family had come all the way from Nebraska.

Occasionally a child was born during the vacation of its mother in a national park. We always had a few advanced medical students serving as temporary rangers in remote sections of the parks distant from the hospitals just to be on hand to greet these excessively young visitors.

Going to the other extreme, we have one friend over 90 years of age who visits the national parks every summer, and he told me the other day that he is going again this year, and moreover, he is going to travel once more the Old Oregon Trail through Nebraska, Wyoming, and Idaho. He is William H. Jackson, who was in the Battle of Gettysburg, and who in 1871 made the first pictures ever taken in Yellowstone and Grand Teton National Parks.

It was great fun to visit the hotels, lodges, and camp grounds in the national parks and talk with folks. It was interesting to hear the man from Maine talking with the man from Kansas, each getting the other's point of view, and becoming better Americans with better understanding of broad national problems. We Park Service men were always sure that if enough of our people would travel about their own country and stay a while in the national parks each year, mingling with each other on common ground, and thus getting first-hand information on conditions in all parts of this far-flung Nation of ours, most of our economic problems would be much more easily solved.

Usually, folks in the national parks exchange ideas only at night around the campfire or on the porches of the lodges. During the day they walk, ride, or fish, or devote themselves to natural history studies or the pursuit of some other special outdoor interest under the guidance, perhaps, of national park naturalists, a most delightful way to pass vacation hours in the open. I don't know where a Park Service man could get more pleasure and satisfaction than in spending an evening in a camp ground. Go through early and see trout cooking in a hundred frying pans, then come around later and hear the tales of how the fish were caught. We are all liars about fish around a campfire, and the yarns grow taller and longer as the fires die to embers. Listen, too, to the campfire stories of bears. Occasionally some fellow will tell a bear story, and how the bear bit him. I always felt these bear-bitten fellows were prouder than the fishermen. They had a minor scar on a finger to show as long as they live, and their stories of the conflict with the big bad bear always grew faster and bigger than the fishermen's yarns. Let me give my listeners this word of advice: Don't worry about national park bears. Follow a few simple rules, especially the one about not feeding bears from the hand and they will give you worlds of pleasure and not a bit of a bite of harm. They are under Government control more completely than our New York stock-market bears will be under the new stock exchange law.

Every normal American wants to visit the national parks; the same can be said of most foreigners who visit our shores, because the fame of this magnificent park system has spread around the world. Kings, princes, maharajahs, ambassadors, and ministers, as well as commoners from abroad, upon arriving in the United States have Yellowstone, Grand Canyon, Yosemite, and other parks on their lists of places to see. Royalty checks its dignity at park gates and becomes folks for awhile. In 1926 I took Crown Prince Gustav Adolf, of Sweden, to the summit of Mount Washburn in Yellowstone to photograph mountain sheep and saw him wiggle and crawl on his tummy in the damp rocky ground for several hundred yards while stalking the noble bighorn, which he did successfully. The late King Albert, of the Belgians, in 1919 visited Yosemite and Grand Canyon National Parks. One of the old-time rangers was detailed to accompany him on a long horseback trip. The ranger was coached as to the words he should use in addressing the King, but he got confused and finally said to the King, "I forgot what they told me to say to you, but suppose you call me 'Billy', and I'll call you 'King.'" King Albert had a rare sense of humor and henceforth it was just Billy and King.

Marshall Foch visited several national parks after the war. On the rim of the Grand Canyon he remarked to his National Park Service companion, "What a place to bring a mother-in-law!"

Presidents Arthur, Theodore Roosevelt, Harding, and Coolidge all visited Yellowstone while they were occupants of the White House. I had the honor of acting as host for the latter two and for President Hoover, also, but while he was Secretary of Commerce. One day, while walking with President Coolidge near the site of President Roosevelt's camp of 1903, Mr. Coolidge asked me to point out the exact spot where his predecessor had camped with the great naturalist, John Burroughs. As I described the site with a sweep of my arm and finger, he turned to me and remarked, "I have his camp in Washington now", meaning, of course, the White House. A day or two later I took Mrs. Coolidge and John, their son, on a trip to the Jackson Hole country south of Yellowstone, where the Grand Teton National Park has since been established. Around a turn in the road a man had stationed his wife to stop our automobile so he could get a picture. As he snapped the picture he looked up and saw that the President was missing. As we started the car, he shouted, "Where you got him?" Mrs. Coolidge gayly answered, "We haven't got him, we left him home." Then she laughingly said to us, "I wonder where he thought we had him—under the seat?" The next week's issue of the little Jackson Hole Courier, one of the most unique newspapers in America, had the following item—this and no more: "Mrs. Calvin Coolidge and John Coolidge were visitors in town last Wednesday."

I was always glad to see Senators and Congressmen visit the national parks, for two reasons: First, because they were splendid people and good sports as a rule. If they were not far above the average they would not be in the Capitol at Washington. Second, because their first-hand knowledge of park needs made it easier for us to present our requests for appropriations and other legislation. I never failed to urge my congressional friends to bring their wives because the women folks talk about the parks at home, and ask the men what they are going to do about park problems, whereas, too often the men after leaving the parks get interested in other things and forget our far more important park matters.

Once I had a large congressional party in Yellowstone. It was in charge of the late James W. Good. Yellowstone's roads were terribly dusty and the water sprinkling was of little value. We wanted Congress to adopt an oiling program, but every night while the committee was in the park it rained and the roads were perfect. Nevertheless, every day I told of the dust menace and urged the improvement, but the Congressmen only laughed, and some Member would say, "Albright's going to tell his old dusty-road story again." Another year I met a subcommittee of the House Appropriations Committee at the Grand Canyon National Park. Congressman, now United States Senator, CARL HAYDEN was with the party when they reached the park. Here, again, we had a problem of terrible roads. The committee had not had much sleep the night before arrival, due to changing trains, and when I took them over the worst road in the park they went to sleep on me. I bounced them into every rut and hole I could find, but even then I had to shake them to wake them up. For a long time they contended that the road was a boulevard, but finally authorized the improvement desired. On the same trip Congressman Cramton, of Michigan, for years the stalwart champion of national parks, saw a camper stop his car near the Grand Canyon Park office. He went over to him seeking information about the conduct of the park. The tourist gave him a vigorous denunciation of the roads in the park, and Mr. Cramton always claimed that I planted the camper there to trap him.

When this congressional party was at the Grand Canyon, it was decided that the trails in the canyon should be inspected, because it was the opinion of the National Park Service officers that they ought to be pretty largely rebuilt in order to make them safer for the ever-increasing throngs who were going into the canyon on horseback. We went down the Bright Angel Trail on a bright, sunny morning, and after reaching the Tonto Plateau, which is a relatively flat area, Senator HAYDEN dropped the reins on the neck of his mule, and with a flourish, jerked his handkerchief out of his pocket with one hand and his horn-rimmed glasses with the other. His mule, out of the corner of his eye, saw the flash of the handkerchief and began to buck. Four times he went into the air with violent pitches, hitting the ground stiff legged. The Senator, who was an old cowboy and a good one, stayed with the mule on the first three pitches, but he hit the ground after the fourth pitch. The mule fell down, and the Senator went off landing on his head in a sage brush which had been cut with an ax close to the roots. His very sparsely covered scalp was terribly cut and bruised, and he was covered with blood and dirt when I, who rode immediately behind him, reached him. I asked him if he were hurt, but he anxiously inquired about his mule. The mule stood by, looking at him. The Senator was too dazed to see him. Again and again he asked about the mule in answer to my question about his own condition. Finally he regained his senses and was satisfied with the condition of the mule, which was not hurt in the least. The Senator had to stay in the canyon for several days until his wounds healed. He was so badly scratched that he did not want anyone to see him, particularly his wife.

United States Senator PETER NORBECK, of South Dakota, founder of the great Custer State Park in the Black Hills, is the foremost park expert in Congress today. To fool me, he once registered at Yellowstone as a well-digger, which he is in private life.

I know many Cabinet officers and assistant secretaries of the great executive departments at Washington. Generally speaking, they enjoyed outdoor life and were easy to please. They were all extremely conscientious in considering national-park problems, and the National Park Service owes much to their wise decisions and strong support. I had the honor of serving under seven Secretaries of the Interior, from Franklin K. Lane, the high-minded practical idealist who brought his old college friend Stephen T. Mather to Washington and with him established the National Park Service and started it on its remarkable career of public achievement, to Harold L. Ickes, the present vigorous, courageous Secretary who, under President Franklin D. Roosevelt's reorganization plan, has greatly expanded the National Park Service to include many historical parks and monuments and the parks and parkways in the District of Columbia. Secretary Ickes has ridden the trails of Yellowstone and Glacier National Parks on horseback and knows from experience what the American people will see if they act on his advice to make 1934 a national-park year.

Judge John Barton Payne, now head of the American Red Cross, was especially interested in national parks and before going to Washington had been for many years head of the South Park Commission of Chicago. He helped us cut red tape and go places and do things.

In February 1921 we were fighting a bill to authorize a dam at the outlet of Lake Yellowstone. Secretary Payne was on the stand before the Senate Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation and was vigorously opposing the bill. Senator Gooding, of Idaho, delivered an impassioned speech directed at the Secretary warning him that if he did not withdraw his opposition and let the bill pass he would endanger the food supply of our country. In closing, the Senator shouted at the Secretary, "What do you say to that?" Secretary Payne looked up and drawled, "Well, Senator, there is a heap more in this world than three meals a day."

Dr. Hubert Work, when Secretary of the Interior, urged the establishment of more eastern national parks, and the Great Smoky Mountains National Park in North Carolina and Tennessee, Shenandoah in Virginia, and Mammoth Cave in Kentucky were all authorized as a result of his activities. Secretary Work and Gov. John S. Fisher, of Pennsylvania, were with me in Yellowstone when in 1927 a friend telephoned me President Coolidge's famous message, "I do not choose to run in 1928", which I promptly delivered to my guests. I must confess that the Secretary and the Governor did not enjoy the scenery that afternoon. They worked steadily on the problem of analyzing the word "choose."

Secretary Albert B. Fall, in the autumn of 1921, wanted to take a rough camping trip with pack train as far away from roads as he could get in a reasonable time. We gave it to him, and there were no tables, chairs, mattresses, or other comforts. He rode a cow pony on a jog trot, and insisted that all his guests, some six or eight men, keep up with him. This was easy for the Secretary and the National Park Service men, but the guests, who were unaccustomed to the saddle, had to eat supper lying flat on their backs, for we had even omitted to include shelves in our outfit.

Secretary Ray Lyman Wilbur and I traveled many hundreds of miles together on our inspections of the national parks and monuments. He was tremendously interested in our park affairs, and before coming to Washington he had served for years on the California State Park Commisison, which did such splendid work in saving the coast redwoods . Secretary Wilbur is a great "yarn-spinner" and is one of the best campers and fishermen I know. Once when he came into camp with a fine string of trout and was asked by less fortunate friends why he was so lucky, he replied, "I study the habits of trout."

Governors are frequent park visitors and they, too, are always welcome because there are so many ways in which they and their associated State officers can cooperate with the National Park Service especially in fish and game problems, and approach road improvement. One day, Gov. Joe Dixon of Montana, one of the finest personalities in public life, visited the Yellowstone with Mrs. Dixon and three of his daughters. We invited the Governor and his family to take luncheon with us, but he said they had to move on at once to Old Faithful, which was 50 miles away. Some 5 hours later the Governor came to my office and asked for help in locating a missing daughter. He had searched all afternoon and could not find her. A ranger soon located her at the transportation company's garage where she was helping wash a bus. Her college boy friend was a bus driver and it was his day to wash busses. The only way they could visit was at the wash rack working together, and what was a Governor's itinerary compared to that precious visit of a young college couple.

My radio friends, I am going to take Secretary Ickes' advice and join the throng of folks who will visit the national parks this year. I am going to lovely Acadia Park in Maine, to Rocky Mountain in Colorado, to Carlsbad Caverns in New Mexico, and several national monuments in the Southwest and I hope I can get in a few days on a dude ranch.

If I can, I want to travel awhile with my friend, Dr. Frank Castler, who each summer spends 3 months in the national parks away from professional duties gathering new material for his collection of park photographs, already the finest private collection in existence.

The whole country is rapidly recovering from the depression and folks everywhere need rest and relaxation. Right now is the time to plan trips. Railroad rates were never so low and train service never so luxurious. I usually travel by train both to save time and to have an opportunity to see the country; that is the way I am going to travel this year. It is very easy, however, to drive out to the national parks in one's own car for the roads are perfect.

So I suggest that none of us stand upon the order of our going—that we just go.

GENERAL PULASKI

Mr. PETTENGILL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to make a brief announcement.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

There was no objection.

Mr. PETTENGILL. Mr. Speaker, I wish to announce to the House that the Speaker has agreed to recognize me on Monday to move the immediate consideration of Senate Joint Resolution No. 36 requesting the President of the United States to call for the observance of October 11, 1934, in celebration of the anniversary of the death of General Pulaski. This is a resolution that has often been presented to the House and passed, and I trust that it will meet with no opposition on Monday.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES—MACE OF THE PARLIAMENT OF UPPER CANADA, OR ONTARIO (H.DOC. NO. 357)

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States, which was read and referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs and ordered printed:

To the Congress of the United States:

During the War of 1812 the mace of the Parliament of Upper Canada, or Ontario, was taken by United States forces at the time of the battle of York, April 27, 1813. That mace, which had been the symbol of legislative authority at York (now Toronto) since 1792, has been preserved in the United States Naval Academy at Annapolis.

On July 4, 1934, there is to be unveiled in Toronto a memorial tablet erected by the United States Daughters of 1812 to the memory of General Pike and others of the United States forces who were killed in action. The mayor and council of Toronto are providing the site for the memorial.

The suggestion has been made that it would be a gracious act for the United States to return this historic mace to Canada at the time of the unveiling of the tablet.

The mace is a token of representative government, established at York nearly a century and a half ago. It symbolizes the orderly rule of such government in Canada, continuing from that day to this.

Since the agreement of 1817, the two countries have by common accord maintained no hostile armaments on either side of their boundary; and every passing year cements the peace and friendship between the peoples of Canada and the United States.

I heartily recommend to the favorable consideration of the Congress the enactment of a joint resolution authorizing the return of the mace to the Canadian Government.

This Executive order amends Executive Order No. 6567, January 19, 1934 (Veterans' Regulation No. 9 (b)).

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

SATURDAY, MAY 5, 1934

The House was called to order at 12 o'clock noon by Hon. South Trimble, Clerk of the House, who read the following letter from the Speaker:

MAY 5, 1934.

I hereby designate Hon. WILLIAM W. ARNOLD to act as Speaker pro tempore today.

HENRY T. RAINEY, Speaker.

Mr. ARNOLD assumed the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D.D., offered the following prayer:

O God and Father of our spirits, bend low over all hearts and lift upward the fragments of our humanity. Let us hear Thy beating heart as we breathe: "Emanuel, God with us." Heavenly Father, we pray that the Divine One may form Himself in every soul. Hold us all to that deep and abiding realization that it behooves us to be watchful, energetic, and enthusiastic in the devoted service of our country. Almighty God, the Creator of heaven and earth, human nature in its needs and emotions is one. The heart speaks a language that is heard everywhere and the voice of the soul makes every tongue immortal. O let the whole earth come to its ripeness and more and more may it learn to love and obey Thy laws. Keep it back from the sins of violence, of cruelty, greed, and avarice. Bind every section of our country together in the bonds of brotherhood and may the peaceful victories of all industry lay a crown of rejoicing on the brow of the Republic. In the name of our Elder Brother. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Monday is suspension day. The Speaker has given the present occupant of the chair a list of the bills that may be called up on Monday under suspension of the rules. Without objection, the Chair will have the Clerk read them for the information of the House.

The Clerk read as follows:

H.R. 6803. A bill to regulate the distribution, promotion, retirement, and discharge of commissioned officers of the Marine Corps, and for other purposes.—Mr. VINSON of Georgia.

H.R. 9068. A bill to provide for promotion by selection in the line of the Navy in the grades of lieutenant commander and lieutenant; to authorize appointment as ensigns in the line of the Navy all midshipmen who hereafter graduate from the Naval Academy, and for other purposes.—Mr. VINSON of Georgia.

H.R. 7290. A bill authorizing the President to present a gold medal to George M. Cohan.—Mr. PEYSER.

H.J.Res. 317. Joint resolution requesting the President of the United States of America to proclaim May 20, 1934, General La Fayette Memorial Day for the observance and commemoration of the one hundredth anniversary of the death of General La Fayette.—Mr. CONDON.

S.J.Res. 36. Joint resolution authorizing the President of the United States of America to proclaim October 11, 1934, General Pulaski's Memorial Day for the observance and commemoration of the death of Brig. Gen. Casimir Pulaski.—Mr. SUMNERS of Texas.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS], the majority leader, made the request of me that we give unanimous consent to the consideration at this time of the so-called "crime bills" from the Judiciary Committee. It was generally understood that no other business would be presented to the House today, and with this understanding I have told a good many men who are not specially interested in these matters that they might be away. I hope no one will make any unanimous-consent requests for the consideration of other matters, because it will be necessary to object on account of this general understanding.

Mr. BULWINKLE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNELL. I yield.

Mr. BULWINKLE. The gentleman from New York is correct. The majority leader stated he had made an agreement with the minority leader that only the crime bills would be taken up today.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I have talked with our distinguished Speaker, as well as our able and accommodating majority leader, about a small but very important bill here in connection with the great Chicago Exposition. This is not the appropriation bill, but is a bill giving the Treasury Department the right to permit exhibits which are here only for this purpose, to come in free of duty. The fair will be opened on the 26th instant. A great many of these exhibits are now in the warehouses and cannot be released. It is absolutely necessary that this should be done and done promptly. This is customary in all such matters and there is, I believe, no opposition to the measure. There is a unanimous and favorable report from the Ways and Means Committee.

Mr. SNELL. Let me say to the gentleman that so far as his bill is concerned I am for it, but that measure has been around here for a long time and if we are going to make a program and stick to it we will have to follow it from the beginning and I shall have to object to the consideration of that bill the same as I am going to object to any other matter that was not included in the agreement between the gentleman from Tennessee and myself about the program for today.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman from Illinois yield?

Mr. SABATH. I yield.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman says all these exhibits are in the warehouses awaiting release.

Mr. SABATH. Many of the new exhibits; yes.

Mr. BLANTON. Are the streets of Paris exhibits in warehouses?

Mr. SABATH. No. We do not need to import them. I had no idea that the gentleman from Texas is interested in the streets of Paris. On the other hand, it seems to me that he should realize that exhibits that are exhibited in the streets of Paris could and would not stay stored in any warehouse. Not only that, we did not need to import exhibits of that character, as I am satisfied that they have nothing in Paris or anywhere else that would excel our own exhibits in charms or beauty, and therefore no importations are necessary. Though I myself have made no personal investigation of these exhibits, if the gentleman from Texas or any other Members desire to see real works of art and the latest in important matters of great and elevating interest, I hope they will not miss this year's great exhibit at our fair, as I have the dependable assurance that it will far excel the greatness of last year's fair in every respect.

Mr. BLANTON. Usually I am in hearty accord with my good friend from Illinois [Mr. SABATH]. He is an able, earnest, energetic legislator here and never overlooks an opportunity to be of service to Chicago and to Illinois. I am willing for Chicago to carry on her splendid and instructive exposition for another year, but I am against the proposal to appropriate an additional $405,000 out of the Public Treasury to assist in the enterprise. I will assist my friend in every possible way to help Chicago get started this year, so long as it does not cost the Government anything. But I will never agree to appropriate the $405,000.

KILLING OR ASSAULTING OF FEDERAL OFFICERS

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, under the special order given by unanimous consent, by direction of the Committee on the Judiciary, the first bill on the calendar, which I desire to call up, is the bill (S. 2080) to provide punishment for killing or assaulting Federal officers.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That whoever shall murder or otherwise kill any civil official, inspector, agent, or other officer or employee of the United States engaged in the performance of his official duties, or on account of the performance of his official duties, shall be punished as provided under section 275 of the Criminal Code.

SEC. 2. Whoever shall forcibly resist, oppose, impede, intimidate, or interfere with any civil official, inspector, agent, or other officer or employee of the United States engaged in the performance of his official duties, or shall assault him on account of the performance of his official duties, shall be fined not more than $5,000, or imprisoned not more than 3 years, or both; and whoever, in the commission of any of the acts described in this section, shall use a deadly or dangerous weapon shall be fined not more than $10,000, or imprisoned not more than 10 years, or both.

With the following committee amendments:

Page 1, line 3, after the word "otherwise", strike out the words "kill any civil official, inspector, agent, or other officer or employee of the United States" and insert in lieu thereof the following: "kill, as defined in sections 273 and 274 of the Criminal Code, any United States marshal or deputy United States marshal, special agent of the Division of Investigation of the Department of Justice, post-office inspector, secret-service operative, any officer or enlisted man of the Coast Guard, or any employee of any United States penal or correctional institution, while".

On page 2, line 4, strike out the words "civil official, inspector, agent, or other officer or employee of the United States" and insert in lieu thereof "person—designated in section 1 hereof while".

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, it seems that the language and purpose of the bill are sufficiently disclosed by the reading of it and the committee amendments and no further explanation is required. We have a very considerable number of these bills that we hope will be finally passed in the House today.

Mr. HASTINGS and Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri rose.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I yield first to the gentleman from Oklahoma.

Mr. HASTINGS. At the end of section 1 there is a provision that the party shall be punished as provided under section 275 of the Criminal Code. I have not had an opportunity to look this up. What is the punishment that is provided under the Criminal Code?

Mr. OLIVER of New York. Mr. Speaker, if my colleague will yield, section 273 defines murder and section 274 defines manslaughter, and the punishment for the murder or manslaughter of a Federal officer is the same punishment as that now provided.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. The committee has stricken out the Senate language in reference to Government employees and has substituted the language certain officials enumerated in the bill?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Yes.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. The language of the House amendment leaves out a great many Government employees engaged in duties that are extremely dangerous.

Now, the employees of the intelligence unit in the Bureau of Internal Revenue who are after gangsters and racketeers, who put Capone and others where they are, you offer no protection. Nor do I see where you offer protection for the immigration officials and others.

Mr. MILLER. I think the objection of the gentleman is answered by the present law. I refer the gentleman to the letter of the Attorney General which he will find included in the report. You will find that practically all the parties the gentleman named have that protection now by existing law. The purpose of limiting those to which the bill would apply is to try and get around the set-up.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. May I suggest to the gentleman from Missouri that the Committee on the Judiciary went thoroughly into this matter. Considering existing law and what is the purpose of this bill, the committee felt that this was as far as the Federal Government should go in undertaking to withdraw exclusive jurisdiction from the State courts.

Under existing activities of the Federal Government there are numerous employees which the Judiciary Committee felt it was not necessary to bring under Federal protection as distinguished from State protection.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. As I read the letter of the Attorney General, I find other employees are covered by the existing law. Therefore I have no objection to the bill. I simply desired to strengthen it. I thank the gentlemen for their information.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. As I said, the committee, after full consideration and consultation with the agents of the Government, felt that this bill was as far as we could go.

Mr. SHANNON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I yield.

Mr. SHANNON. There is an attempt here to change in section 2 the provision that exists making what has heretofore been a misdemeanor a felony. There never was an officer who was charged with the duty of serving civil process who did not meet with resistance of some kind. The procedure has been to prosecute the offenders under the statute for resisting an officer when serving a process. That has been a misdemeanor. There is no officer who has had experience in serving processes but that has met resistance from someone. Sometimes a woman locks the door or throws a skillet. It is all right about the committee giving close consideration to this, but the change, making it a felony, as is done in this section, it seems to me is going too far. It is all up to the discretion of the judge whether he will sentence the woman to the penitentiary or fine her up to $5,000, but it is a felony just the same. I think that is a very severe penalty.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Yes.

Mr. DOWELL. I call the attention of the gentleman to the committee amendment on the first page of the bill. I note that the amendment clearly defines each person convicted, and then, in line 9, it uses the phrase "secret-service operatives." These are all Federal officers, and I am wondering if this is construed to be a Federal service operative and, if so, should not the language be inserted to make it definite?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I do not believe it is necessary to insert it. We are dealing with Federal officers.

Mr. DOWELL. The language used in this instance does not indicate who these operatives are. I merely call attention of the chairman to that fact, and I think, if it referred definitely to Federal officers, it would be clearer.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Yes.

Mr. MONTAGUE. What jurisdiction would the United States Government have with respect to anybody else except Federal officers?

Mr. DOWELL. They would have none.

Mr. MONTAGUE. We could not legislate with respect to anyone else, and, therefore, there is nothing here but United States Secret Service officers. I agree with the gentleman that it should apply to them, but we cannot legislate about anybody else than United States officers.

Mr. RUFFIN. Mr. Speaker, referring to the inquiry of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SHANNON], my understanding is that by reason of the fact that it does not specify the offense as being a felony or a misdemeanor, whether it is a felony or a misdemeanor would be determined by the penalty actually imposed. In other words, the criminal could be fined from $1 up to $5,000. If he were fined $1, it would be only a misdemeanor. It would be determined by the penalty imposed.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a vote.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendments.

The committee amendments were agreed to; and the bill as amended was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider laid on the table.

TRANSMISSION OF EXTORTION MESSAGES IN INTERSTATE COMMERCE

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (S. 2249) applying the powers of the Federal Government under the commerce clause of the Constitution to extortion by means of telephone, telegraph, radio, or oral message, or otherwise.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That whoever, with intent to extort from any person, firm, association, or corporation any money or other thing of value, shall transmit in interstate commerce, by telephone, telegraph, radio, or oral message, or by any other means whatsoever, any threat (1) to injure the person, property, or reputation of any person, or the reputation of a deceased person, or (2) to kidnap any person, or (3) to accuse any person of a crime, or (4) containing any demand or request for a ransom or reward for the release of any kidnaped person, shall upon conviction be punished by imprisonment for such term of years as the court, in its discretion, shall determine: Provided, That the term "interstate commerce" shall include communication from one State, Territory, or the District of Columbia, to another State, Territory, or the District of Columbia.

With the following committee amendments:

Page 1, line 5, after the word "commerce", strike out "by telephone, telegraph, radio, or oral message, or."

Page 1, line 6, after the word "any", strike out the word "other."

Page 2, line 2, after the word "be", strike out "punished by imprisonment for such term of years as the court, in its discretion, shall determine" and insert in lieu thereof the words "fined not more than $5,000 or imprisoned not more than 20 years, or both."

Page 2, line 8, after the word "Columbia", strike out the period, insert a colon and the following: "Provided further, That nothing herein shall amend or repeal section 338–A, title 18, United States Code (47 Stat. 649)."

The committee amendments were agreed to; and the bill as amended was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider laid on the table.

AMENDMENT TO THE KIDNAPING ACT

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (S. 2252) to amend the act forbidding the transportation of kidnaped persons in interstate commerce, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the act of June 22, 1932 (U.S.C., ch. 271, title 18, sec. 408a), be, and the same is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"Whoever shall knowingly transport or cause to be transported, or aid or abet in transporting, in interstate or foreign commerce, any person who shall have been unlawfully seized, confined, inveigled, decoyed, kidnaped, abducted, or carried away by any means whatsoever and held for ransom or reward or otherwise, shall, upon conviction, be punished by imprisonment in the penitentiary for such term of years as the court, in its discretion, shall determine: Provided, That the term 'interstate or foreign commerce' shall include transportation from one State, Territory, or the District of Columbia to another State, Territory, or the District of Columbia, or to a foreign country, or from a foreign country to any State, Territory, or the District of Columbia: Provided further, That if two or more persons enter into an agreement, confederation, or conspiracy to violate the provisions of the foregoing act and do any overt act toward carrying out such unlawful agreement, confederation, or conspiracy, such person or persons shall be punished in like manner as hereinbefore provided by this act: And provided further, That in the absence of the return of the person or persons so unlawfully seized, confined, inveigled, decoyed, kidnaped, abducted, or carried away and the apprehension of the person or persons offending against the provisions of this act for or during a period of 3 days, it shall be presumed that such person or persons have been transported in interstate or foreign commerce, but such presumption shall not be conclusive."

With the following committee amendments:

Page 1, line 11, after the word "otherwise", insert "except, in the case of a minor, by a parent thereof."

Page 2, line 2, after the word "punished", insert "(1)."

Page 2, line 3, after the word "shall", strike out the word "determine:" and insert "determine, or (2) by death if the verdict of the jury shall so recommend, provided that the sentence of death shall not be imposed by the court if, prior to its imposition, the kidnaped person has been liberated unharmed: Provided, That the failure to release such person within 7 days after he shall have been unlawfully seized, confined, inveigled, decoyed, kidnaped, abducted, or carried away shall create a presumption that such person has been transported in interstate or foreign commerce, but such presumption shall not be conclusive."

Page 2, line 13, strike out the words "Provided, That the."

Page 2, line 19, after the word "Columbia", strike out ": Provided further, That if."

Page 2, line 20, insert "Sec. 3. If."

Page 2, line 25, after the word "this" strike out "act: And provided further, That in the absence of the return of the person or persons so unlawfully seized, confined, inveigled, decoyed, kidnaped, abducted, or carried away and the apprehension of the person or persons offending against the provisions of this act for or during a period of 3 days, it shall be presumed that such person or persons have been transported in interstate or foreign commerce, but such presumption shall not be conclusive."

Page 3, line 8, insert the word "act."

The committee amendments were agreed to.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. LLOYD: Page 2, line 2, strike out all after "(1)" up to and including the words "determine, or" in line 4. Strike out "(2)" in line 4 and insert in lieu thereof "(1)."

In line 7, strike out the colon after the word "unharmed" and insert in lieu thereof a comma and the following: "or (2) if the death penalty shall not apply nor be imposed, the convicted person shall be punished by imprisonment in the penitentiary for such term of years as the court in its discretion shall determine."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I yield.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I understand the gentleman proposes to call up nine of these bills this afternoon?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I am calling them up. I believe there are 9 or 10.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Is the so-called "firearms bill" included in the list?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. No; it is not. That bill went to the Ways and Means Committee on account of the tax features.

Mr. ROMJUE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I yield.

Mr. ROMJUE. I want to ask a question. In the first section of this bill, the bill refers to transporting—"whoever shall knowingly transport or cause to be transported across the line", and so on. That is the meaning of it?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Yes.

Mr. ROMJUE. Suppose a party living in a second State has nothing to do with the transportation, but he receives the abducted person afterwards, he is not a party to the transportation and they have not entered into any agreement to do anything about it, but an arrangement after abduction is made to conceal the party after they have them in another State. I do not see anything in the bill which catches that kind of a person.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. May I state the only way you could probably prosecute would be under the conspiracy law; but if the person had nothing to do with the kidnaping or transportation, he could not be convicted simply for having the kidnaper stay all night in the house. The committee had not thought to go that far.

Mr. ROMJUE. Let me ask this question: Does the gentleman undertake to say that if a citizen in the State of Illinois receives an abducted person who has been transported from the State of Missouri, say, who did not first enter into the negotiation or commission of the crime but who afterward found out and knew about it, and with that knowledge receives the person, can he not be reached under a Federal statute?

Mr. MILLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OLIVER of New York. He can be reached under the conspiracy clause.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I yield to the gentleman from Arkansas.

Mr. MILLER. I should like to invite attention to the present law enacted on kidnaping. That question is covered. It is also covered by the conspiracy statute.

Mr. ROMJUE. Conspiracy, of course, means that an agreement or understanding is entered into beforehand; but suppose the party who receives the abducted person did not know anything about the original abduction, but afterward receives the person, I can conceive in a case like that the party might be covered by the State law alone.

Mr. MILLER. If a person knowingly received a kidnaped party, then he would be doing an overt act toward carrying out the kidnaping and would therefore come under the original Lindbergh law.

Mr. BLANTON. But if the gentleman will yield, under the law of principals, if one in another State, even though not present, should aid and abet and agree upon the commission of a crime, though not present, and aid in carrying out the purposes and intent of the parties agreeing upon it, should afterward receive the kidnaped person, certainly he would be a principal, under the law, even though he were not present at the actual kidnaping.

Mr. LLOYD. We have gone as far as we can with this kind of legislation. We have gone as far as we think the Constitution will permit us to go. Manifestly there must be things that cannot be reached. We cannot even catch Dillinger by the passage of this bill.

Mr. McFARLANE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I yield to the gentleman from Texas, and then I must not yield further.

Mr. McFARLANE. Under section 3, would that not be covered by this language: "If two or more persons enter into an agreement, confederation, or conspiracy to violate the provisions of the foregoing act"?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. As I have stated two or three times, if a conspiracy has been formed, of course, all persons who are parties to that conspiracy could be prosecuted and convicted if found guilty under this act; but the committee has not seen fit to attempt to go further.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

FLIGHT TO AVOID PROSECUTION OR GIVING TESTIMONY IN CERTAIN CASES

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (S. 2253) making it unlawful for any person to flee from one State to another for the purpose of avoiding prosecution or the giving of testimony in certain cases; and pending that, may I submit a unanimous-consent request that all Members may have 5 legislative days within which to extend their own remarks on these bills?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SUMNERS]?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That it shall be unlawful for any person to flee from any State, Territory, or possession of the United States, or the District of Columbia, with intent either (1) to avoid prosecution for a felony under the laws of the place from which he flees, or (2) to avoid giving testimony in any criminal proceedings in such place in which the commission of a felony is charged. Any person who violates the provision of this act shall, upon conviction thereof, be punished by a fine of not more than $5,000 or by imprisonment for not longer than 5 years, or by both such fine and imprisonment. Violations of this act may be prosecuted only in the Federal judicial district in which the original crime was alleged to have been committed.

With the following committee amendments:

On page 1, line 5, after the word "Columbia", insert "to another State, Territory, or the District of Columbia or to a foreign country",

Page 1, line 7, at the beginning of the line, strike out "either (1)" and after the word "for", strike out "a felony", and insert "murder, kidnaping, burglary, robbery, mayhem, rape, assault with a dangerous weapon, or extortion accompanied by threats of violence, or attempt to commit any of the foregoing",

Page 2, line 1, after the word "flees", strike out "or (2) to avoid giving testimony in any criminal proceeding in such place in which the commission of a felony is charged."

Amend the title so as to read: "An act making it unlawful for any person to flee from one State to another for the purpose of avoiding prosecution in certain cases."

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I yield.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. In certain cities racketeers have forced witnesses to leave the community, and even forced them to leave the State, in order to prevent them from appearing at the prosecution of a defendant. Does not the gentleman feel it would be advisable to cover witnesses in this bill? It would help the Department a great deal.

Mr. LLOYD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I yield.

Mr. LLOYD. Will the gentleman be so good as to explain how the Federal Government can have any jurisdiction over witnesses in State prosecutions? Under what theory of the act could the Federal Government possibly reach them?

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. The only theory of existing law I could advance would be that individuals had entered into a conspiracy to prevent the United States from prosecuting one who had violated its laws. To me protecting witnesses is very important. I thought the Department desired such a provision.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I may say to the gentleman from Missouri that the witness aspect of the matter was included in the first bill; but after consideration by the committee and mature consideration by the Department of Justice, the Department did not feel that they wanted to risk having that provision incorporated in the bill, and that is why it was taken out.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

The title of the bill was amended.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

STATUTES OF LIMITATIONS

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (S. 2460) to limit the operation of statutes of limitations in certain cases.

The Clerk read the Senate bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That whenever an indictment is found defective or insufficient for any cause, after the period prescribed by the applicable statute of limitations has expired, a new indictment may be returned at any time during the next succeeding term of court following such finding, during which a grand jury thereof shall be in session.

SEC. 2. Whenever an indictment is found defective or insufficient for any cause, before the period prescribed by the applicable statute of limitations has expired, and such period will expire before the end of the next regular term of the court to which such indictment was returned, a new indictment may be returned not later than the end of the next succeeding term of such court, regular or special, following the term at which such indictment was found defective or insufficient, during which a grand jury thereof shall be in session.

SEC. 3. In the event of reindictment under the provisions of this act the defense of the statute of limitations shall not prevail against the new indictment, any provisions of law to the contrary notwithstanding.

SEC. 4. The provisions of this act shall not apply to any indictment against which the statute of limitations has run at the date of approval hereof.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (S. 2575) to define certain crimes against the United States in connection with the administration of Federal penal and correctional institutions and to fix the punishment therefor.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That any person employed at any Federal penal or correctional institution as an officer or employee of the United States, or any other person who instigates, connives at, willfully attempts to cause, assists in, or who conspires with any other person or persons to cause any mutiny, riot, or escape at such penal or correctional institution; or any such officer or employee or any other person who, without the knowledge or consent of the warden or superintendent of such institution, conveys or causes to be conveyed into such institution, or from place to place within such institution, or knowingly aids or assists therein, any tool, device, or substance designed to cut, abrade, or destroy the materials, or any part thereof, of which any building or buildings of such institution are constructed, or any other substance or thing designed to injure or destroy any building or buildings, or any part thereof, of such institution; or who conveys or causes to be conveyed into such institution, or from place to place within such institution, or aids or assists therein, or who conspires with any other person or persons to convey or cause to be conveyed into such institution, or from place to place within such institution, any firearm, weapon, explosive, or any lethal or poisonous gas, or any other substance or thing designed to kill, injure, or disable any officer, agent, employee, or inmate thereof, shall be punished by imprisonment for a period of not more than 10 years.

SEC. 2. That section 11 of the act of May 14, 1930 (ch. 274, 46 Stat. 327; U.S.C., title 18, sec. 753j), be, and the same is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"That any person not authorized by law or by the Attorney General who introduces or attempts to introduce into or upon the grounds of any Federal penal or correctional institution any narcotic drug, weapon, or any other contraband article or thing, or any contraband letter or message intended to be received by an inmate thereof, or any person who transmits or attempts to transmit or who aids or assists or attempts to aid or assist in transmitting any letter or message from any Federal penal or correctional institution or any inmate thereof otherwise than in accordance with the rules and regulations governing the transmittal of letters and messages from such institution, shall be guilty of a felony and shall be punished by imprisonment for a period of not more than 10 years."

SEC. 3. All acts and parts of acts in conflict herewith are hereby repealed.

With the following committee amendments:

Page 2, line 18, strike out all of section 2 down to and including line 10, on page 3.

On page 3, line 11, strike out the figure "3" and insert the figure "2."

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

THE DUE CULTIVATION OF PROPER MILITARY DISCIPLINE AMONG THE GREAT MASS OF THE PEOPLE AND A GENERAL DIFFUSION OF MILITARY INFORMATION ALWAYS HAVE BEEN, ARE NOW, AND ALWAYS WILL BE INDISPENSABLY NECESSARY FOR THE PRESERVATION OF THIS GOVERNMENT

Mr. PLUMLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. PLUMLEY. Mr. Speaker, with more than ordinary interest I listened to the forceful and effective address upon national defense delivered by the Honorable ARTHUR R. ROBINSON, United States Senator from Indiana, a few days ago. His plea for a continuation and extension of the valuable work which is being done among the youth of the land through and by means of the Reserve Officers' Training Corps and other military training units met my hearty approval.

This is a matter in which I am very much interested, and concerning which I am impelled to express my convictions. A graduate and for 14 years president of the only essentially military college in these United States, naturally I have some decided opinions with respect to what constitutes reasonable and adequate military preparedness, and feel that I am justified in saying what I think about educating the youth of the land for citizenship.

With every rational and conscientious person the world over I join in the wish and the hope that there may never be another war, but a common-sense, unemotional survey of the existing world condition compels all of us to acknowledge that there is no assurance that such hopes may soon be realized, nor that our wishes may speedily come true. We may dream of the day when wars shall cease; it does no harm; on the contrary, every effort to bring about the realization of such dreams is commendable and deserves our support so long as it does not strip us of our defenses, develop a condition of unpreparedness, or lay us open to or invite attack. We must shake ourselves out of the trance and face facts, for, while we are dreaming, the grim reality stares us in the face that if we are to have universal peace, we will have to be prepared to do our part to obtain it, and, if necessary, to fight for and to maintain it.

Yes, we dream of the day when swords shall be sheathed forever, and our weapons turned into plowshares and pruning hooks; and those days of which Longfellow sung, when he said:

> Peace! and no longer from its brazen portals
> The blast of war's great organ shakes the skies!
> But beautiful as songs of the immortals,
> The holy melodies of love arise.

But the road to universal peace is a tortuous path which leads down the dark future through long generations, involving the Christianization of the world—an end devoutly to be sought, eventually to be obtained—but obviously ages hence.

The sober realization of a people who do not allow their idealism to divorce them from stark reality and their clear conception of the foibles and idiosyncracies of human nature impresses the fact upon them that just so long as racial hatred and discrimination, economic rivalry between nations for world markets, and arrogant nationalism remain, disarmament and a pacific world cannot be.

I am not a militarist, and as an American citizen I am opposed to war. If that makes me a pacifist, then that is what I am; nevertheless, I have little patience with the attitude of those people who, for selfish, pecuniary, or political purposes, or for any other reason, are ready to strip this country of, or to curtail or limit, our reasonable, necessary, and adequate defense; nor with those who would throw into the junk heap our plans so carefully worked out in order to insure us a safe, reasonable, and justifiable amount of military preparedness. Anyone who is conversant with the facts—and anyone may be, and no one who is not has any business to mislead the people of this country—anyone, I say, who knows what he is talking about knows that we are improperly and inadequately prepared to defend ourselves today or to protect ourselves from an attack by foreign foe.

We should have learned much from our experience in the World War, but have we? We should realize that there is neither justification nor excuse for our being found again in such a state of unpreparedness for war as that in which we found ourselves on that date when we should have been prepared to have entered and, by reason of our state of preparedness, to have ended the war then and there. How any man or woman can contemplate with equanimity the graves of our million boys who lie in the fields of France, or in other foreign soil, as a monument to our almost criminal lack of foresight and as a sacrifice offered because of our recurring unpreparedness, or oppose any plan which will prevent the recurrence of any such national catastrophe, I do not understand.

The fate of civilization has always hung in the balance, but there are certain ideals of civilization which cannot be destroyed. The progress of humanity throughout the centuries is marked by the bloody battlefields which have made possible our achievements. The arts of peace will not always prevail. Nations, no more than individuals, will always keep their word. Why will we not realize that civilization in itself comprehends the struggle for advancement, and that the opposition it meets must be overcome? When principle or honor is at stake, no man or nation is entitled to live who is not willing to fight to maintain it.

No man knows or dares to prophesy what may happen tomorrow. The World War was catastrophic, but we are not so far away from it that we should not take note of the fact that today we are sitting on the top of a thin crust of earth which hides, but does not conceal, the fact that, figuratively speaking, beneath us is laid a perfect network of mines and powder magazines; no one knows when or what action may generate the necessary friction which may cause such a terrific explosion as will shake the world's foundation to its very center.

I should like to believe that there would never again be another war. I should like to feel that the dawn of everlasting peace was near at hand. I wish it were not true that a common belief prevails that the pronouncements of any parliament of the world, international tribunal, League of Nations, or conference by any other name are not worth the paper on which they are written, if and when war impends. The wastepaper basket of the world at such times is filled with "scraps of paper."

I should like to believe that human nature had changed, but the hard cold facts are that no plan has been promulgated in our day or generation that will change human nature or bring about the millenium by contract. No covenant which has ever been made or will be entered into in this day of grace between and among nations will prove a perfect panacea for or perfect preventive of war. The truth is that neither you nor I, our children or great-grandchildren, will live long enough to see the day when it will be unnecessary to maintain a sufficient force to guarantee safety and to keep the peace.

The fight between good and evil has just begun. Old as the beginning of things, yet young as tomorrow when it is born, the struggle between these two opposing forces must go on forever through all history to the end. Those who believe in the eventful triumph of the right must still march and fight and fall, recruited from the flower of mankind, cheered only by their own hope of humanity, strong only in their confidence in their cause.

Our experience and the lesson that the ages teach us demonstrate that in a republic the due cultivation of a proper knowledge of and general diffusion of military information always has been, is now, and always will be indispensably necessary for the preservation of government.

An examination of the roll of graduates of the colleges of our country in which military training is established and wherein the R.O.T.C. units properly function completely refutes the argument that such training produces in them a warlike spirit or makes them militarists. The graduates of these institutions do not in any considerable number choose the profession of arms. The contrary is true. These young men realize what war means, what it costs, and above all others are most anxious that peace shall prevail.

I say to you that every dollar spent in order to diffuse military knowledge among them and to educate them for the discharge of each and all their duties as a citizen in peace and in war is expended in the advancement of the cause of universal peace. I cannot understand the attitude or state of mind of those misled theorists and well-intentioned but misguided and misinformed people who so severely denounce that method and form of education and training which more than all others will accomplish the very end they seek to attain—the outlawry of war. The making of citizens fitted to serve their country in the event of a time of war is the purpose, the business, and the successful attainment of such institutions.

To be an American citizen in this so wonderful an age is the greatest blessing any man or woman may enjoy. To have and play a part in shaping and changing the course of history is the greatest opportunity with which any man or woman of any day or generation can be confronted. The best-educated citizen is the one who respects the rights of others, recognizes that properly constituted authorities are entitled to be obeyed, and realizes the responsibilities attaching to the rights and duties of his citizenship. A man educated to understand, to accomplish, and to command is the type of citizen such training develops.

Military training of the youth of the land tends to cultivate an honest manly character, hatred of shams and humbugs, an earnest purpose to make the most of oneself, to serve one's time as a man, and one's country as a good citizen and patriot. For over 115 years the essentially military college to which I have alluded has closely followed the purpose of its distinguished founder, clearly and positively announced as of the day of its establishment, the characteristics and essential elements of which are set forth in the inscription on the stone gateway, which reads:

This institution was founded upon the principle that a citizen soldiery is essential to the maintenance of free government. Throughout a hundred years this principle has been cherished, and the men have here learned that obedience to law is liberty. In the centuries to come let all who enter through this gate be faithful to the past.

I have observed at close hand the exemplification and accomplishment for which this training is responsible. I know whereof I speak when I say that the lessons it teaches are invaluable. It impresses upon the student mind the axiom that no man is fitted to command who has not first learned to obey.

At every formation, from the first to the last in his course, everywhere and all the time, it hammers into the head and habit of the cadet the absolute necessity for attention to the business in hand. It shows him, in due course, that real merit is properly recognized, and teaches him to appreciate that with such merited recognition comes the assumption of added responsibility. He learns to meet emergencies, to be prepared for the unexpected, and to assume responsibility as the opportunity and occasion therefor are presented. He is also taught to realize the importance of punctuality, how absolutely indispensable is accuracy, how essential is efficiency, the value of time, and the benefits of brevity.

Touching elbows with his equals, saluting his superiors, commanding his inferiors, he is taught the rights and prerogatives of each—what goes with authority and how he may use but never abuse it. He learns to look ahead, to be prepared at any time to have his mettle tried and temper tested, to form his advance guard, but to keep his main strength in reserve. He acquires the knowledge, theoretically and practically, of proper preparation, of the worth of his word, and of what constitutes honor. He is able fairly, impartially, and impersonally to estimate his own strength and limitations and knows he should not undertake what he cannot fairly expect decently to accomplish, but should accomplish what he undertakes, and that he must find a way or make one.

These are the ideas and ideals set before him in theory and practice constantly as a part of his military training and discipline until they become part and parcel of him—and I doubt if any course of study or plan of training can show better ideas, ideals, or educational theories or any that in practical results better fit those who are taught—citizen, soldier, or sailor—for either private or public career.

In the final analysis education is the bulwark against all things destructive of American institutions.

All who have meditated on the art of governing mankind have been convinced—that the fate of empires depends on the education of youth.

Said Aristotle—

Everyone who measures up to the full stature of his citizenship should be trained to discharge in full, not in part, his obligations of citizenship as well in times of war as in times of peace. Military training as an incident to the education of American youth such as is contemplated by and provided for under the R.O.T.C. and kindred activities should be encouraged, continued, and extended as an incident to the academic, scholastic, and physical preparation of a 100-percent American citizenship for today and tomorrow in order to "insure domestic transquillity, provide for the common defense, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty" to themselves and their posterity.

FARM RELIEF

Mr. GILLETTE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my own remarks, relative to farm relief.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Iowa?

There was no objection.

Mr. GILLETTE. Mr. Speaker, as you know, I have not asked any of the time of this House for the purpose of addressing it from the floor. I have felt that in trying to solve the long list of problems facing us it is both futile and unfair when our appropriate committees have spent long weeks in hearings and study, to use their limited time for floor presentation in lengthy and purposeless or partisan discussion.

But as the Representative of an agricultural constituency in the State of Iowa and as the only voice that constituency has in this honorable body, I want briefly to present a matter of tremendous import to them, and as I believe, to the entire Nation.

It has been generally agreed by all parties and by the spokesmen from all sections of our country that no permanent economic recovery could be had in the Nation until there had been restored to those engaged in agriculture a price level that would insure to them a margin above their production costs. Realizing this, industrial and financial interests have joined hands with the farm interests in support of measures to secure this end. Many plans have been proposed, many measures taken, and many ideas are now in process of application looking to this result. I want to state a simple fact in this connection as an introduction to the point I rose to present:

It makes but little difference to the farmer in my State whether he gets a dollar per bushel for his corn, and pays a dollar for a shirt, or whether he gets 50 cents a bushel for his corn, and pays 50 cents for his shirt, or whether he gets 10 cents a bushel for his corn and pays 10 cents for a shirt. In any event he exchanges a bushel of corn that he produces for the shirt that he needs, and in the absence of maladjustment of prices this exchange can be effected on either a high or a low price level. But it makes a mighty difference to him if he is compelled to meet a debt obligation contracted on the basis of dollar corn, high-price level, with 10-cent low-price-level corn.

Through Government refinancing machinery, much has been accomplished by way of relief for the farm-debt situation, but the problem is still tremendously acute, for the reason that the governmental agencies have fixed certain normal values as bases for their loans, and in the thousands upon thousands of cases the loan values thus determined are inadequate to carry the amount necessary to care for their refinancing needs. I do not intend this or anything I may say as a criticism of the Federal land bank or its methods. With some exceptions, of course, I have felt the land banks have made their loan commitments as high as their machinery and rules justify. But I believe it is no exaggeration to say that they are unable to take care of the refinancing needs of at least 20 percent of the farm mortgagors in distress in my State.

Of what avail is it to raise the farm price level, as we are trying to do and hope to do, for the family whose farm has been foreclosed? What value is it to an evicted family to see the benefits of an enhanced price level, reaped by the mortgagee, from the farm that their lifetime of work and savings has developed? Oh, I know it was your thought and mine that the mortgage holder would scale down his claim, and thousands upon thousands have done so and taken a loss, but other thousands refuse to scale, and you and I know that they have sound arguments on their side of the question.

In many cases the loan they made represents an investment of savings of their lifetime, and on which their future living depends. Who is going to solve this situation? It must be solved; make no mistake about that. Agriculture is suffering from an overloaned condition, and if every farm mortgage in the country were refinanced at its face value, and at present interest rates and price levels, agriculture could not survive.

Where is the responsibility for action? With the Government that is loaning all that Congress in its wisdom considers wise? With creditors who, in many cases, with real justice, insist on their full payment? I know you say it is a financial problem, but I add it is a social problem as well.

Yes, you say to me, but this must be handled on a plane of sound finance, and I say to you that the sound financial proposals thus far presented do not and cannot meet the situation, and there is a cry for help going up from these farms that American humanity must answer. These people are not Communists or disloyalists. They have waited long months through the inaction of the preceding administrations for help. They have waited and hoped for the efforts of this one to bring results. They still hope and believe and watch and wait.

This is the body to act. This is the only place to reach a solution. Is it necessary to impair a contract? This is the only political entity that can do so. Conditions over which these people have no control have already impaired and wiped out their contractual rights.

Moratoria, delays, definitive injunction laws are all paliatives but do not solve. Either the holders of these farm securities must take the loss or Congress must provide the means for supplemental financing over and above the means established by current governmental mechanism. For one, I do not wish to force investors to take an involuntary loss on an investment honestly made, but I want to aid these people to save their homes. I am ready to support supplemental Government financing; sound, first, in the name of humanity and as sound as possible in the name of finance.

OFFENSES AGAINST BANKS

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (S. 2841) to provide punishment for certain offenses committed against banks organized or operating under laws of the United States or any member of the Federal Reserve System.

The Clerk read the Senate bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That as used in this act the term "bank" includes any member bank of the Federal Reserve System, and any bank, banking association, trust company, savings bank, or other banking institution organized or operating under the laws of the United States.

SEC. 2. Whoever, not being entitled to the possession of property or money or any other thing of value belonging to, or in the care, custody, control, management, or possession of, any bank, takes and carries away, or attempts to take and carry away, such property or money or any other thing of value from any place (1) without the consent of such bank, or (2) with the consent of such bank obtained by the offender by any trick, artifice, fraud, or false or fraudulent representation, with intent to convert such property or money or any other thing of value to his use or to the use of any individual, association, partnership, or corporation, other than such bank, shall be punished by a fine of not more than $5,000 or imprisonment for not more than 10 years, or both.

SEC. 3. Whoever breaks into, or attempts to break into, any building or part thereof used as a place of business by any bank, with intent to commit in such building or part thereof so used any offense defined by this act or any felony under any law of the United States or under any law of the State, District, Territory, or possession where such building is located, shall be fined not more than $5,000 or imprisoned not more than 10 years, or both.

SEC. 4. (a) Whoever, by force and violence, or by putting in fear, feloniously takes, or feloniously attempts to take, from the person or presence of another any property or money or any other thing of value belonging to, or in the care, custody, control, management, or possession of, any bank shall be fined not more than $5,000 or imprisoned not more than 20 years, or both.

(b) Whoever, in committing, or in attempting to commit, any offense defined in subsection (a) of this section, assaults any person, or puts in jeopardy the life of any person, by the use of a dangerous weapon, shall be fined not less than $1,000 nor more than $10,000 or imprisoned not less than 5 years nor more than 25 years, or both.

SEC. 5. Whoever, in committing any offense defined in sections 1, 2, or 3 of this act, or in avoiding or attempting to avoid apprehension for the commission of such offense, or in freeing himself or attempting to free himself from arrest or confinement for such offense, kills any person, or forces any person to accompany him without the consent of such person, shall be punished by imprisonment for not less than 10 years, or by death.

SEC. 6. Jurisdiction over any offense defined by this act shall not be reserved exclusively to courts of the United States.

With the following committee amendments:

On page 1, line 8, strike out all of section 2.

Page 2, line 12, strike out all of section 3.

Page 2, line 20, strike out the figure "4" and insert the figure "2."

Page 3, line 10, strike out the figure "5" and insert the figure "3."

Page 3, line 11, strike out the words "sections 1, 2, or 3 of."

Page 3, line 17, after the word "death" insert "if the verdict of the jury shall so direct."

Page 3, line 19, strike out the figure "6" and insert the figure "4."

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking a question.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas has the floor.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON].

Mr. BLANTON. Section 4 provides that the fear must have been occasioned by the use of a dangerous weapon. May I ask the gentleman from Texas if that embraces a bottle of nitroglycerin?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. If I were behind the counter, I think it would.

Mr. BLANTON. I doubt if the courts would so construe it. I think the gentleman ought to offer an amendment here adding the words "or device" after the words "dangerous weapon."

Some of the largest bank robberies have been occasioned where a thug comes into the bank and goes up to the window and has a bottle with something in it. He says, "If you don't hand over the money, I will blow up your bank with nitroglycerin." That is more dangerous than all the dangerous weapons he could bring in, and this bill ought to embrace just such cases as that. I doubt whether a court would construe a bottle of nitroglycerin or something that was held out to be nitroglycerin as a dangerous weapon, hence we should add the words "or device."

Mr. DOCKWEILER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. DOCKWEILER. May I say that a man might go into a bank with intent to rob and use a gas bomb, which would not in itself be dangerous.

Mr. BLANTON. Yes; or he might use one of these new kind of Indiana six shooters carved out of a piece of wood with a pocket knife.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I suggest to the gentleman that section 2 covers the matter, although I have no objection to adding the words "or device." I have no objection, and I do not think the committee will have objection.

Mr. BLANTON. I suggest that the gentleman offer an amendment, adding after the word "weapon", the words "or device."

Mr. LLOYD. Does the gentleman hold for a moment that a bottle of nitroglycerin is not a dangerous weapon?

Mr. BLANTON. I do not know whether the courts would so hold or not. The words "or device" would cover it.

Mr. LLOYD. A bomb is a dangerous weapon.

Mr. BLANTON. I do not remember any decision where a court has held that a bottle of nitroglycerin or a bottle of water asserted to be nitroglycerin, which would have the same effect psychologically on the minds of the people in the bank, is a dangerous weapon.

Mr. DOCKWEILER. May I suggest adding the word "instrumentality"?

Mr. BLANTON. The words "or device" would cover the matter.

Mr. SABATH. Both words can go in.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. The committee is perfectly willing to have inserted in line 6, page 3, after the word "weapon", the words "or device."

Mr. BLANTON. I believe that would help the situation.

Mr. DOCKWEILER. I can conceive of a lot of devices which are not dangerous. I would suggest the use of words indicating something that is intended to instill fear.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. What would the gentleman suggest adding?

Mr. DOCKWEILER. I would suggest adding "device or such instrumentality intended to instill fear."

Mr. BLANTON. "Device" would cover the situation.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I will offer an amendment that the words "or device" be inserted, and we will see what the Senate can do to help us out with the suggestion of the gentleman from California [Mr. DOCKWEILER].

Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. SUMNERS of Texas: Page 3, line 6, after the word "weapon", insert the words "or device."

The amendment was agreed to.

The committee amendments were agreed to.

Mr. SABATH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. SABATH. This bill applies to banking institutions only. Should not other governmental institutions be covered?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I may say to the gentleman that we are going rather far in this bill, since all the property is owned, as a rule, by the citizens of the community where the bank is located. The committee was not willing to go further, and the Attorney General did not ask it to go further.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. The jury, under this bill, may fix the penalty at death. That is a rather unusual thing in Federal courts.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I know it, but the committee believed that ought to be done.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

WHENCE DOES OPPOSITION COME?

Mr. FERNANDEZ. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include therein a letter addressed to a constituent on my record in Congress.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Louisiana?

There was no objection.

Mr. FERNANDEZ. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter addressed to a constituent on my record in Congress:

DEAR FRIEND: Answering your esteemed favor of recent date as to whether or not I would offer as a candidate for Congress to succeed myself in the coming September primary, and in which you offer your whole-hearted support to my candidacy if offered:

I wish to thank you from the bottom of my heart for your tender of support, which I graciously accept. As far back as February 2 of this year I announced through the Associated Press that I would be more than willing to enter the lists with anyone the New Orleans organization may put up, and that statement in full follows:

"If the New Orleans organization brings out a candidate against me, it will be purely upon a factional basis. I am not ashamed of my record in Congress, and I am perfectly willing to have it made a basis of a vote of confidence by the people. With the single exception of my vote against the gag-rule resolution, each ballot I have cast as a Member of the House of Representatives has been for measures advocated by the administration. Not only that, I intend to continue to support President Roosevelt and his policies in 100-percent fashion. A group of Iowa Congressmen were told by the President himself that he did not blame them for voting against the gag rule. There is other evidence to show that the President did not subscribe to such extremes in the matter of a rule for the conduct of the House of Representatives. Whenever any rule tends to restrict free expression of thought or opportunity to properly represent the people of my district, I shall oppose it. I have the assurance of the support of organized labor and of Federal employees. I have unsolicited letters from practically every civic organization in New Orleans commending the work that I have done. I have worked earnestly and persistently in the interest of the community which I serve. I believe the account of stewardship which I will be able to render will have more weight with the voters than the desire of a political faction to grab off another job."

SENIORITY IN CONGRESS

For over 100 years the length of service, or seniority, is the rule by which every Member of Congress is governed. While I have been in Congress just two terms, I have preferred committee assignment—Naval Affairs—and rank sixth from top of that committee. In the Seventy-second and Seventy-third Congresses I was appointed by both Speakers of the House of Representatives as a member of the Board of Visitors to the Naval Academy, Annapolis, Md. If a change is made at this time, whatever has been gained will be lost to my constituents. It is up to my people to judge what is best. A casual look into the Congressional Directory will disclose that States which have observed the rule of seniority now control practically all important committees in Congress, and whenever a change is made in their Congressman, everything gained in the way of important committee assignments is lost.

HOW I HAVE STOOD ON MATTERS AFFECTING MY CONSTITUENTS

I voted against the sales tax and favored higher taxes on incomes in the larger brackets and inheritance taxes. I voted to prohibit the Reconstruction Finance Corporation loaning money to companies paying salaries over $100,000 annually. Supported and voted for the Norris-LaGuardia anti-injunction bill, now law. Voted for immediate payment of the soldiers' bonus each time the question called. Voted for every bill that would feed the hungry and clothe the naked. Supported the 30-hour week bill for industry. Supported the Norris bill for Government ownership and operation of Muscle Shoals power project. I supported amendments to the Economy Act to exempt small-salaried Government employees and to restore veterans' benefits. Voted to impose the electrical taxes on the utilities instead of on the people. Voted to give additional money to support the C.W.A. and F.E.R.A., and for the continuance of this emergency relief.

Introduced legislation that passed this Congress providing for the establishment of a lighthouse depot which will be erected on the Industrial Canal at a cost of $175,000. Worked unceasingly for the Government to locate a conservation camp on the grounds near Chalmette Monument and the areas of the battlefield, and to force the Government to recognize the historical value of commemorating the Battle of New Orleans by suitable park area and improvements; also additional land for the burial of soldiers of all wars on the Chalmette battlefield and the improvement thereof. Introduced legislation, which is pending, that would cause surveys to be made of the bayous of St. Bernard and Plaquemines Parishes, so that fishermen and users of those waters could find refuge in case of storm. Improved postal facilities in Algiers is one of my accomplishments. Held up a bill in Congress that would have declared Bayou St. John a nonnavigable stream from Esplanade Avenue to Hagan Avenue until the commission council created an aquatic park and until proper indemnity could be paid to boat and shipyard owners for damages resulting from such legislation.

WHAT I STAND FOR AND WILL FIGHT FOR

Continuation of C.W.A. and F.E.R.A. and P.W.A. in order that every man or woman who wants work shall have work.

For a new Federal building for New Orleans.

Continuation of revetment work on levees below New Orleans. Strengthening of levees, including those in parish of Orleans, which the Government does not now control.

For adequate care of our veterans of all wars, including hospitalization.

No man or woman denied the right to work because of age limit by any corporation doing interstate business, including Government employees.

Old-age pensions.

COMMENDATORY

I am pleased to quote some expressions from prominent Government officials, business executives, labor leaders, and organizations, which have come to me unsolicited, on my services to them and my constituents during my tenure of office in Congress:

[From Hon. James A. Farley, chairman of the Democratic National Committee, Washington, dated June 16, 1933]

"I want you to know that I greatly appreciate the support you gave the administration program during the session just closed. I feel certain the people of the country generally realize that more beneficial legislation was passed at this session of Congress than ever before in the Nation's history. For the part you played in these remarkable accomplishments I want you to know that I am personally grateful. With best wishes, I am, sincerely."

[From the Speaker of the House, Hon. HENRY T. RAINEY, Washington, D.C., dated Apr. 19, 1934]

"I desire to say that out of 23 votes on administration measures you voted with the administration on every proposition, except the bonus bill. You voted to discharge the Ways and Means Committee for consideration of this bill, and after that you voted for passage of this bill. You record is considered to be excellent. There are very few Democratic Members of Congress who have a record as good as yours."

[From the majority leader of the party, Hon. JOSEPH W. BYRNS, House of Representatives, dated Apr. 21, 1934]

"It gives me pleasure, as majority leader of the House, to testify to the very loyal support and cooperation which, as a Member of the House of Representatives, you have given the President on his plans and policies for recovery. You have uniformly and ably supported him in all of his measures, save the one involving the veterans, and I do not regard this in any sense as a test of loyalty. With kindest regards."

[From Mr. William Green, president American Federation of Labor, Washington, D.C.]

"I take pleasure in enclosing your legislative record on measures of interest to labor while a Member of Congress. It is 100 percent. The first session of the Seventy-second Congress had more measures affecting labor before it than any other Congress in many years. For all of them you voted as labor wishes. I, therefore, wish to commend you to organized wage earners and their friends in the First Congressional District of Louisiana. Wishing you every success, I am."

TRUE FRIEND OF VETERANS

[From the National Tribune, "The Voice of the Veterans of the United States", issue of Apr. 19, 1934]

"All of the Representatives listed will be up for renomination this fall. They should have the whole-hearted support of all veterans and their friends. Fernandez is listed as a friend of the veterans."

FRIEND OF FEDERAL EMPLOYEES

[From them, dated Apr. 6, 1934, is this letter]

"Federal employees are particularly grateful of your earnest efforts in having 5 percent restoration of pay from February 1, 1934, and 5 percent again July 1, 1934."

Other letters of commendation are herewith enclosed, in copy facsimile. Thanking you for your offer of help and cooperation in the coming campaign in my behalf, I am, faithfully yours,

CONGRESSMAN J. O. FERNANDEZ.

THE PHILIPPINES AT LAST TO BE A NATION

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extned my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, ladies, and gentlemen, the latest news by radio and cable from Manila to the effect that the Philippine legislature unanimously accepted the recently enacted McDuffie-Tydings Philippine independence bill, and is proceeding to the calling of a constitutional convention for the purpose of framing a constitution, is to me a matter of the deepest gratification.

It is but natural that this should be so, because during the nearly 28 years that I have been a Member of this House I have been advocating that the United States keep its pledge to the 13,000,000 inhabitants of the islands. This pledge, often repeated, was that in the end we would make them a free and independent nation, with a government of Filipinos, by Filipinos, and for Filipinos.

I well remember an occasion a few years back, when a newspaperman, meeting me as I was leaving the Capitol just after having introduced one of my many Philippine-independence bills, inquired: "Mr. SABATH, why have you had for so many years such a deep interest in Philippine independence?"

The best explanation I could think of, on the instant, was this: "Well, I want to be free myself, and I guess I just cannot help but sympathize with the desire of the other fellow who also aspires to be free."

Whether the correspondent was completely satisfied with this answer, I never knew. But I am not sure that I could give, in a few words, a better explanation even now. I am sure, however, that it was a very similar impulse that caused me time and again to impress upon President Wilson the justification of seeing to it that independence be given to the people of Czechoslovakia, my native land, a plea that I am glad to say did not fall upon unsympathetic ears, nor one that was in the end to be in vain. Likewise, I was always, and from the very first, captivated by the idea of an Irish Republic. The Irish people constitute a race abundantly able to manage their own affairs of state without the interference of any outside nation whatsoever.

I have often thought that the fitness of a people to govern themselves is perhaps best indicated by the determination and persistence with which they demand to be free. One reason that I have always been so sympathetic to the pleas of the Filipinos for independence is the knowledge that they have been ardently hoping, working, and fighting for it for more than 300 years. And during the 36 years that they have been under American sovereignty there has never been a day that they have not longed for their independence. Always, however, they have couched their pleas to the United States in the most respectful terms. They have believed in the good intentions toward them of the people of the United States. In beseeching us for their freedom, it was not that they loved the United States less, but that they loved independence more. I can understand their feeling perfectly. I could never be happy being governed by a foreign power, regardless of how great the nation might be, and therefore I can readily understand how the Filipinos would not and could not be happy being governed by us.

This is simply human nature. History does not tell of a single race that was ever happy and content to be governed by a far-distant and alien people against their consent. If there were such a people, it would indicate their inferiority and unreadiness for self-government.

Daniel Webster explained the feeling of the Filipino very well when he said:

> No matter how easy may be the yoke of a foreign power, no matter how lightly it sits upon the shoulder, if it is not imposed by the voice of his own nation and of his own country, he will not, he cannot, and he means not to be happy under its burden.

The Filipinos have been under American sovereignty now for more than a third of a century. We have sent them some of our best instructors in the arts of self-government. An entire generation has grown to manhood under the American flag. They have been apt pupils. Their remarkable progress and development under our guidance has been a credit both to them and to the United States.

In my judgment we have done the wise thing in now offering them, as we have in Public Law No. 127, approved March 24, 1934, the opportunity to obtain in the end the complete and absolute independence they have so long and eloquently contended for. If we had withheld this opportunity any longer, we would have risked losing the gratitude that they now sincerely entertain for us because of our altruism and because of the assistance we have given them in aiding them to prepare themselves for independence.

When the American flag finally is hauled down in the Philippines the Stars and Stripes will not stand for less, before the peoples of the world, but for more. It will then represent a Nation that has kept its word of honor by voluntarily making free an alien and weaker people that desired to be free. No other nation in all the history of mankind has ever equaled or even approached this attainment in altruism and square dealing.

For myself, I am proud, both as an American citizen and as a Member of the Congress of the United States, that it is to be the people of this country to whom is to go the honor of having their Government be the first to present to the world the unprecedented spectacle of a great and powerful nation sharing with a dependent and far-distant people that freedom and independence that we desire and insist upon for ourselves.

After having associated with Filipino statesmen in the United States Congress for more than a quarter of a century there remains not the least doubt in my mind of their ability to govern, and to govern wisely and well. I realize, of course, that not all of the 13,000,000 Filipinos are the equal of the men they send here to represent them. But in what way can a people better demonstrate their capacity for self-government than by their ability to select able, honest, intelligent, and patriotic men to represent them at home and abroad? The Filipino leaders that I have come in contact with have impressed me as being the equal of American statesmen or those of any other nation. One and all, they have been able and efficient, painstaking, and even brilliant men.

The truth is, in my opinion, that the Filipino has never been appreciated in this country at his real value. This has been largely due to the fact that when the Philippines were acquired by the United States in 1898 but few Americans had ever seen a Filipino. In order to justify the use of our Army in destroying the short-lived Philippine Republic, the Republican imperialists of that time found it expedient to describe them as near savages. This description of them, as of even that very period, is now known to have been a gross and cruel misrepresentation. And they have advanced greatly in every way since then. I have heard prominent Filipinos themselves declare that the Filipino people have made greater progress under the 36 years of American sovereignty than under the previous 300 years of government under Spain. In any event, the true picture of present-day Philippine civilization, enlightenment, culture and progress is a vastly different one than that presented by the imperialists of 1898. It will compare with that of any other people inhabiting any part of the globe.

I have enjoyed to the utmost my contracts and associations with the representatives of the Islands. I was to meet my first Filipino friends when soon after my first election to Congress on March 4, 1907, I was introduced to the Hon. Benito Legarda and the Hon. Pablo Ocampo de Leon, who were the then resident commissioners from the Philippine Islands to the United States. Although not very fluent in English, they immediately impressed me as being of a high type of statesman and the cultured gentleman, and my idea of the capacity of the Filipinos rose immeasurably.

But it was not until 2 years later—1909—during the Sixty-first Congress, that the people of the United States and the Membership of the American House of Representatives were to be privileged to obtain their first inkling of the real capabilities of the Filipino race. For it was in the Sixty-first Congress that Manuel L. Quezon was to make his first appearance as Philippine Resident Commissioner in the United States Congress. Not only good looking but handsome, young though he was then, he electrified the Members of this body with his eloquence, brilliancy, wit, and, what was more, by his ability to effectively squelch any interrogation as to the right of the Philippines to be free by his facility in citing passages from the Declaration of Independence and by quoting the words of Washington, Jefferson, and Lincoln, which seemed always to be at his tongue's end. Members of the House soon learned not to enter into combat with him in forensic debate, for to do so was to invite certain embarrassment.

Commissioner Quezon, who resigned after 7 years' service as Resident Commissioner to become president of the Philippine Senate, a position he still holds, became almost overnight one of the most popular Members of the Congresses in which he served. His reputation for brilliance in oratory and repartee was such as to bring Members hurrying from their offices to the House Chamber when it became known he was about to speak. It was a common thing for Senators to come from the other side to hear him. He received more than one ovation from the Members of this body, and with equal emphasis from both Republicans and Democrats.

Mr. Quezon was really the first Filipino to arise on the floor of this Chamber and deliver a speech in English. Immediately he made a Nation-wide reputation, both for himself and the Filipino race. When Quezon pleaded for the liberty of his people, he spoke as one inspired. Members of Congress are but human, and they could not withhold the impulse to congratulate him upon the personal triumph that they felt he had justly earned. On one occasion, at the conclusion of one of his especially masterful efforts, nearly every Member of this body, Democrats and Republicans, formed in line and, shaking his hand, showered him with congratulations. At the conclusion of his services here the Members of both parties contributed to the purchase of a lasting and very beautiful gift, which today is one of his most treasured possessions, occupying a glass-enclosed case in his home in Manila.

During and following the last term of Mr. Quezon, Congress had its first opportunity to come in contact with two typical, high-class Filipino business men in the persons of Philippine Resident Commissioners Manuel Earnshaw, who served from 1913 to 1917, and Teodoro R. Yangco, who served from 1917 to 1921. Accompanying Mr. Yangco as Resident Commissioner was the Honorable Jaime C. de Veyra, an honest, conscientious, hard-working statesman, who very soon won the confidence and good will of every Member of the House. Madam de Veyra, the wife of the Commissioner, was a tactful, highly cultured, and brilliant woman, and gave Washington society its first introduction to the modern Filipino. She served her people and the cause of Philippine independence by delivering lectures throughout the United States.

Now I come to my friend Resident Commissioner Isauro Gabaldon, the most dynamic, intense, uncompromising advocate of immediate, absolute, and complete Philippine independence that I have ever come in contact with. He served here 7 years, and his speeches, which will live forever in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and are the best index to his character, will be read with fervor and reverence by millions of his race yet unborn. He was an honest man and a great patriot. I do not soon expect to see his like again.

This brings me to the two present Resident Commissioners, the Honorable PEDRO GUEVARA and the Honorable CAMILO OSIAS. Both are gentlemen and statesmen of the highest order, and command the respect and affection of every Member of the House of Representatives.

There are three other Filipinos that I should like to mention, because, although they have never been Members of this body, they are outstanding leaders in the Philippines and have played important parts for many years in the negotiations for Philippine independence. They are each well known to many Members of this body. I refer to Philippine Senator Sergio Osmeña, one of the ablest men in Philippine politics; the brilliant Manuel Roxas, former speaker of the Philippine House of Representatives; and the Honorable Rafael R. Alunan, Philippine secretary of agriculture and natural resources.

God knows I wish the Filipino people well. They have made an intelligent campaign for their freedom through their leaders and delegates in Congress. And, when full and complete independence is at last theirs and they have become a member of the concert of nations, I hope they will not forget the memories of those Americans who have so persistently and unselfishly aided them to achieve their freedom. Of the latter, I do not know of any who have rendered longer or more loyal service to their cause than Dr. Charles Edward Russell and the Honorable Clyde H. Tavenner, formerly a Member of Congress from Illinois. For more than a quarter of a century these two men have been treading the corridors of this Capitol, patiently and everlastingly insisting upon the virtues and pleading the cause of the Filipino people and advocating their immediate, absolute, and complete independence. Dr. Russell is the author of two of the finest books on the Philippines ever written—The Outlook for the Filipinos, and The Hero of the Filipinos (Dr. Jose Rizal). Mr. Tavenner has been identified with the Philippine-independence movement in the United States since 1908. He founded and for 7 years was the editor and publisher of the Philippine Republic, a monthly magazine devoted to the cause of Philippine independence. A long line of newspaper men, editors, and Congressmen at the Capitol have received their first data on the Philippine questions, and often their lasting convictions, from talking to Tavenner—ever ready with fact, with statistics, with historical quotation, and an unselfish word of idealism to press the cause which a quarter of a century ago he made his own.

Defending the Filipino aspiration, Tavenner has been inspired in part by patriotism to his own country, believing, in common with his party, the Democratic, that the highest ideals of the United States will be served by noninvolvement in the government of a distant country; in part by his personal friendship with Filipino leaders here and in Manila, and sympathy with the Filipino people acquired during a protracted visit to the islands. A prominent Washington newspaper correspondent in a lengthy article describing his long association with the Philippine independence movement recently paid Mr. Tavenner the following tribute, well deserved in my opinion, for I have been familiar with his efforts on behalf of the Filipinos ever since I first came to Congress:

(By Harry W. Frantz, Washington correspondent of the United Press)

The Marquis de La Fayette, fearless champion of American independence, has a modern counterpart in Clyde H. Tavenner, for 25 years the ever-ready exponent of Filipino liberty. La Fayette fought with a sword; Tavenner battles with a typewriter. In persistent loyalty to the cause of a distant people of different nationality there is little to choose between them.

Back of every political cause there is usually some unknown and unsung figure who by the depth of his conviction or the persistence of his presentation becomes peculiarly a part of it. Tavenner is such a man. Anyone in Washington who pays attention to Philippine affairs sooner or later will come in contact with him. They will find an able, practical politician, almost too modest for his own political welfare; optimistic for any cause which he may support; and in his skillful writing on Philippine questions they will note that consistency, lack of compromise, and quality of confidence which marks the masterful political writer.

It is only for the record that I am inserting this final résumé of my views and my own humble efforts in this body on behalf of the freedom of the Filipinos during the last 28 years. I will not clutter the RECORD with a reproduction of all of the various bills I have introduced on behalf of Philippine independence, but should like to present the first and last measure that I presented to the House on that subject:

House Joint Resolution —, to secure the neutralization of the Philippine Islands

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President be, and he is hereby, instructed to take such steps as may be necessary to secure the adhesion of all maritime states interested therein in a declaration and international guaranty whereby the Philippine Islands and each of them shall be forever neutralized and placed under the protection of the said powers. Whenever such neutralization shall have become effective the Government of the United States hereby pledges itself to cede its sovereignty in, to, and over said Philippine Islands to such body as the said maritime States shall have resolved on: Provided, That no such guaranty of neutralization shall become effective or binding on the United States until satisfactory arrangements have been made to reimburse the United States for the expenses and charges incurred or assumed by the United States since May 1898, in or on or about the Philippine Islands: And provided further, That no state guaranteeing said convention shall ever acquire, hold, grant, or exercise any exclusive or unilateral power, franchise, or domination, authority or sway in or on or about said Philippine Islands. Said agreement shall provide for the policing of said Philippine Islands by an international force: Provided further, That any infraction of this resolution by any signatory power shall ipso facto rescind the adhesion hereto by the United States.

[72d Cong., 1st Sess.]

H.R. 5509

A bill to provide for the independence of the Philippine Islands on July 4, 1933

Whereas the Philippine Legislature has repeatedly petitioned for "immediate, absolute, and complete" independence; and

Whereas the Filipino people have succeeded in maintaining a stable government and have thus fulfilled the only condition laid down by the Congress as a prerequisite to the granting of independence; and

Whereas it therefore is now our liberty and our duty to keep our promise to these people by granting them immediately the independence which they so honorably covet: Therefore

Be it enacted, etc., That the sovereignty of the United States of America over the Philippine Islands shall be withdrawn and forever cease, and the full and complete independence of the people thereof recognized, on and after July 4, 1933.

In conclusion, may I add that I fervently hope that the Philippine Islands will forever remain free and independent, that they will value their freedom, regard the interests of the masses, forever be on guard against the greed of the rich and the powerful, and that they ever will be grateful and remember the service this Nation has rendered them.

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

AMENDMENT OF THE CRIMINAL CODE

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H.R. 8912) to amend section 35 of the Criminal Code of the United States.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 35 of the Criminal Code of the United States, as amended (U.S.C., title 18, secs. 80, 82, 83, 84, 85, and 86), be, and the same is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 35. Whoever shall make or cause to be made or present or cause to be presented, for payment or approval, to or by any person or officer in the civil, military, or naval service of the United States, or any department thereof, or any corporation in which the United States of America is a stockholder, any claim upon or against the Government of the United States, or any department or officer thereof, or any corporation in which the United States of America is a stockholder, knowing such claim to be false, fictitious, or fraudulent; or whoever, for the purpose of obtaining or aiding to obtain the payment or approval of such claim, or for the purpose and with the intent of cheating and swindling or defrauding the Government of the United States, or any department thereof, or any corporation in which the United States of America is a stockholder, shall knowingly and willfully falsify or conceal or cover up by any trick, scheme, or device, a material fact, or make or cause to be made any false or fraudulent statements or representations, or make or use or cause to be made or used any false bill, receipt, voucher, roll, account, claim, certificate, affidavit, or deposition, knowing the same to contain any fraudulent or fictitious statement or entry; or whoever shall take and carry away or take for his own use, or for the use of another, with intent to steal or purloin, or shall willfully injure or commit any depredation against, any property of the United States, or any branch or department thereof, or any corporation in which the United States of America is a stockholder, or any property which has been or is being made, manufactured, or constructed under contract for the United States, or any branch or department thereof, or any corporation in which the United States of America is a stockholder; or whoever shall enter into any agreement, combination, or conspiracy to defraud the Government of the United States, or any department or officer thereof, or any corporation in which the United States of America is a stockholder, by obtaining or aiding to obtain the payment or allowance of any false or fraudulent claim; and whoever, having charge, possession, custody, or control of any money or other public property used or to be used in the military or naval service, with intent to defraud the United States, or any department thereof, or any corporation in which the United States of America is a stockholder, or willfully to conceal such money or other property, shall deliver or cause to be delivered to any person having authority to receive the same any amount of such money or other property less than that for which he received a certificate or took a receipt; or whoever, being authorized to make or deliver any certificate, voucher, receipt, or other paper certifying the receipt of arms, ammunition, provisions, clothing, or other property so used or to be used, shall make or deliver the same to any other person without a full knowledge of the truth of the facts stated therein and with intent to defraud the United States, or any department thereof, or any corporation in which the United States of America is a stockholder, shall be fined not more than $10,000 or imprisoned not more than 10 years, or both. And whoever shall purchase, or receive in pledge, from any person any arms, equipment, ammunition, clothing, military stores, or other property furnished by the United States, under a clothing allowance or otherwise, to any soldier, sailor, officer, cadet, or midshipman in the military or naval service of the United States or of the National Guard or Naval Militia, or to any person accompanying, serving, or retained with the land or naval forces and subject to military or naval law, having knowledge or reason to believe that the property has been taken from the possession of the United States or furnished by the United States under such allowance, shall be fined not more than $500 or imprisoned not more than 2 years, or both."

With the following committee amendments:

Page 3, line 1, after the word "the", insert "War or Navy Departments of the."

Page 3, line 2, after the word "thereof", insert "or any corporation in which the United States of America is a stockholder."

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Certainly.

Mr. GOSS. I notice in reading the report that this measure has to do with the Army and Navy, and I may say to the gentleman that I have read this four-page bill and I must confess I do not quite understand it. I notice it affects the Army and Navy, and it is stated in the report that the committee received a letter from the Attorney General. Was this bill ever submitted to the War and Navy Departments for criticism or advice?

Mr. MILLER. If the gentleman will permit——

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I yield to the gentleman from Arkansas.

Mr. MILLER. Replying to the gentleman from Connecticut, there is only a very small change made in existing law. I think the drafting of the measure was perhaps unfortunate, but the primary purpose is to give protection and to provide a penalty for destruction of property, particularly property like beacon lights on airway lines. This is about the only change in existing law, and if the gentleman will look at the report he will find this is the purpose of the bill.

Mr. GOSS. It is a rather complicated bill for me to read. I think, as a matter of fact, when the Judiciary Committee has a matter of this kind before it, although it does come from the Attorney General, if it affects the Army and Navy it should be submitted to those departments for report and criticism.

Mr. MILLER. May I say to the gentleman from Connecticut that we are not changing the law as it affects the Army and Navy.

Mr. LLOYD. This does not affect the Army and Navy at all.

Mr. CONDON. The italicized language on page 2 of the bill is the new matter.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman from Texas yield?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I yield.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman from Connecticut, by reason of his association with the Army and the War Department, ought to know that every time a bill comes on the floor of this House that affects the Army or the Navy it is written in such technical language that neither the gentleman nor any other layman from Connecticut can understand a single provision in it.

Mr. GOSS. I think that is probably true of the gentleman from Texas himself. Can the gentleman explain this bill?

Mr. BLANTON. Not at all. Some of the people in the Army and Navy themselves cannot tell what their bills mean.

Mr. GOSS. Can the gentleman tell me what this bill is?

Mr. BLANTON. No. They are all written in technical language, every one of them, and they purposely write their bills in such language so that the laymen of the United States will not understand them, and they have been very successful at it.

Mr. GOSS. Does the gentleman understand this bill?

Mr. BLANTON. No; I do not. But it comes from the Committee on the Judiciary, and I am relying on its judgment in allowing the bill to be passed without opposition.

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

REWARD FOR CAPTURE OF PUBLIC ENEMIES

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H.R. 9370) to authorize an appropriation of money to facilitate the apprehension of certain persons charged with crime.

This bill is on the Union Calendar, and I ask unanimous consent that it be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That there is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, as a reward or rewards for the capture, dead or alive, of anyone who is charged with violation of criminal laws of the United States or of more than one State or of the District of Columbia who is designated by the Attorney General of the United States as a public enemy, the sum of $25,000 to be apportioned and expended in the discretion of, and upon such conditions as may be imposed by, the Attorney General of the United States. That there is also hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, as a reward or rewards for information leading to the arrest of any such person who has been designated by the Attorney General of the United States as a public enemy the sum of $25,000 to be apportioned and expended in the discretion of, and upon such conditions as may be imposed by, the Attorney General of the United States: Provided, That not more than $25,000 shall be expended for information or capture of any one person.

If the said persons or any of them shall be killed in resisting lawful arrest, the Attorney General may pay any part of the reward or rewards in his discretion to the person or persons whom he shall adjudge to be entitled thereto: Provided, That no part of the money appropriated by this act shall be paid to any official or employee of the Department of Justice of the United States.

With the following committee amendments:

Page 1, line 7, strike out the words "more than one" and insert in lieu thereof the word "any."

Page 2, line 17, after the word "States" insert a colon and the following:

"Provided further, That no person shall be designated as a public enemy within the purview of this act who has not theretofore been convicted in a court of competent jurisdiction of a felony involving violence."

The committee amendments were agreed to.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following additional amendment. On page 1, line 7, after the word "any" strike out the word "one."

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 7, after the word "any", strike out the word "one."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, after the word "State", strike out the colon, insert a period, and strike out the proviso which follows.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That is a committee amendment which has already been agreed to.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. But I was on my feet asking to be recognized.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, the proceedings whereby the amendment was agreed to will be vacated.

Mr. BLANTON. I object because there were several committee amendments passed and we do not want to undo all of that work.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. My amendment is to line 17, page 2, to strike out the proviso.

Mr. BLANTON. There were several committee amendments that were passed by the House. All that work should not be undone. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's amendment may be considered notwithstanding the committee amendments have been adopted. That would obviate the necessity of vacating the passage of all the other committee amendments.

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Speaker, as I recollect, I heard the Speaker say the proceedings would be vacated without objection.

Mr. BLANTON. No; I objected to that.

Mr. GOSS. I did not hear the gentleman's objection.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. It makes no difference how you get at it if it is done.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, although I am against his amendment, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COCHRAN] may be considered and voted on by the House, notwithstanding the committee amendments have been adopted.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. McFARLANE. I object.

Mr. YOUNG. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 9, and on page 2, lines 6 and 9, strike out "$25,000" and insert "$10,000."

Mr. YOUNG. Mr. Speaker, it appears that when the Congress does not seem to have anything else to do, we meet here and make some more crimes. Now, we are asked in this bill to give away $25,000 of the taxpayers' money for the apprehension of somebody. It seems to me it is time for someone to say something here in respect to the rights of the taxpayers. This bill is probably entirely unnecessary. My amendment reducing $25,000, which it is proposed to give away to some individual for helping Government officers apprehend a so-called "public enemy", makes the bill just that much better, because it reduced the expenditure by the Government from $25,000 to $10,000.

Recently Attorney General Cummings uttered the most asinine and hysterical statement made by any Cabinet officer in the last decade. Attorney General Cummings solemnly assured the Senate Judiciary Committee that the armed gangsters in this country outnumbered the Army and the Navy. Let us consider for just a moment what that means. The Army and the Navy of the United States comprise 200,000, or nearly that number. In other words, the Attorney General solemnly assured the Senate Committee on the Judiciary that there were 200,000 armed gangsters or more than that number rampant in the country. Of course, that is an absured and asinine statement, and of itself indicates that the Cabinet official uttering it lacks competency or is hysterical. It is true that there are some gangsters, racketeers, and gunmen at large in the country. Someone said today that in bringing in this legislation we have gone as far as we can go. We cannot even catch Dillinger by the enactment of these laws; but, of course, any of us should repudiate the assertion that there are anything like 200,000 gangsters and thugs and gunmen rampant in this country. There are a few Dillingers at large it is true. It is proposed to permit the Attorney General of the United States to designate anyone who has served time as a public enemy.

Mr. McFARLANE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. YOUNG. Not now. And in helping the apprehension of that person or to take his life to permit $25,000 to be paid. This bill is entirely unnecessary and we should be spending our time legislating for the welfare of all of the people of the country instead of making more crimes apparently because we seem to have nothing else to do. If we have not anything more important than this, we ought to pack up and go home. I hope that the amendment I have offered will be adopted. It will at least cause a saving of some money to the Government.

Mr. Speaker, we abhor crime and detest criminals. Today these several measures we have enacted make some new crimes and strengthen present criminal statutes. As a matter of fact, we probably now have an abundance of laws defining crimes from kidnaping and murder down all along the line. The trouble is in the enforcement. Criminal statutes avail but little when sheriffs and Department of Justice operatives are inept and prosecuting officials incompetent.

Officials of the Department of Justice ask for the passage of these bills, and, as a Representative, I propose to give the Department of Justice officials complete cooperation and assistance, even though there is no basis for the statement of the Attorney General that "armed gangsters outnumber the Army and Navy." There are nearly 200,000 men in our Army and Navy.

It is, however, with some feeling of reluctance that I vote to create additional crimes, giving additional power, and adding to the already arbitrary authority exercised by Federal courts of the United States. Nevertheless, as the Attorney General desires these bills passed, and it is fair to infer that the President favors them, I am voting in support of all of them.

At present we seem to have one law for the rich, another for the poor, and about 2,000,000 laws for the rest of us.

Among new Federal offenses we are creating is providing 20 years imprisonment or $5,000 fine, or both, for sending kidnap threats, ransom demands, and the like across State lines in any manner; also to amend the National Motor Vehicle Theft Act by making it illegal to take or send stolen securities across State lines.

Federal judges are given more jurisdiction and greater powers. I regret this.

Federal judges, as a class, are domineering, arrogant, and tyrannical. Federal judges, with some notable exceptions, have become not a group of public servants but a group of public dictators and tyrants.

Article III of the Constitution of the United States provides:

The judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one Supreme Court, and in such inferior courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish. The judges, both of the Supreme and inferior courts, shall hold their offices during good behavior * * *.

The makers of our Constitution did not state that Federal judges "shall hold their offices during life." The Congress should define "good behavior" and provide an easier and readier manner of ridding ourselves of undesirable United States judges whose judicial conduct is not "good behavior." Removal by impeachment is too unwieldy, cumbersome, uncertain, and difficult. Personally I advocate the abolition of all inferior Federal courts.

The Temple of Delphi was scarcely more sacred to the ancient Greeks than the Federal judiciary is to many of our fellow citizens. As a lawyer I have lawsuits for clients pending in every court of my State—the Supreme Court of Ohio, the court of appeals, and the common pleas court of my county, and in the United States court. I respect and admire just and honorable judges. In fact, my father was for more than 10 years a common pleas judge in Ohio. Nevertheless it is a fact that Federal judges of our country have usurped powers and functions and have too frequently made a mockery of trial by jury. Federal courts are tending to become too arbitrary.

The judges, cloistered in their courts, often are too far removed from changing economic thoughts, trends, and conditions. Instead of increasing the jurisdiction of inferior Federal courts and adding to the authority thereof, I hope we may in time eliminate such courts by transferring the jurisdiction and powers to State courts and to the Supreme Court of the United States.

The right of trial by jury is one of the most sacred of rights. For one thing, our Declaration of Independence indicted the English Crown for depriving us, in many cases, of the benefits of trial by jury. We in the Congress should safeguard and strengthen the right of trial by jury and be vigilant that no tyrannical Federal judge in the enforcement of these new criminal laws, or any criminal statutes, be permitted to deny, or make a mockery of, the right of trial by jury which is our priceless heritage.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I rise in opposition to the amendment. I am one of the admirers of our good colleague from Ohio [Mr. YOUNG], and I appreciate his splendid ability. I appreciate his past service to the country in his State legislature, over which on occasions he may have presided as speaker, and the good work that he is doing here in this House, but I cannot agree with him when he says that the Attorney General of the United States had made "an asinine utterance", because our able and efficient Attorney General is trying to break up the gangsters in the United States.

If, by appropriating several times $25,000 for rewards—I think it would be money well spent—if it would be instrumental in breaking up lawlessness in the United States. To continue having gangsters running from one side of the country to the other now, putting terror into the hearts of the people, ignoring the law and telling the Government of the United States to go hence, is simply unthinkable. Does our friend from Ohio fully appreciate the situation? Is he indifferent to the duty that we owe society? I would be willing to appropriate ten times several times $25,000 today if we could find the gangsters who abducted Lindbergh's baby, and hang them as high as Haman. What is money if we could bring to justice the infamous scoundrels who committed that dastardly crime?

Mr. YOUNG. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes; because I think our friend just got off the reservation for a little while.

Mr. YOUNG. I thank the gentleman for his kindly comment as to myself. I served in the General Assembly of Ohio for two terms, but I was not speaker of the house. However, I was a prosecuting attorney of the largest and most populous county of the State of Ohio, and, as such, I tried continuously, without stopping, 318 criminal cases, to juries, and did that in less than 2 years.

Mr. BLANTON. I cannot yield further.

Mr. YOUNG. And some of those men are still in the Ohio penitentiary.

Mr. BLANTON. I cannot yield any further.

Mr. YOUNG. The gentleman surely does not believe that there are 200,000 armed gangsters rampant in the country.

Mr. BLANTON. If our Attorney General said so, it is so. Mr. Speaker, I prefaced my remarks by saying that I was a great admirer of the splendid services of our friend from Ohio. I had a similar experience to the one that he related. For 8 years I carried my district attorney and my court reporter around from county to county trying criminals in five big counties and I had to sentence a lot of them to the penitentiary. I know the necessity for breaking up these gangs. Has the gentleman read the New York Times this morning about gunmen killing policemen and shooting down two others and wounding several?

Mr. YOUNG. Yes; and still the gentleman from Ohio says it is absurd to say there are 200,000 gangsters rampant.

Mr. BLANTON. I am sorry I cannot yield further. But there must be a lot of gangsters situated in every big city of the Nation, because a man like Dillinger could not long evade our officers of the law without having protection. He is getting protection from a lot of peace officers in the big cities, or he would not get away with it. [Applause.] There is a certain bad element among the peace officers in every big city of the United States that helps to harbor criminals. We want to break it up. We want to find the ones that are good and keep them in the service, and we want to find the ones who are bad and kick them out. It is hard to get them out in some of the big cities. Most of the Metropolitan Police Force in the great Nation's Capital, for instance, is the best in the world, but there could be a black sheep in the service. The Commissioners might want to kick him out but they do not have the power to do it now. They could not do it if they wanted to do it. They have to put him up before a trial board of policemen, his own fellows, to sit in hearing on him, and if they decide from personal feeling or otherwise that they do not want to get rid of him, they keep him in, no matter what the Commissioners decide.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] has expired.

$25,000 REWARD BILL WILL BE HELPFUL TO ATTORNEY GENERAL

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. YOUNG] states that his experience as a prosecuting attorney and his experience in the Ohio Legislature has convinced him that this is a frivolous bill. I just want to tell the gentleman that I had the honor of serving as a prosecuting attorney in Texas, and I have had a great deal of experience with criminals, having almost lost my own life in a personal encounter with one, and many other unfortunate experiences with criminals and racketeers in general. I believe this is a good bill. The Attorney General of the United States has recommended it. He says it will be very helpful to him. I think it will be helpful for this reason: Generally the local peace officers of this country are good men. They are among our most patriotic citizens in time of peace. They will not unduly or very willingly place themselves in the path of danger of a Dillinger or a Clyde Barrow, who is merely passing through and has not violated a law within their jurisdiction. I say they are wrong if they do not do it. It is their duty to make an honest attempt to capture any criminal who is wanted in any State and who is within their jurisdiction. That is part of their job; they assume that risk when they accept the office. We should help these officers all we can. We are expecting a great deal when we expect one little constable to capture a gang of criminals armed with machine guns.

MONEY MADE UP TO BURY PEACE OFFICER

There was one peace officer in a southwestern city, just a constable making $50, $75, or $100 a month, who attempted to apprehend one of these criminals, and his life was taken very quickly. He left a wife and 11 children. They had to make up money to bury him. He left absolutely nothing. Peace officers all over the Nation are being killed just that way. I think if we had some way of paying people for information and for the apprehension, dead or alive, of a person who is so bad as to be designated by the Attorney General of the United States as a public enemy, it would be very helpful. I do not believe there is the least danger of any Attorney General abusing this power; it will certainly be used with caution and prudence. As it is today, the only reward for Dillinger is $25; it is offered by the State of Indiana.

$50,000 LIMIT FOR APPREHENSION AND INFORMATION ON CRIMINALS

Under this bill there is a reward that might be offered up to $25,000 for the arrest of a criminal designated as a public enemy. That is not for one criminal, but that is for all criminals. The Attorney General may offer $500, $1,000, $10,000, or any amount up to $25,000 in any one case. There is another provision that up to $25,000 may be offered for information concerning not only one criminal, I will say to the gentleman from Ohio, but for all criminals. So now the gentleman from Ohio is endeavoring to reduce this amount.

Instead of $25,000 for all criminals apprehended and $25,000 for information leading to their arrest, the gentleman wants to restrict it to $10,000. If the gentleman is opposed to the bill he should oppose it and not try to cripple it by any such amendment as that.

Mr. YOUNG. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PATMAN. I yield.

Mr. YOUNG. Is it not probable, from news accounts, that had the Federal agents out in the country in Wisconsin taken the county law enforcement officials into their confidence instead of going there alone and shooting innocent people that they would have captured Dillinger?

Mr. PATMAN. They should, and I am sure they do, accept the cooperation of responsible local peace officers. All peace officers cannot be trusted. I have known of instances where Government agents would have probably lost their own lives if they had trusted certain peace officers. Some peace officers stand in with the criminals and are anxious to get all the information they can from the Government's agents in order to assist the criminals. Efforts to capture a criminal usually leads one into many counties and many States. An agent of the Department of Justice cannot offer a peace officer much inducement to go out of his own jurisdiction and run the risk of his own life to capture these bad criminals. If a reward is offered an inducement may be held out.

Mr. YOUNG. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PATMAN. I yield.

Mr. YOUNG. Is it not because the Federal agents blundered and killed an innocent man without warning——

Mr. PATMAN. Oh, the gentleman is making an assertion from the rankest kind of hearsay. The gentleman does not know whether they committed an error or not. The gentleman has been here in Congress. The agents of the Department of Justice have been up there after this man Dillinger. I presume they have used the very best judgment to protect not only the lives of their own men but the lives of citizens. We have no right to entertain any other kind of presumption unless we have undisputed proof to the contrary. No such proof has been presented to the Congress. I ask that this amendment be defeated, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. PATMAN] has expired.

Mr. OLIVER of New York. Mr. Speaker, I am rather amazed at the remarks of the gentleman from Ohio and his reflection upon the Attorney General of the United States. No man more able has held the office. No man deserves criticism less. He has administered his Department with great vigor and high honor. The Nation trusts him. Of course, I do not blame the gentleman from Ohio, whom I had never heard of before but who evidently heard of himself, for believing that there are not 250,000 gangsters in the United States after his experience as district attorney in the successful prosecution of so many criminals by himself, which he so eloquently described.

I hardly need defend the Attorney General of the United States, but in answer to the gentleman from Ohio who intended to depreciate the service the Attorney General is rendering, by taking up a remark so small as that which he took up, which remark was uttered to provoke the attention of the people of the United States to the great prevalence of organized and violent crime, I say to the gentleman from Ohio and to all that today, at the request of the Attorney General of the United States, we have marked an historic hour. The Government of the United States has come to the aid of its States under these bills, and the States will feel the full power of the encouragement and help of the United States just as much as the armies of France and England felt the help of the United States when we went to their rescue in the war. [Applause.]

The great Assistant Attorney General, Mr. Keenan, pointed out to the Nation time and again the necessity for the Federal Government turning the full power of its arm against organized crime. His record is brilliant, his energy boundless, his ability of the highest order.

Crime is organized until it has become as widespread as the jurisdiction of the Government of the United States. It has trampled down the States; it has flouted their laws; it has rendered them helpless. Now the Government of the United States, whose jurisdiction reaches over State lines, has come in to say: "We will all stand together; we will give them all the barrels in the governmental shotgun." [Applause.]

There is little good that can be served in this hour, little hope of success for any man who casts a slur upon those who stand against crime and for liberty. Liberty is lost as soon as crime gets its foothold. Crime and its invisible government have pronounced its own judgment of execution upon thousands of men in this country and has flung their bodies at the police headquarters of our largest cities as a challenge to organized government. Government today will organize under the auspices of the National Government and fling back the challenge to crime. The doom of crime has been sounded by the great bills we have passed today at the request of the Attorney General. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio.

The amendment was rejected.

ROAD BILL—H.R. 8781

Mr. CARTWRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD on the subject of road legislation.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oklahoma?

There was no objection.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, as Chairman of the Committee on Roads I believe it my duty to make a brief statement relative to H.R. 8781, commonly known as the "general public-roads bill." The committee has labored faithfully in perfecting this legislation, and I am glad to say reported unanimously in favor of its passage. The Rules Committee has reported a rule which will bring the bill up for consideration at an early date.

This bill authorizes a supplemental appropriation for emergency highway construction. It provides for the logical extension or renewal of the highway portions of the National Industrial Recovery Act of 1933. It is principally an employment measure. Its primary objective is to supply funds to keep the established State highway departments at work for the purpose of maintaining highway employment by Federal funds on a reasonable and adequate scale through the calendar year 1934 and into the construction season of 1935.

Briefly, the bill authorizes Federal appropriations to provide:

First. An additional grant of not less than $400,000,000 for roads, to be distributed among the States according to section 204 of the N.I.R.A.

Second. An additional fund of not less than $50,000,000 for forest, park, Indian Reservation, and other public-land roads according to section 205 of the N.I.R.A.

Third. An emergency fund of $10,000,000, which shall be at the disposal of the Secretary of Agriculture in meeting emergency conditions involving road or bridge replacements on the Federal-aid highway system in case of sudden disaster in any locality.

Other sections of the bill protect the proposed allotments of the new $400,000,000 grant against deductions on account of previous emergency advances to the States, and insure the elimination of restrictions (a) upon the amount of Federal funds which may be expended per mile of road and (b) upon Federal expenditures for road and street improvements within municipalities.

Except for the $10,000,000 emergency fund to be at the disposal of the Secretary of Agriculture, the bill does not involve new legislation.

It probably requires little or no explanation. The satisfactory results, both in employment and in improved highway facilities which now are being obtained, are well known to every Member of this body. They have been widely endorsed by citizens of every State.

We must now make a decision as to whether or not this worthy work shall be continued. The funds which have been previously provided will finance the highway activities on the present scale until the latter part of the present year.

Additional funds such as this bill proposes to authorize will be necessary to sustain the highway work after September.

The Chief of the Bureau of Public Roads presented comprehensive testimony recently before the House Roads Committee. In response to questions of the committee, he submitted highway-employment charts, which graphically portray the highway-employment picture with and without additional Federal funds. These charts are reproduced in the report of the hearings before your Commitee on Roads on February 23, the fundamentals of which are now embodied in the present bill, H.R. 8781. A study of these charts shows that the peak of highway employment will be reached in July and August of this year, and that thereafter employment will taper off rapidly.

In addition to showing the work directly upon the job itself, these charts indicate the large amount of industrial employment which is provided by the highway operations. By industrial employment, I mean employment in the furnishing of materials and transportation, and the building of equipment, all of which are a part of the operation of road building. The ratio is about 3 men off the job in industry to every 2 employed directly upon the work on the road job itself. The highway employment chart submitted by the Bureau of Public Roads shows that the drop in employment would be even more drastic in industrial employment than on the road job itself following the let-down which would occur after September 1.

Unless additional Federal funds are provided, we face the possibility of a premature withdrawal of Federal support in highway work. These sums along with other recovery expenditures have been dedicated to prime the industrial pump. Signs of its gripping are in sight, but admittedly it is not yet functioning alone. Premature withdrawal of Federal funds might easily cause an industrial collapse. This then is no time to halt or turn back; for on what sound premise can we anticipate that private industry will call for men at a fixed date in the future? It will be time enough to halt public employment when private industry actually issues the call. Any other course might suddenly nullify the beneficial results of the recovery program which are beginning to show themselves in so many directions and especially in the organized highway operations.

It is then logical and necessary that Congress should authorize the additional Federal appropriations which bill H.R. 8781 provides. The established organizations—the United States Bureau of Public Roads and the 48 State highway departments under their trained administrators—have enabled the Federal Government to put more men to work, in more places, faster, and with greater returns for the worker and taxpayer for each dollar expended than by any other public enterprise.

The House Roads Committee was unanimous in its support of the bill which you are now considering, and while recognizing the economic need of road building in every State, the committee gave its enthusiastic support to the measure at this time principally as a worthy employment measure.

I commend the measure to your favorable consideration and, on behalf of the House Roads Committee, recommend its passage.

REWARD FOR CAPTURE OF PUBLIC ENEMIES

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri: Page 2, line 14, strike out the colon, insert a period, and strike out all the language in lines 5 to 21, inclusive.

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Speaker, I offer a preferential motion.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the amendment of the gentleman from Connecticut.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. Goss: Page 2, line 15, after the word "appropriated", strike out "by" and insert the words "pursuant to the passage of."

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Speaker, when the bill was originally introduced by the gentleman from Texas, it was called to the attention of the Committee on Appropriations. It carried an appropriation. Under the policy we have agreed upon in the Appropriations Committee, the gentleman from Texas reintroduced the bill and sent it to the Committee on the Judiciary in order to have an authorization.

I thought there was an authorization only to the bill, but I am left in doubt by the present language. I think the bill should be amended as I have indicated to make the authorization clear.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will yield, I would suggest that the purpose the gentleman has in mind may be effectuated by the insertion of the words "authorized to be" before the word "appropriated" in line 15 on page 2.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I see no objection to such an amendment, and I think that would accomplish the purpose the gentleman has in mind.

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Speaker, with the understanding that the gentleman from Texas will offer such an amendment, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw my amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Connecticut?

There was no objection.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. SUMNERS of Texas: Page 2, line 15, after the word "money", insert the words "authorized to be."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri: Page 2, beginning in line 14, strike out the colon, insert a period, and strike out lines 15 to 21, inclusive.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, it is not my purpose to weaken but rather to strengthen this bill. In my opinion, the House has done some real work today in passing these bills to prevent crime.

You amended in a few minutes the Kidnaping Act, a bill introduced by Senator PATTERSON in the Senate and myself in the House. I stood on the floor of this House for 3 hours and fought for the passage of the bill I introduced. The act is commonly called the "Lindbergh Act", and was introduced long before the Lindbergh baby was ever kidnaped. We amended the Extortion Act today, an act that carries my name, which I introduced in this House. Under this act, which has been in force just a short time, 30 people have been sent to the penitentiary from my city alone. That proved it was necessary. You improved it today.

My objection is not to the first proviso. That can be reinstated in conference. It is the second proviso that I object to, that no person shall be designated as a public enemy within the purview of this act who has not theretofore been convicted in a court of competent jurisdiction of a felony involving violence.

Do you know that under such terms you would not have been able to offer a reward for the apprehension of Capone and a lot of other men of his type? We have men of that character all over the country today, men who have not been convicted of a crime because they have been well supplied with money, and because they have had influence with the courts. They are dangerous public enemies and you eliminate them.

I do not think that the proviso is necessary, and I sincerely hope that the chairman of the committee may accept my amendment. It was not in the original bill, but was added by the committee.

Mr. ROMJUE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. ROMJUE. Why does the gentleman want to strike out lines 15 to 17?

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. The only reason I offered the amendment to strike out those lines is that my amendment would not have been germane if I had not done so. The House agreed to the committee amendment while I was on my feet asking for recognition. An objection was made to vacating those proceedings, and in order to get recognition from the Chair I was forced to include both provisos. I am not in favor of striking out the first proviso; that can be put back in conference.

Mr. ROMJUE. I am sure that part of it is agreeable to the Department of Justice.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Yes; and most agreeable to me, but of necessity in order to secure recognition I was forced to include it in my amendment. I seek to strengthen the bill. The Attorney General would not object to my amendment. I hope it prevails.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, in order that the gentleman's proposition may be brought up for consideration of the House I ask unanimous consent that we return to page 2 and that the gentleman from Missouri be permitted to offer an amendment beginning with the proviso on page 2, line 17.

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, is that the last proviso on line 17?

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Yes; that is all.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment on page 17 as follows: After the word "States" strike out the colon, add a period, and strike out the proviso following.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri: After the word "States" in line 17 on page 2, strike out the colon and the proviso following ending in line 21.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Speaker, a point of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. DOWELL. This procedure is not in order. There is a way to reach this, however, but it is out of order to strike out an amendment that has already been adopted.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I asked and received unanimous consent.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Speaker, I want the gentleman to proceed in a parliamentary manner.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, you can do practically anything by unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. We are proceeding under a unanimous-consent request, which has been granted by the House.

Mr. DOWELL. The unanimous-consent request was to return to a particular section, which was granted.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, there was no point of order made against the request.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The unanimous-consent request was that the gentleman might also offer the amendment which has just been reported. The House gave its consent, and the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COCHRAN] has offered his amendment pursuant to the unanimous consent granted by the House. The Chair therefore overrules the point of order.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I should like to have the attention of the House while I endeavor to explain this proposition.

It will be observed that on page 1 appears the language "captured dead or alive." The Attorney General is permitted to make the designation. There was a difference in committee as to whether that language, "dead or alive," should go in or not, but the majority of the committee thought it should go in, but with the limitation that it should apply only in cases of persons with a criminal record, as specified in the bill. The Attorney General picks out the individual and offers a certain amount of money for that person, dead or alive. The majority of the committee thought, especially in the experimental stage of this rather extraordinary legislation, that the Attorney General should not be permitted to designate a person for whom a reward would be offered, dead or alive, if the individual did not have a prior record. That is the reason that actuated the committee. There are many members of the committee who agree with the distinguished gentleman from Missouri.

Of course, it is expected the Attorney General will be cautious, but, looking at the matter from the standpoint of power given, this is an authorization to the Attorney General to pick a person who has not been convicted of the character of crime designated and say, "Now, I will give you $5,000 to kill him", it was thought by the committee that the bill ought not to go farther than that.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Yes.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Let us look at the matter in this way: Suppose this man, Dillinger, who has the country excited now, had never been convicted of a crime. Could the Attorney General, with this provision in the bill, offer any reward for his apprehension? I will rest my case there. Does the gentleman feel willing to keep this proviso in the bill, when the Attorney General's hands would be tied, to offer a reward for a man of the type of Dillinger if he had never been convicted of a crime?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. May I say to my friend from Missouri that if it were an ordinary reward for arrest I would appreciate the force of what the gentleman has said, but this is not a reward limited to arrest. This is a reward for anybody who will kill such a man, and you are leaving the determination as to what human being it shall be, not necessarily to the present Attorney General, but to whatever human being may happen to be the Attorney General. The bill goes far enough. I know we are very nervous now and we all see Dillinger under our beds at night and all that sort of thing, but I think there is such a thing as trying to act as sanely as we can, even if Dillinger has not yet been arrested. It is well known I do not favor going the route marked out by these bills we have passed today. Seeing the development with regard to crime of the condition at which we have arrived and the necessity of strengthening and coordinating the agencies of government dealing with crime, I introduced a bill authorizing compacts among the States which would make possible the coordination of their agencies of detection, arrest, and prosecution. With State police forces supplemented by local police it was my hope and belief that but little Federal assistance would be required. But the Senate failed to pass the bill. There was practically no public interest and now the whole situation has exploded. The majority of the people whom I represent want these bills passed. This Government belongs to the people. They are sovereign. I am their Representative and it is my duty now to be their Representative and to reflect their will by aiding in putting these bills through to their final passage.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Speaker, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Permit me to suggest to the Membership of the House that we are embarking upon strange fields, trying new ventures here. We have gone far from the old and accepted ways.

We are undertaking to try a new method. We are undertaking today the passage of a number of bills of which prophecy alone can tell us where they are going to lead us. Here we are asked to withdraw this amendment that the committee, after the most careful and painstaking consideration has adopted, and provide instead that the Attorney General may convict and order the death penalty for a man without trial, without hearing, who has, perhaps, never committed a crime; who does not know, perhaps, he is even charged with a crime, and offering a reward of $25,000 for his being taken, dead or alive.

It may be said that the Attorney General is not going to do this, but it is all within the purview of human agencies, and the committee felt, as the chairman has well told you, it was a dangerous embarkation upon an untried road.

I can imagine cases where even any man might not be safe or I can imagine men who might incur the displeasure of the Attorney General, and all you have to do is to place a reward——

Mr. PATMAN. The gentleman does not think they would do that.

Mr. LLOYD. I do not know—your Texas delegation might be reduced.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LLOYD. I yield.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Suppose the identity of the man who kidnapped the Lindbergh baby was known and that man had never been convicted of a crime—I am using the word "convicted", the bill so reads—would the gentleman be in favor of offering a reward of $25,000 for anybody who would shoot him?

Mr. LLOYD. Let me ask the gentleman——

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. I have asked the gentleman a question.

Mr. LLOYD. And I ask the gentleman a question in return. If you were charged by newspaper publicity with being the kidnapper of the Lindbergh baby and did not have a thing to do with it, would you want a reward of $25,000 placed upon your head so that every constable in the country would be out gunning for you?

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. If I were the Attorney General of the United States and after investigation were convinced that the man was guilty of the crime, I would issue the reward immediately, but I would have to be convinced first that he was the guilty party. The Attorney General will not act until he knows what he is doing.

Mr. LLOYD. Are we going to have men tried for their lives by juries in this country, or are we going to have them tried by the Attorney General upon his own ipse dixit, upon newspaper report, or upon notoriety, or what not?

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Why did not the gentleman come in here and oppose the whole bill?

Mr. LLOYD. I am not opposing the bill.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Of course not, and nobody else is against it, because of public opinion.

Mr. LLOYD. I am not opposed to the bill if you will keep it within proper limits.

Mr. BOILEAU. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LLOYD. I yield.

Mr. BOILEAU. We have heard a great deal lately about crimes committed by certain unknown persons. We have heard of screen murders in Milwaukee where some unknown person or persons committed many murders and we have heard of other murders in certain places where a masked bandit has committed the crimes. Does this bill provide that a reward can be offered for the apprehension of such an individual?

Mr. LLOYD. Absolutely, if the amendment is adopted, whether he has ever been convicted of a crime or not.

Mr. BOILEAU. This is an unknown person. He has committed several murders, for instance, but we do not know who he is and we cannot find out whether he has been convicted of a crime or not.

Mr. LLOYD. If the Attorney General can designate him, then the reward stands.

Mr. BOILEAU. But he must first find out what the man's name is.

Mr. LLOYD. No; he does not have to have the name in order to designate him. If he can describe him with sufficient certainty, that would be within the purview of the bill.

Mr. BOILEAU. Unless he knows the man's name and has obtained the police record, he doesn't know whether he was convicted of a crime or not, and therefore he cannot offer the reward.

Mr. LLOYD. The committee is very much against the idea of offering shotgun rewards for whoever may be suspected.

Mr. BOILEAU. I appreciate the necessity of going cautiously, but under the circumstances it seems to me that if a man was successful in hiding his identity, until they find out who the man is they are unable to find out whether he has a police record or not.

Mr. LLOYD. Does not the gentleman think they had better find out who he is before they kill him?

[Several Members demanded the regular order.]

Mr. SHANNON. Mr. Speaker, I rise to oppose the amendment. I want to say that this is a hysterical moment in the Nation. Naturally the gentleman who offered the amendment has done so in good faith, and the committee comes in with the original proposition, also in good faith.

There is great danger in permitting any man to designate somebody as a public enemy and offering a reward for him, dead or alive. There is danger to the Nation, danger to the official, and danger of the loss of public sentiment.

The greatest bandit up to the present time was a man in our State, Jesse James. The administration that prosecuted him and finally brought on his death never lived down the stigma of hiring men to kill him. Later on, when the members of his gang were brought to trial in our State they were acquitted largely because the administration had done that.

Now, treating both sides fairly in this matter, the committee has gone a long way toward putting a limit to whether the Attorney General could designate a man who has not had some kind of a record of previous conviction. I am doubtful that the Nation should ever offer a reward for a man dead. This Nation is big enough to capture any criminal. That was the impression that the people of Missouri had. They condemned the administration because they said it was not necessary to hire people to kill a desperado.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHANNON. I yield.

Mr. BLANTON. Was not Jesse James a man that you could not take alive? There are bandits that you cannot take alive.

Mr. SHANNON. I am saying that the law may go too far.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. If the committee is going half way why not go the whole way?

Mr. SHANNON. The committee bill requires a record of prior conviction. I doubt very much the wisdom of officially authorizing anybody to say, "Bring him in dead."

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. If you are going to pass the bill, why not put teeth in it?

Mr. SHANNON. You can get too many teeth in laws, and cause a disrespect for them. There were too many teeth in the prohibition law, which resulted in public resentment to it.

Mr. BOILEAU. Mr. Speaker, I rise in opposition to the amendment, to get the opinion of the chairman of the committee in respect to this amendment. I mentioned a hypothetical case a few moments ago where some individual who was not identified by name or in any other way goes about terrorizing a community. There have been many such instances. We do not know who he is, but we do know a certain man is killing people. We have descriptions of him, but we do not know his name. There are methods of identifying him, but he has not been apprehended and they do not know what his name is. It would be impossible in that case to get a police record to determine whether he has ever been convicted. Do I understand that the committee is opposed to permitting the Attorney General to offer rewards for the apprehension of such an individual?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. We have at present a rather remarkable attitude of public mind. Just yesterday, as time is measured in a people's history, we had the defendant surrounded by all sorts of ridiculous presumptions and advantages; and now we are in danger, in my judgment, of swinging just as far in the other direction and causing a reaction of public opinion and sentiment. I used to be a prosecuting attorney myself. I have been very much interested in the study of crime and its prevention. This is the first time in 30 years that I know of when public opinion is in an attitude which would afford a chance to clean up the crooked officials who are responsible for the existing organized crime, and in that clean up, in the effort to do it, develop a strength on the part of the people, as the governors of this country, which as a people we need for general purposes. This is a very far-reaching bill, which everybody recognizes as such.

Here is an authorization by the National Congress to whomsoever happens to be the Attorney General to do that which in effect amounts to signing the death warrant of a human being before trial. The committee has taken into consideration the menace of organized crime, and the necessity at the moment of doing extraordinary things, but it is not unmindful of how far it has gone, even when a man can be designated by name, and is a man with a criminal record. Personally I agree with my friend from Missouri [Mr. SHANNON] that we better be careful how far we go. We better feel our way a little bit. This bill as it now provides goes quite far enough the committee feels.

Mr. BOILEAU. The Attorney General could not make the mistake of identifying the wrong person unless he names the person. If he said, "There is a reward of $5,000 for the man who is committing all the murders, known as "the masked bandit"——

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. You had better go and arrest somebody first then try him. There is too much danger about that.

Mr. BOILEAU. It seems to me if we are going to offer rewards, we should be willing to make rewards in cases of that kind and leave it to the good judgment of the Attorney General.

Mr. FORD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOILEAU. I think the gentleman has in mind a case something like that of Jack-the-Ripper. That did not occur in the United States. He was not known as an individual any more than by that name. If an instance of that kind were to occur in the United States and the Attorney General said, "$25,000 reward, dead or alive, for Jack-the-Ripper", and nobody knows who he is except by that name, given him by the newspapers, do you want to authorize the Attorney General to go out and get that man on that kind of a statement?

Mr. BOILEAU. Personally, I would be in favor of offering a reward for the capture dead or alive of a Jack-the-Ripper. It would be up to the individual who killed him to show that he was Jack-the-Ripper, and it would be a good service to society done by that individual if Jack-the-Ripper were apprehended dead or alive.

Mr. FORD. But suppose he shot the wrong man?

Mr. BOILEAU. He might kill the wrong man, even if the man were given his right name. There is no more danger of such a thing in one instance than there is in the other.

Mr. OLIVER of New York. The gentleman asked me a question a moment ago with reference to this bill. May I not ask the gentleman if the usual reward is not predicated upon arrest and conviction?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Absolutely.

Mr. OLIVER of New York. There is no death penalty at all. This bill goes so far beyond that that we give the power not for conviction but for destruction in the Attorney General.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. That is right.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. For that reason the gentleman and I disagree with the theory of this bill.

Mr. OLIVER of New York. And I will vote against the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COCHRAN].

The amendment was rejected.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The bill was passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. FADDIS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 5 minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. FADDIS. Mr. Speaker and Members of the House, I arise to place before the House a case which constitutes a grave affront to the dignity, decorum, and propriety of this House and the correction of which is the duty of every honest Member of the House to consider.

Edmund F. Erk, a former Member of this House, is a candidate for Congress on both the Republican and Democratic tickets in the Thirtieth Pennsylvania District. He is an opponent of my colleague, Hon. J. Twing Brooks, on the Democratic ticket. Mr. Erk is at present a clerk to Hon. MICHAEL MULDOWNEY, Thirty-second Pennsylvania District, at a salary of $2,907 per year. In the conduct of his campaign, and under the cover of being a clerk to a Member of this House, he is circulating by mail letters by the thousands on stationery headed "Congress of the United States, House of Representatives, Washington, D.C." In these letters he includes certain misleading statements and paragraphs which are intended to mislead the electors by seeking to imply that he is at the present time a Member of this House. It is a most reprehensible, dishonorable, and unethical method of campaigning and its defense is impossible by any honorable Member of this House. I maintain by his conduct that he has so flagrantly violated all the ethics of fairness, honesty, and integrity, that he has forfeited his right to be even a clerk to a Member of this House to say nothing of returning to it as a Member.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FADDIS. I yield.

Mr. O'CONNOR. I hope before the gentleman finishes he will place the entire letter in the RECORD. I have read it. It is one of the greatest gems I have read in many a year. It will go down in history with some other famous congressional communications. There are some sentences in that letter that I cannot possibly understand, and I do not believe anybody in the House can possibly interpret what they mean.

I do not know whether the gentleman has made it clear that the letterhead on which these letters are written simply reads "Congress of the United States", and that Mr. Erk gives his office as the House Office Building. He also relates in his most peculiar style about "supporting the President during the past year", and that his "congressional duties" have borne him down so that he could not get back to Pittsburgh. The gentleman forgot to say that before Mr. Erk was a Congressman he was a secretary. When he was defeated for Congress he again became a secretary, and maybe worth the $2,900 he is alleged to be getting; but these 60,000 "congressional" letters that he has sent into this district are the greatest fraud and deceit of which I have ever heard. They are clearly intended to deceive the voter into believing Mr. Erk is at present the Congressman from that district. He talks about being "reelected" to Congress.

The gentleman speaking also hears there is another similar situation in Pennsylvania where a man who has not been in Congress for years, and who is not even now a secretary to a Member of Congress, is using "Congress of the United States" stationery to campaign for office, intending to deceive the voters. This House ought to do something about it. This Erk case is so vicious that the Speaker or somebody in control of the employees of this House ought to immediately put him out of the House Office Building and not let him even enter that building.

Mr. THOMASON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FADDIS. I yield.

Mr. THOMASON. Is this being franked?

Mr. FADDIS. I do not know. I think not.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FADDIS] has expired.

Mr. BULWINKLE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may proceed for 5 additional minutes.

Mr. TABER. I think, Mr. Speaker, we ought to have a quorum present.

Mr. BULWINKLE. I may say to the gentleman from New York that at my request the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FADDIS], did not attempt to present this matter upon the convening of the House but withheld it until we finished the consideration of the bills called up by the Judiciary Committee. I told the gentleman from Pennsylvania I thought we could arrange for him to have the time. I ask the gentleman from New York to withdraw his point of order.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, with the understanding that there will be no further requests, I withdraw my point of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina?

There was no objection.

Mr. FADDIS. I read to you the second paragraph of his letter:

I have constantly cherished the hope that during the present campaign I might see you long before this, to solicit your counsel, and talk about the political situation in our congressional district, the Thirtieth, but throughout the past year or more recovery legislation and its attendant responsibilities, vast and extraordinary congressional duties, fraught with so many vital and perplexing problems, have weighed upon me mighty heavily; so much so that I have practically lost all conception of time in the performance of my duties and, in consequence, had to abandon my plans of seeing more of you, but, then, it is especially true among friends that "absence makes the heart grow fonder."

I ask you in all candor, Does this not imply that he is at the present time a Member of this body?

I read to you the third paragraph of his letter:

I am not unmindful but appreciate the fact that during my service as a secretary and later as a Representative in Congress, the friendship, cooperation, and expressions of good wishes emanating from a source such as yourself have been the sustaining joy that has lightened and gladdened my way.

I call to your attention the fact that in this paragraph he makes mention of the fact that he was a secretary, later a Representative in Congress, but does not mention the fact that he is at the present time a clerk.

I read to you the fifth paragraph of his letter:

Impressed by that confidence expressed in the judgment of the good people who have heretofore honored me with the privilege of representing them in the Congress of the United States, I am a candidate for reelection on my record.

Here he states—

I am a candidate for reelection on my record.

I read to you the sixth paragraph of his letter:

With sincere gratitude for having elevated me to represent my people in the legislative branch of the greatest Government in all the world, I acknowledge the faith of the voters, and here renew my pledge to serve my district and my Nation so that I shall always merit every confidence in my ability to act for them.

I read to you the eighth paragraph of his letter:

If reelected to Congress, it would continue to be my policy and purpose to give unqualified support to the President and to Congress in furthering all constructive measures designed to establish a basis for permanent recovery and economic stability beneficial to all of the people.

Does he not in this paragraph plainly imply that he has been a Member of Congress during the past 2 years? He mentions that if reelected he will continue to support the President when, as a matter of fact, he has never served as a Member of Congress under the administration of Franklin D. Roosevelt.

He signs the letter "Edmund F. Erk, home address 1208 Haslage Avenue, N.S., Pittsburgh, Pa." In the left-hand lower corner he places suite 408, House Office Building, Washington, D.C. He makes no mention of the fact that this suite number is the office of the Honorable MICHAEL JOSEPH MULDOWNEY.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FADDIS. I yield.

Mr. O'CONNOR. I spoke to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MULDOWNEY] yesterday, for whom I have a very high regard. I called his attention to this incident and informed him that one of his clerks was going to get "blasted" on the floor of the House, which he well deserved. I do not see the gentleman from Pennsylvania here today. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MULDOWNEY] stated, when I brought the matter to his attention, that he was very much incensed about it; that he had no idea that this clerk of his was doing such an unfair and deceitful thing, and that had he known it he would not have countenanced it.

Mr. FULLER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FADDIS. I yield.

Mr. FULLER. Does the gentleman know whether the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MULDOWNEY] is still keeping this clerk?

Mr. FADDIS. I do not know; I have not asked him that.

Mr. O'CONNOR. I understand that this clerk is now in Pittsburgh campaigning.

Mr. FULLER. How did he get these congressional letterheads?

Mr. FADDIS. He sent these letters out some time ago, They do not bear Mr. MULDOWNEY's name.

Mr. FULLER. I know; but is not a Member of Congress the only person who can get congressional letterheads from the stationery room?

Mr. O'CONNOR. I do not think that can be so. If that be the case, how did this Congressman who served 6 years ago get the stationery he is now using? He is a Democrat, too, by the way.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FADDIS. I yield.

Mr. TABER. That is not a congressional letterhead, is it?

Mr. FULLER. Certainly it is.

Mr. FADDIS. It certainly is; I have one right here.

Mr. ROMJUE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FADDIS. I yield.

Mr. ROMJUE. If I recollect aright, this gentleman is a Republican and formerly served in the House as a Republican.

Mr. FADDIS. Exactly.

Mr. ROMJUE. And he is now running as a Republican backing Roosevelt. So he is rather smart.

Mr. FADDIS. He is trying to get in by hanging onto the tail of the Roosevelt kite, that is all.

Mr. BOILEAU. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FADDIS. I yield.

Mr. BOILEAU. Is it not a fact that the man about whom the gentleman is now talking is running on both the Republican and Democratic tickets?

Mr. FADDIS. Exactly; he is a "primary raider"; that is what he is.

Mr. BOILEAU. I did not want to characterize his actions.

Mr. FADDIS. I hope no reputable Member of the House would undertake to defend such tactics as this.

Mr. FULLER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. FADDIS. I yield.

Mr. FULLER. The gentleman knows, as does every man in Pennsylvania, that this clerk to a Congressman, seeking reelection on both tickets, is opposing a man who has supported the Roosevelt program.

Mr. FADDIS. Certainly; he is running against a man who is supporting the President's program.

Mr. FULLER. The man whom this fellow is serving as clerk has not supported the President's program either.

Mr. DUNN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. DUNN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time may be extended 5 minutes.

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, and I have no objection to this personally, we had an agreement on both sides that there would be no further extensions.

Mr. BULWINKLE. I hope the gentleman will be allowed to finish his speech.

Mr. DUNN. Mr. Speaker, I have been brought into this discussion, and for that reason feel that the gentleman's time should be extended that I may ask him a question.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. DUNN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FADDIS. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania for a question only.

Mr. DUNN. A gentleman made the statement that this individual referred to is running on both tickets. This does not signify that he is a Democrat.

Mr. FADDIS. Mr. Speaker, I did not yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania to make a speech in his own behalf. I desire to finish my statement.

Mr. DUNN. The point I want to make is that he is not a Democrat just because he is running on both tickets. At the present time I am running on both tickets.

Mr. FADDIS. Mr. Speaker, I decline to yield further.

Mr. MILLARD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FADDIS. I yield to the gentleman from New York for a short question.

Mr. MILLARD. For the RECORD the gentleman will admit that he is a Democrat?

Mr. FADDIS. Yes. I am indeed proud to admit that fact.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FADDIS. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. In 1932 whom did Erk support for President of the United States?

Mr. FADDIS. Hoover.

Mr. EAGLE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FADDIS. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. EAGLE. May I make the observation that it is wholly immaterial whether he be a Democrat or Republican for the purposes to which the gentleman is calling attention. There is no partisanship in this matter.

Mr. FADDIS. No; it is by no means a partisan matter. This letter is plainly and unmistakably a deliberate effort to deceive the electors of the Thirtieth Congressional District of Pennsylvania by implying that Mr. Erk is a present Member of this House. It is clearly an effort on the part of this candidate who would stoop to "primary raiding" in order to attach himself to the tail of the Roosevelt kite and endeavor to fly to victory under the misleading inference that he has given aid and support to the program of our peerless leader. He is in a class with the pirates of old, who, under cover of a peaceful flag, would sail close to an honest merchant ship; then, when within range, would hoist the "skull and bones" and pour a broadside across her decks.

I do not know whether or not it is a coincidence, but there appeared in the Washington Herald of May 2, 1934, a picture labeled as the Daughter of Representative Edmund F. Erk, at the Press Women's Carnival. This is exhibit A.

I feel that the House should take some action upon this gross attempt of its rights and dignity, and protect the rights of a bona fide Member of this House, the Honorable J. TWING BROOKS.

Mr. Speaker, I present a resolution and ask unanimous consent that the Clerk be allowed to read it from my time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

House joint resolution prohibiting the use of stationery of the House of Representatives for political purposes in certain cases

Resolved, etc., That whoever, except (or except on behalf of) a Member or officer of the House of Representatives, Member-elect, Delegate, Delegate-elect, Resident Commissioner, Resident Commissioner-elect, uses or causes to be used, for political purposes, any stationery so marked as to indicate that it is official stationery of the House of Representatives shall, upon conviction, be fined not more than $5,000 or imprisoned not more than 1 year, or both.

Mr. FADDIS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include the letter to which I have just referred.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

The letter follows:

A MESSAGE TO A FRIEND

CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D.C., April 17, 1934.

MY ESTEEMED FRIEND: I am taking this informal method of announcing my candidacy on the Republican and Democratic tickets for reelection to Congress, and in addressing you in this manner, at this time, I know it will not be construed as a customary piece of campaign literature but instead, its real purpose and intent will faithfully serve as a heart-to-heart chat among friends. In this connection, I plead extenuating circumstances and not a lack of vision or appreciation of our friendship.

I have constantly cherished the hope that during the present campaign I might see you long before this, to solicit your counsel, and talk about the political situation in our congressional district—the Thirtieth—but throughout the past year or more recovery legislation and its attendant responsibilities, vast and extraordinary congressional duties, fraught with so many vital and perplexing problems, have weighed upon me mighty heavily; so much so that I have practically lost all conception of time in the performance of my duties, and, in consequence, had to abandon my plans of seeing more of you; but, then, it is especially true among friends that "absence makes the heart grow fonder."

I am not unmindful but appreciate the fact that during my service as a secretary and later as a Representative in Congress, the friendship, cooperation, and expressions of good wishes emanating from a source, such as yourself, have been the sustaining joy that has lightened and gladdened my way.

Men have repeatedly risen to heights of great power and service to their fellows, not necessarily so much by reason of their own inherent genius or gifts as by the encouragement of a friend, some noble soul with whom they have consorted and who gave to them both impulse, inspiration, and opportunity. When I recall the old days I feel that you have been just such a source of inspiration to me. You know that we never have too many friends, and it is a pleasant duty to keep in touch with each other for auld lang syne. Next to the ties of kinship are those of friendship. Our acquaintances stand in one classification, our friends in another. In early life we are less discriminating than we are in our more mature years. The distinction between acquaintances and friends is not so marked as it is when we come to properly evaluate that which constitutes true friendship. It is also true that as we grow older those who come within the restricted area of true friends become dearer to us and we repose in them all our confidence and affection. We can find no better occupation during these days of deep reflection and retrospection than to pause and check up and discover to ourselves just where our philosophy of life has brought us.

Impressed by that confidence expressed in the judgment of the good people who have heretofore honored me with the privilege of representing them in the Congress of the United States, I am a candidate for reelection on my record.

With sincere gratitude for having elevated me to represent my people in the legislative branch of the greatest Government in all the world, I acknowledge the faith of the voters and here renew my pledge to serve my district and my Nation so that I shall always merit every confidence in my ability to act for them.

If I should capitalize the circumstances of my life, I shall do it for the good which might be built up out of them—not for myself but with myself for the good of others—for its own good in the last analysis.

If reelected to Congress, it would continue to be my policy and purpose to give unqualified support to the President and to Congress in furthering all constructive measures designed to establish a basis for permanent recovery and economic stability beneficial to all of the people.

May I urge you, both as a political duty and a personal favor to me, to register and vote in the primary election. May I also give the assurance that support of my candidacy will be a patriotic object worthy of your active interest from now until the polls close Tuesday, May 15, and if you will permit me, I would suggest that you make an earnest and determined effort to influence at least one or more other voters to vote for me.

To whatever action this communication may stimulate you, it will be appreciated by me. Assuring you of the pleasure it will give me at any time in an official or other way to serve you and your friends at Washington, and with the kindest personal regards, I am

Sincerely your friend,

EDMUND F. ERK,
Suite 408, House Office Building, Washington, D.C.

Home address: 1208 Haslage Avenue, N.S., Pittsburgh, Pa.

LOANS TO INDUSTRIES

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD on the subject of Loans to Industry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

There was no objection.

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Speaker, I desire to serve notice that unless the Banking and Currency Committee soon reports to this House legislation under which government loans may be made to industries, I shall deem it to be my duty to file a motion to discharge the committee so that this matter may be brought before the House for the earliest possible action.

I have the most friendly feeling for the Committee on Banking and Currency, whose chairman, Hon. HENRY B. STEAGALL, I regard as one of the ablest Members of this Congress. He has a most enviable record of constructive legislation to his credit. I am sure that all the members of that great committee are conscientious and are actuated by the most worthy purposes in their efforts to cope with the numerous and difficult problems that fall within the jurisdiction of the committee. In my proposal there is no criticism, either intended or implied, of Mr. STEAGALL and his committee.

But the fact remains that the committee is not functioning in the promotion of this very important and necessary legislation. It has held meeting after meeting, but it appears that as far as tangible results are concerned, there is nothing doing. The committee seems to have arrived at something that very closely resembles an impasse. If it develops that the committee cannot function, if it cannot compose its differences, then no harm is done and certainly no disrespect is intended if the House brings the subject matter out of committee to the floor, so that it may be dealt with in accordance with the best interests of the American people.

FIDDLING WHILE ROME BURNS

In this matter of loans to industries Congress is fiddling while Rome burns. It is time to put down the fiddle and bring out the fire department. It is a matter of the gravest importance that no more time shall be lost in making these loans. The loss in economic rehabilitation already is so tremendous that it is incalculable. If provision had been made months ago for these loans multitudes who were engaged on civil works during the winter and spring would, ere this, have been absorbed into normal employment. In the absence of this legislation which would have started the factories and restored normal processes of employment, millions of people will have to be continued on some form of glorified dole. That is not what these millions want. They do not want trumped-up jobs which, when all is said and done, are but a thin disguise for charity. The American people are not natural-born mendicants. They want regular jobs that will enable them to earn their living by honest toil and they are entitled to those jobs. It goes against the grain of a proud American freeman to be handed anything in the form of charity.

Pass this legislation making it possible for business men and manufacturers to secure capital for working purposes and you will find that the result will be amazing. Normal processes, so long dead or dormant, will be revived immediately. Thousands of manufacturers throughout the country have orders actually at hand, but no capital to enable them to make up the goods. Let the Government provide that capital on well-secured notes and watch the result. Factories will forthwith resume operations, business will begin to hum, and multiplied thousands who now have to humiliate themselves by going to township trustees for baskets of food will leave that gloomy trail of shame and distress, let us hope, never to return.

FIRST BILL ON THE SUBJECT

I think I am as much entitled as any Member of this House to feel restive over the delay or deadlock, or whatever it may be in the committee, that is jeopardizing the prospect of this legislation, now that the session of Congress is drawing rapidly to a close. I think I am the author of the first bill on this subject. On January 3, the opening day of the present session, I introduced a very simple, but I believe, very worthy measure (H.R. 6198) that would meet all of the requirements, the full text of which is as follows:

To aid in the resumption and carrying on of normal business and industrial activities the Reconstruction Finance Corporation is authorized to make direct loans to approved firms and corporations, such loans in all cases to be made under proper safeguards and to be based on securities that are adequate to guarantee repayment of principal and interest in full: Provided, That such loans shall be limited to providing funds for working capital.

It has been more than 4 months since that bill was referred to the Banking and Currency Committee and it certainly is not unreasonable to suggest that in so long a time there might have been action, especially in view of the widespread national reaction that immediately set in, favorable to the proposal. The distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. PRALL], chairman of the subcommittee to which the bill was referred, very courteously granted full time and opportunity for hearings thereon, and those Members who are interested will find nearly fifty pages of the printed hearings devoted to this measure.

MR. FREDRICK APPROVES MEASURE

The testimony given on my bill was most illuminating and I invite the attention of the House to it. Mr. John E. Fredrick, of Kokomo, Ind., president of the Indiana State Chamber of Commerce, was unable to attend the hearing on account of a conflicting engagement, but he sent a brief that is a model of cogent, sound reasoning, and which is set forth in the printed hearings. The State Chamber was represented by its manager, Mr. W. H. Arnett, a key business executive of our State. The Indiana Association of Manufacturers was represented by its able secretary, Mr. H. M. Cochrane. Representatives JAMES I. FARLEY, SAMUEL B. PETTENGILL, and JOHN W. BOEHNE spoke in favor of the measure. Messrs. FARLEY and BOEHNE are outstanding business men, the former having been at one time president of the Auburn Automobile Co. Mr. PETTENGILL is a lawyer of magnificent ability, in whose district are located some of the most important manufacturing plants of the entire country. I believe that no thinking man can read the hearings on my bill without becoming convinced of the absolute necessity of this legislation, if we are to pave the way for a real recovery in America.

DEFECTS OF GLASS BILL

With all due respect to Senator CARTER GLASS, of Virginia, whom I greatly admire for his rugged independence and sterling qualities, I believe the bill I have introduced on this subject of loans to industries is preferable to his plan. I fear the Glass bill would not accomplish the purposes desired. It ties the relief in with the Federal Reserve System and that, in my opinion, is not desirable. Under the Glass bill the same persons would operate the machinery for these loans that now manage the Federal Reserve banks. Half of the money to be loaned would not be public money but would be private money belonging to the Federal Reserve System. The men who control the Federal Reserve banks are distinctly banker-minded. They are ultraconservative-They lean backward in enforcing banking rules. The trouble with the banks throughout the country is that they are so conservative. They are not making loans. They are not functioning at all as public-service institutions.

SLIGHT MIXTURE OF PHILANTHROPY

Now, what is needed in making these proposed loans to industries is a little philanthropy mixed with banking philosophy. Those who will administer the loans need to be men of enough liberality that they are willing to take some things on faith. They should be men who have some confidence in the future of America and not men who imagine that it is the first duty of a banker in times like these to drive a nail in every dollar and fasten it to a wall where it cannot circulate.

This law will not be properly administered unless some risk is taken, but I believe it will be a slight risk and that the Government's dollars, after going out on this splendid mission of restoring normal business and manufacturing operations, will return to the United States Treasury as the loans are repaid, and that the final result will be immensely beneficial to the Federal Treasury as the stimulus to business and industry and the return of normalcy will inevitably swell the revenue receipts.

R.F.C. THE PROPER ADMINISTRATIVE AGENCY

I believe that the proper agency to administer this legislation, if it is to be administered satisfactorily and without the circuitous red-tape delays that are incidental to Federal Reserve banking, is the Reconstruction Finance Corporation; and I am convinced that the amount of loanable funds provided in Senator GLASS' bill, $280,000,000, is entirely inadequate to meet the situation. A much greater sum than that is needed as working capital for a large number of the smaller businesses and industries. To attain the maximum degree of good from the legislation, loans in the smaller amounts from $5,000 up to $50,000 should predominate. Industry all over the country is crying for these small loans, the situation in Indiana being well expressed in the following telegram sent by the president of our State chamber of commerce to President Roosevelt:

His Excellency FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT,
White House, Washington, D.C.:

Three hundred substantial industries in Indiana could, and would, add materially toward increasing employment if sufficient financial credit is made available. We respectfully urge your influence favoring the Ludlow bill or legislation with similar provisions. With hearty good wishes,

JOHN E. FREDRICK, President,
Indiana State Chamber of Commerce.

WE SHOULD BEGIN LENDING, CEASE SPENDING

We should cease spending and begin lending. We can never spend ourselves into a state of prosperity. Added debt burdens and pyramided tax rates only take us farther away from the goal of prosperity and happiness. But, by judiciously lending the Government's credit to revive normal business and industrial operations we can go far toward bringing about real recovery in America. I firmly believe that if instead of spending the enormous sum of $3,300,000,000 on uneconomic public works we had merely loaned half that amount to solvent business and industrial concerns to enable them to operate we would now be on the high road to prosperity and 95 percent of the money so loaned would ultimately return to the United States Treasury. Such use of the Government's credit is sound and businesslike, and Congress should not waste any time in passing this legislation.

ACTS STRENGTHENING THE CRIMINAL CODE

Mr. GLOVER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GLOVER. Mr. Speaker, ladies and gentlemen of the House, we have today considered the 10 bills proposed by Hon. Homer S. Cummings, Attorney General of the United States.

To my mind, the passage of these acts will be the finest day's work that Congress has ever done during my experience. I am sure the entire program of the Attorney General will be enacted into law.

Senate bill No. 2841 is an act to provide punishment for certain offenses against banks organized or operating under laws of the United States or any member of the Federal Reserve System. This will give jurisdiction to the Federal Government to aid the States in enforcing laws against violations of this kind. The jurisdiction is not given exclusively to the courts of the United States. The robbing of banks and killing of people for the purpose of taking away money deposited by citizens and those engaged in banking is a crime that should be severely punished, and this bill provides a punishment that will deter anyone from attempting bank robbery of this kind.

The next Senate bill, No. 2080, is an act to provide punishment for killing or assaulting Federal officers in the enforcement of the law and while on official duty. This bill also provides that whenever an indictment is found defective or insufficient for any cause, before the statute of limitations has expired and such period will expire before the end of the next term of the court to which such indictment was returned, a new indictment may be returned not later than the end of the next succeeding term of such court, regular or special, following the term at which such indictment was found defective or insufficient, during which a grand jury thereof shall be in session.

Senate bill 2575 is a bill to define certain crimes against the United States in connection with the administration of Federal penal and correctional institutions and to fix the punishment therefor. This bill provides that anyone who causes, assists in, or who conspires with any other person or persons to cause any riot or escape at such penal or correctional institution shall be punished with a severe penalty. It also provides that any person who conveys, or causes to be conveyed into such institution, or from place to place within such institution, any firearm, weapon, explosive, or any poisonous gas, or any other substance or thing designed to kill, injure, or disable any officer, shall be severely punished by a term in the penitentiary.

Senate bill 2253, one of the 10 bills to be enacted into law, makes it unlawful for any person to flee from one State to another for the purpose of avoiding prosecution or the giving of testimony in certain cases. It has been the habit of the gangsters when they knew persons would give testimony against them either to run them out of the State or do some act of violence to them to keep them from testifying. This bill will strengthen our law on that question and will prevent this practice in the future.

Senate bill 2252, another of the 10 bills, is a bill to amend the act forbidding the transportation of kidnaped persons in interstate commerce. Kidnaping under this bill is made a death penalty in certain cases, which certainly should be the law. Kidnaping has become so prevalent in the United States by gangsters that it must be broken up regardless of what the cost is. Nothing is more horrible than to think of a bunch of gangsters stealing a child, carrying it away, destroying its life if necessary to conceal their crime. It is one of the most horrible crimes the Nation has ever had to deal with, and when a man goes into that kind of business he sacrifices his right to live with law-abiding citizens, and the law cannot be too drastic.

House bill No. 9370 is a bill to authorize the Attorney General to offer rewards for the capture, dead or alive, of certain classes of gangsters that are now attempting to rule our Nation with force. The various killings that have been reported in the United States within the last 6 or 8 months by noted gangsters justifies the extermination of that kind of person regardless of what it costs to do it. This bill materially strengthens the hands of the Attorney General in fighting down this character of crime.

House bill 8912 is a bill to amend section 35 of the Criminal Code of the United States. This bill will materially strengthen the criminal law.

Senate bill 2845 is an act to further extend the provisions of the National Motor Vehicle Theft Act to other stolen property. The enactment and enforcement of this act will justify this character of legislation and this act will materially aid the law we now have on that subject.

There never has been such an organized body of men for the commission of grave crimes as we have had to contend with for the last 2 or 3 years. The laws against crime must be upheld and the power must be given to the courts and the officials enforcing the laws, so that crime can be punished. After the passage of these acts there will be no excuse on the part of those whose duty it is to enforce the law to say, "We have not the power to handle the situation." Then, we shall have a right to expect of them the enforcement of the law to the letter.

I am glad to see Congress giving every aid possible to those who have the duty of enforcing the law. It was my privilege to serve as prosecuting attorney of my district and I know how important it is to have law enforcement, also know how difficult it is to enforce the law against criminals without public sentiment backing up our officials. I am glad that Congress has heeded the public sentiment that has been so often expressed in the United States recently for law enforcement against crime. I am sure that whatever else is necessary to strengthen the hands of those whose duty it is to enforce the law, that power, so far as Congress is able to give it, will be given our officials.

We hope also that the States will follow this lead and will so strengthen the State laws that both the States and the Nation may cooperate together in a great way in putting down the crime we have, that is so prevalent in the United States.

Mr. JOHNSON of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include the statement of a former Member of the House, Knute Wefald, of Minnesota, on the Frazier-Lemke bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Minnesota?

There was no objection.

THE FRAZIER-LEMKE FARM REFINANCING BILL

Mr. JOHNSON of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following statement of Knud Wefald, Railroad and Warehouse Commissioner of Minnesota, and former Congressman from the Ninth Minnesota District:

It is noticeable, on reading the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, that while much support has been given the Frazier-Lemke farm refinancing bill on the floor of the House, not much has been said against it. This leads one to think that the arguments made for the bill are hard to answer successfully.

In the RECORD for April 18 appears, however, a statement by a Congressman against the bill, which, while it is kept in a friendly tone, ends up by saying that the arguments he has made against the passage of this measure are unanswerable. The Congressman brings out some points that have not had much discussion, evidently, but the points he raises relative to the main merit of the bill are not very hard to answer.

The Congressman submits proof as to his interest in the farmers' cause to the effect that he has during his congressional career supported good-roads legislation and the extension of rural mail service. Both of these matters were of interest to the farmers, but not among the farmers' greatest essential needs. Most of the good-roads money was not spent on farm roads.

The Congressman helped to create the Federal Land Bank System, which was evidently set up with good intentions, but which could in the long run not take care of the farmers' needs. He calls attention to the fact that during the last Congress legislation was passed to guarantee the interest on land-bank bonds, and that during the present Congress legislation has been passed to guarantee the principal of the bonds to the amount of $2,000,000,000, and the interest the farmers will have to pay upon their loans. Authority has also been granted so that these bonds can be exchanged for farm mortgages or 3¼-percent guaranteed new Federal land-bank bonds. Such bonds are now being traded for outstanding farm mortgages.

That legislation had to be passed to guarantee principal and interest of such bonds is conclusive proof that this farm-loan system has not served to help the farmers, who cannot even pay the interest.

The interest rate is too high and the mortgage indebtedness all too high under the high interest rate. This recent legislation was passed in the interest of the farmers' creditors, and any refunding of the farm debt under this system only adds to and prolongs the farmers' agony.

Any farm-loan system under which the farmers cannot meet their interest payments is an unjust system, which, if continued, will eventually place the farmers in perpetual bondage. It is also unjust for the Government to pay coupon clippers millions upon millions of dollars in interest payments that the business of farming cannot produce.

While second, third, and fourth mortgages upon farms, saddled on them during the war years, or the years following when Wall Street practiced its black art of finance at its worst, have now fallen away by their own weight, the first mortgages, except when they have been renewed and reduced, as has been the case with some loans held by insurance companies, were contracted during the times of inflated values, so the amount of the mortgages are now invariably out of proportion with farm values of today.

The idea in the Frazier-Lemke bill is, therefore, to liquidate the present unreasonably high farm mortgage indebtedness and refinance such portions of the indebtedness as would be just, in conformity with present values of farms, at a rate of interest so low that the farmers can meet their interest payment upon the indebtedness refinanced, so that the Government would not have to pay either all or any part of their interest payments.

The farmer is tired of standing before the country as a pauper or a beggar.

Only the United States Government is big enough and strong enough to undertake this task, but it is asked to do the job in such a manner that the Government would in the end lose nothing by it.

It is true that some of the present holders of farm mortgages might lose some money, and they ought to lose the difference between the inflated value of an era now dead, but whose cold and clammy hand yet rests upon the farmer in the form of a mortgage, and present-day honest value.

The farmers' slate must be wiped clean; the farmer must get a fresh, new start; he will have enough new problems to solve without dragging around a ball and chain in the shape of an unredeemable farm mortgage. The many new problems facing the farmer can only be solved by free men redeemed from unjust debts.

The Congressman raises objection to the provision in the bill that will allow loans by the Federal Government to be made to the limit of the full amount of the fair value of the land and 50 percent of the value of insurable buildings and improvements. He thinks no private person or institution would make loans up to this limit. Perhaps not. But a farm loan under the full amount of this limit would invariably be smaller than the amount of the loans now on the farms. If loans were made by the Government up to this limit, it would mean that the farmers' creditors would recover more nearly what they have invested in farm mortgages. It would be better for the farmer that less was borrowed, if only the legislation takes such form that by such new refinancing as the bill demands all old debts are washed out and liquidated.

The Frazier-Lemke bill, I believe, only intends to refinance present mortgage debts and does not ask that new loans be made otherwise. Therefore, the fear that the Congressman expresses, that the passage of this bill would result in every farmer who owns marginal and other low-class lands making a mortgage to the Government and, through such a mortgage, sell his land to the Government, is groundless.

Through the operation of a law under this bill the Government would, of course, obtain some poor or marginal lands, but only such lands as private money loaners, who are supposed to know what they are doing, had previously loaned money on. Such lands, if eventually saddled upon the Government, would be acquired at a very low price. The "brain trusters" are now racking their brains with the problem of the elimination of marginal lands from production, and if these lands should be acquired under legislation like that asked for in this bill, the problem of taking these out of production would be easily solved. Such lands could be put into timber or game preserves or put to other uses. Right now, under the new welfare legislation, the Government buys marginal lands here and there and turns them into playgrounds and recreation parks for the city poor.

The system of the present Federal Farm Loan set-up of forming local associations under which all in the association are, in effect, bound for the whole debt, is extremely wrong. It sprang out of the brain of Wall Street, a noble thought; it was better to have a stranglehold upon all in a given territory than just a single hold upon a single person.

The seed loans and personal-property loans are all right as far as they go, but they are in reality only pauper aid, and the administration of these loans in many localities is harsh and inhumane. But Congressmen know little about this, for they are away from home so long, and when they are home they are chasing votes and are always busy telling the people what they have done for them. The horde of Government officials, often rough with the farmers, always make their reports tell a nice, readable story.

The Congressman says he does not fear the currency inflation that would result from the passage of this bill, but he thinks the farmers should not ask for a lower rate of interest than what other interests pay or what the Government itself pays for money.

Well, if currency inflation is put on by the banks, the banks pay not to exceed one half of 1 percent for the use of the money they use for inflation purposes. That kind of money is bank money; the banks get the difference between the cost of the money and the loaning rate.

Let us have some farm money. Let the Government manufacture some money for the farmers and hold their farms for security. The farmers do not ask to get this money for less than 1½ percent; they are willing to pay the Government at least three times as much for making some farm money as it gets for making and delivering bank money, which bankers turn over and over again at endless profit.

The rate of interest demanded in the Frazier-Lemke bill is higher than the interest rate extended to the Italian Government on its war debt to us. And the farm interest, if the farm debt is refinanced on this basis, will be paid, while the war debts owing to us will never be paid.

We are entering upon a new economic era. Therefore, let us bury the iniquities of the past. Where there is overburdening debt on a class of people or an industry, it must be liquidated; where there is overcapitalization, that must be scaled down. All that our economic set-up suffers from is a maladjustment of interest-bearing debts on one hand and interest-earning overcapitalization on the other; between the two they sap the economic lifeblood out of our whole people.

As the day for the easing of debt loads has arrived, so the day of the scaling down of capital structures is approaching. Congress must in time face them both.

A Washington dispatch of April 21, commenting on the failure to obtain a settlement of the railroad wage dispute, says: "Failure to find a solution, it was indicated at the White House, would bring the railroads face to face with the alternative of scaling down their capital structure to lessen fixed charges or accepting Government owenership.

"The President feels the railroad capital structure is top-heavy. He also feels that by scaling down capital structures the whole question of railroad wages could be put on a stable, permanent basis."

The President is right. But, if it is true that he is opposed to the passage of the Frazier-Lemke bill, it is queer that he should be able to discern the solution of the railroad question as clearly as he does and not be able to see the same principle is involved in the solution of the farm problem as he so clearly visualizes must be applied to the railroad problem.

If Congress and the President set their minds on continuing the heavy, unreasonable, and unjust farm debt, the business of farming will break down and the farming business will be faced with the same dilemma now facing the railroads. There is this difference, however, that the railroads can follow the President's advice and scale down their capital structure, or they can help to do this, and if they need help from Congress, they can ask for it and surely will be heard. The solution of the farmers' debt problem lies with Congress. The farmers on their own initiative can do nothing to bring it about.

In the magazine Today for April 21, I read the following editorial comment relative to the McLeod bill, which demands that the Government pay losses in closed banks up to $2,500:

"On the other hand, it may be argued, and is argued: First, that the people were merely the victims of a deflation which the Hoover administration criminally failed to stop, and second, that many of them patriotically heeded the urging of the Government under the preceding administration not to hoard their money, so that a moral obligation rests on the Government to make good their losses."

Every Congressman who signed the recall petition for the McLeod bill should sign the petition for recall from the committee of the Frazier-Lemke bill, being actuated by the same line of reasoning.

The bank depositor was the victim of the deflation, but the farmer was, first, a victim of the inflation, plus the patriotic plea that he must speed up production that we might win the war. This caused the farmer to go in debt when money was the cheapest in our history.

Second, the farmer was a victim of the deflation that boosted his debt to three times its size when contracted, as measured by the products he had to sell and by the proceeds of which he should redeem his mortgage indebtedness.

If there is a moral obligation upon the Government toward the bank depositor, who suffered on account of the deflation, there is a double obligation on the Government toward the farmer, who suffered both by the inflation and the deflation, neither of which he could in any way ward off.

CORPORATE REORGANIZATIONS—WITHDRAWAL OF MOTION TO RECONSIDER

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I have a motion pending to reconsider the vote by which the so-called "bankruptcy bill", being House bill 5884, was passed on Friday last. It is apparent that I cannot get a sufficient number of votes to secure the adoption of the motion to reconsider, and, that being the case, however strongly I favor the farmers' amendment proposed by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. FRAZIER], as well as other amendments, I am going now to ask unanimous consent to withdraw my motion to reconsider, so that the bill may go to conference.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the motion to reconsider is withdrawn.

Mr. VAN NUYS. Mr. President, I move that the Senate insist on its amendments to the bill (H.R. 5884) to amend an act entitled "An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States", approved July 1, 1898, and acts amendatory thereof and supplementary thereto, request a conference with the House thereon, and that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to; and the Vice President appointed Mr. VAN NUYS, Mr. MCCARRAN, and Mr. HASTINGS conferees on the part of the Senate.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Haltigan, one of its clerks, announced that the House had passed without amendment the bill (S. 2460) to limit the operation of statutes of limitations in certain cases.

The message also announced that the House had disagreed to the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H.R. 5950) to amend an act entitled "An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States", approved July 1, 1898, and acts amendatory thereof and supplementary thereto, agreed to the conference asked by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and that Mr. SUMNERS of Texas, Mr. MONTAGUE, Mr. MCKEOWN, Mr. KURTZ, and Mr. PERKINS were appointed managers on the part of the House at the conference.

The message further announced that the House had passed the following bills, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

H.R. 8912. An act to amend section 35 of the Criminal Code of the United States;

H.R. 9323. An act to provide for the regulation of securities exchanges and of over-the-counter markets operating in interstate and foreign commerce and through the mails, to prevent inequitable and unfair practices on such exchanges and markets, and for other purposes; and

REGULATION OF FOODS AND DRUGS

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, may I remind Senators that a few days ago I spoke of the food and drugs bill and asked any Senators who have amendments to offer to present them in advance of the consideration of the bill? Some Senators have offered certain amendments, and the committee has given them consideration. The committee is very anxious to have before it any other amendments which may be in the minds of Senators, because we hope that when the bill shall be finally presented for action its consideration may take a very short time, indeed, and we feel that to be possible if we may have the amendments before us for consideration in advance of the action on the bill.

REPORT OF THE NEAR EAST RELIEF

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of Illinois, which was ordered to lie on the table:

STATE OF ILLINOIS,

House Joint Resolution 10

Whereas during the year 1933 more than 27 citizens of the United States in widely scattered sections of the country suffered death by lynching; and

Whereas such number of lynchings was greatly in excess of the number occurring during the previous year of 1932, causing public expression of condemnation of lynchings to resound throughout the land; and

Whereas all lynchings constitute contemptuous defiance of law and of the rights of others and threaten the very foundation of civilization and the social order; and

Whereas there are now pending in the Congress of the United States of America two bills, designated as "S. 1978" and "H.R. 6157", and popularly known, respectively, as the "Wagner-Costigan bill" and the "Oscar De Priest bill", the avowed purpose of each of which is to assure persons within the jurisdiction of every State the equal protection of the laws and to punish the crime of lynching: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the House of Representatives of the Fifty-eighth General Assembly of the State of Illinois at the third special session thereof (the senate concurring herein, That the Congress of the United States be, and is hereby, memorialized and requested to give favorable consideration to the aforesaid bills and to enact one of them or some similar antilynching measure; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this preamble and resolution be immediately forwarded to the President of the United States, the President of the Senate, and the Speaker of the House of Representatives of the United States, and to each Congressman and Senator from the State of Illinois.

Adopted by the house March 21, 1934.

ARTHUR ROE,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.
CHAS. P. CASEY,

PROCEEDINGS AND ADDRESSES ON OCCASION OF DEDICATION OF WILLIAM JENNINGS BRYAN MEMORIAL

Mr. THOMPSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have placed on file and printed in the RECORD the speech of President Roosevelt and a synopsis of the proceedings attending the William Jennings Bryan Memorial dedication on May 3, 1934, as printed in the Washington Star of that date; also the manuscript of the address on said occasion by Hon. Josephus Daniels, president of the William Jennings Bryan Memorial Association.

For myself, I wish to add as a word of tribute that to me William Jennings Bryan was the greatest individual moral force of his time.

There being no objection, the addresses and the synopsis were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Star, Thursday, May 3, 1934]

ROOSEVELT PAYS TRIBUTE TO BRYAN IN STATUE RITES—SINCERITY OF COMMONER IN PUBLIC LIFE PRAISED BY EXECUTIVE—HELD "LEADING ACTOR" IN AMERICAN HISTORY—LIFE OF GREAT DEMOCRAT IS TRACED FROM SILVER FIGHT TO TENNESSEE TRIAL

President Roosevelt late today paid tribute to the memory of William Jennings Bryan at exercises incident to the unveiling of the bronze statue of Mr. Bryan in West Potomac Park at Riverside Drive and Constitution Avenue.

The Chief Executive spoke briefly but with deep feeling. He said he had known Mr. Bryan for many years, and not only held him in the highest respect and reverence but had a genuine love for him. He praised the so-called "peerless leader" further by saying he performed a great service as a great American and that no selfish motive ever touched his public life. The President added that Mr. Bryan's sincerity brought to him millions of devoted followers, and that his sincerity served him well in his lifelong fight against sham and privilege and wrong.

Earlier Bryan was pictured by Josephus Daniels as "the leading actor, sometimes the star" in a third of a century of American history.

Daniels, now Ambassador to Mexico, served with Bryan in the Woodrow Wilson Cabinet.

Daniels traced the history of Bryan from the early days of his battle for free coinage of silver down to his contest with Clarence Darrow over evolution in the Dayton, Tenn., trial a few days before his death.

TERMED STORM CENTER

"During these years men condemned him, denounced him, flouted him, despised him, cheered him, loved him, honored him, had faith in him, followed him", Daniels said.

"They would oppose him or rally to him. But in all those years none could be indifferent to him. He was a storm center. The political history of the period cannot be written without Bryan's role being that of the leading actor, sometimes the star.

"The statue we unveil today is the figure of an eloquent orator who commanded 'listening senates.' Though his voice thrilled millions, this figure in imperishable bronze would not have been placed in the National Capital * * * if his eloquence had not been employed in high dedication to the welfare of his fellow men."

Daniels credited Bryan with playing a leading role in passage of the sixteenth, seventeenth, and eighteenth amendments, and with ceaseless efforts for world peace.

BROTHER IS PRESENT

Gov. Charles Bryan, of Nebraska, brother of the "silver-tongued orator of the Platte", witnessed the unveiling ceremony.

Others in the audience were Secretary Ickes, who introduced Daniels; Dr. Joseph R. Sizoo, pastor of the New York Avenue Presbyterian Church, who pronounced the invocation; former Senator Blair Lee, of Silver Spring, Md.; Gutzon Borglum, the sculptor; and David Hargreaves, a grandson of Bryan, who unveiled the statue.

LAUDS HIGH SERVICES

The text of the President's address follows:

"This memorial to William Jennings Bryan, erected pursuant to authorization by a joint resolution of the Congress, I gladly accept on behalf of the United States.

"Our Nation thus recognizes through its Government the essential qualities and the high services of a great American.

"No selfish motive touched his public life; he held important office only as a sacred trust of honor from his country; and when he sought a mandate from his fellow citizens the soul of his inspiration was the furtherance of their interests, not his own, not of a group, but of all. No man of his time was or could have been more constantly in the limelight than he; yet we can look back and scan his record without being able to point to any instance where he took a position that did not accord with his conscience or his belief.

"To Secretary Bryan political courage was not a virtue to be sought or attained, for it was an inherent part of the man. He chose his path not to win acclaim, but rather because that path appeared clear to him from his inmost beliefs. He did not have to dare to do what to him seemed right; he could not do otherwise.

CITES FIGHT AGAINST SHAM

"It was my privilege to know William Jennings Bryan when I was a very young man. Years later both of us came to the Nation's Capital to serve under the leadership of Woodrow Wilson. Through this service and the intimate relations which ensued I learned to know and to love him.

"As we look back on those days—the many of us who are gathered here together who were his friends and associates in the Wilson administration—I think that we would choose the word 'sincerity' as fitting him most of all. It was that sincerity which brought to him the millions of devoted followers; it was that sincerity which served him so well in his lifelong fight against sham and privilege and wrong. It was that sincerity which made him a force for good in his own generation and has kept alive many of the ancient faiths on which we are building today.

"It was Mr. Bryan who said:

"'I respect the aristocracy of learning. I deplore the plutocracy of wealth, but I thank God for the democracy of the heart.'

"Many years ago he also said:

"'You may dispute over whether I have fought a good fight; you may dispute over whether I have finished my course; but you cannot deny that I have kept the faith.'

"We who are assembled here today to accept this memorial in the Capital of the Republic can well agree that he fought a good fight, that he finished his course, and that he kept the faith."

ADDRESS BY JOSEPHUS DANIELS, PRESIDENT OF THE BRYAN MEMORIAL ASSOCIATION, AT THE UNVEILING OF THE BRYAN STATUE IN WASHINGTON, D.C., MAY 3, 1934

"It seemed to me tonight, when the great tribune of the people was speaking to you, as if the statue of Jefferson in this hotel had come to life."

These opening words in an address by Virginia's eloquent "lame giant", Maj. John W. Daniel, on the portico of Hotel Jefferson in Richmond, Va., on the night of September 17, 1896, followed a brilliant campaign speech by William Jennings Bryan. The scene, in the cool of a glorious September evening, was one never to be forgotten. The full moon bathed the multitude crowding every approach to the hotel, where the Nebraskan spoke from an eminence which brought him in full view. The people of that historic city—the heirs of the purest democracy the world has known—had waited long, eyes eagerly uplifted, to catch a glimpse of the new figure which had arisen like a scintillating star in the political firmament. As they awaited his coming their eyes had rested with pride and admiration upon the marble statue of Jefferson standing at the center of the foyer of the hotel named for the founder of Democracy. As he spoke, they strained their ears lest they miss a single sentence of the lute-toned speaker. They were hearing a voice which had a melody with a timbre all its own. They found it as sweet as when a master hand touches the keys of a perfect musical instrument. After the first burst of applause, the people, uncovered in honor of the visitor, stood silent, too moved in their whole being to interrupt with applause or cheers. The listeners were stirred to their depths. They rejoiced to behold in their city the man who had so recently caught the imagination and won the admiration of millions of his countrymen.

"He is as beautiful as Apollo", Senator Daniel had said of Bryan, as the young Commoner thrilled the multitude which had packed the Coliseum at Chicago a few weeks before. Senator Blackburn had agreed and added: "Bryan thrills you like a reborn Demosthenes." Historic Richmond felt that the youthful leader of his party incarnated the political philosophy of the Virginia-born founder of the Democratic Party. Onlookers caught the spirit and vision of Senator Daniel. Looking upon the statue of Jefferson, they sensed that in the flesh they had beheld a miracle, as when Love converted the statue of Galatea into a living thing of beauty and grace. The mantle of the Sage of Monticello had fallen upon the shoulders of a young political Lochnivar who had come out of the West.

The time and place were fitting. Bryan had come home to the land of his forbears. His father in his early manhood, along with many other sons of the Old Dominion, had trekked to the expansive, rich lands which Virginia had generously donated to the young Republic to be carved into States. The land-owning and empire-building instinct was in their blood. In his new home Bryan's father had won a competency and been honored with the judicial ermine. He had carried with him the principles of the Declaration and the Kentucky resolutions, along with his simple belongings to the home he builded in Illinois. The son, indoctrinated in the Jeffersonian creed, had come home, bearing his high honors to the mother State. He was welcomed as the true heir of the burning eloquence of the incomparable Patrick Henry. He was hailed as the chosen interpreter and expounder of the doctrines which needed to be invoked to recall reactionary America back to first principles. "Bryan stands", Major Daniel said in stately phrases on that epoch-making night, "as the leader of the Democracy militant. We love him because he rolled away the stone from the golden sepulcher in which Democracy was buried.

"The Anglo-Saxon race has never failed to produce a great leader whenever a great crisis demanded him. In the Chicago national convention, when a great leader was demanded amidst happy auguries, its choice was given to him who is here tonight, and that convention found him in the heart of the great West in the person of Nebraska's noble son. He loves the people and he stands for all the people against all comers."

It was my privilege to have been a silent participant in that gathering when the foremost orator of the old school of the South welcomed the most eloquent orator of the new school from beyond the Father of Waters to the home of his forbears. Forty years save two have passed over my head since that night of nights, but the thrill of that hour is upon me now, and the echoes of the music of those elevated voices has made melody in my heart through the intervening years. The scene in the capital of the Old Dominion was reenacted in 1896 in every capital of the Republic, and in almost every city and hamlet. From ocean to ocean that year the cadence of Bryan's voice, preaching a gospel of hope, fell upon the waiting ears of men and women who had long looked for a political prophet to lead them into the promised land of equality. No building was large enough to hold the millions who flocked to hear the newly risen prophet and crusader. They apprehended that his heart beat in sympathy with the unemployed and the exploited. Their grateful hearts responded in harmony to his appeals. They understood, as he flayed privilege, that their sufferings were his sufferings. They thronged every place where he spoke, and hundreds of thousands looked to him as their deliverer. They even begged him to take their pennies to advance their common cause.

Other men and women, having no accord with the gospel he proclaimed, sometimes crowded out the worshippers, fascinated by the melody of his voice and the sincerity of his utterances. Many men and women agreed with him whole-heartedly and enthusiastically. Others differed with him radically, sometimes violently. Before that campaign closed, the verdict alike of friend and foe was that in moving eloquence, as well as beauty of diction, no man of his generation approached the Nebraskan. As the years passed, and as he grew, that verdict became the settled conviction of the American people. He stood preeminent in the power to delight the senses of the people and sway the multitudes that hung upon his words.

From boyhood Bryan had loved declamation and debate. He early sought truth by the hammer against hammer of private argument and public discussion. He was fond of beautiful phrases and rounded periods. They abound in his early addresses which were written and committed to memory. To the end he possessed love of beauty in expression as well as in life and nature, though in later years he sought to convince by clarity and simplicity of statement, largely discarding rhetorical effects. There was enough of the poet in his make-up, however, never to surrender to the dull presentation of succinct facts without appeal to the emotions to execute the will of the mind. He had no comradeship with the dry-as-dust statistical type of speaker who refuses to clothe truth in attractive garb.

It was not until he had moved to Nebraska that Mr. Bryan was able to realize his heart's desire. His wife, noted for poise and judgment, tells the story of a new light which shone into his life, a light that brought him power hitherto unrealized. At the age of 27, returning home at daybreak after a long ride on a night train, he could not wait for his wife to awake to tell her of a new revelation that had come to him. Sitting on the edge of the bed he said to her simply and thankfully, "Mary, I have had a strange experience. Last night I found that I had power over the audience. I could move them as I chose. I have more than usual power as a speaker. I know it." And he reverently added, as he knelt in prayer, "God grant I may use it wisely." When the end of his days had come, and Mrs. Bryan was writing intimately of her dead companion with wifely sincerity, she said, "Among the losses the world has suffered by Mr. Bryan's going, the stilling of his voice is to me the most irreparable. I speak now of his voice, not what he said. When he had attained sufficient skill to dispense with manuscripts and really speak, the beauty of his voice was revealed. There was in it a reverberating quality—vibratory hardly expresses it. Upon occasions when he was especially moved, I have heard his tones ring out with bell-like clearness and resound far beyond the circle of his hearers. As years passed, the quality grew less, but never was entirely lost. Few voices have ever equaled his in carrying power."

The secret of Bryan's primacy as an orator was that in addition to a voice which had charm, every utterance demonstrated that behind eloquence was the marrow of conviction. "It is the man not the words that make the speech", Bryan once said. "The orator must have faith, faith in God, faith in the righteousness of his cause, and faith in the ultimate triumph of the truth." Continuing his definition, he said: "There are two things absolutely essential to eloquence. First, the speaker must know what he is talking about; and, second, he must mean what he says." Bryan added that he must also have knowledge of human nature. He strikingly exemplified Bancroft's admonition: "Let the young aspirants after glory scatter seeds of truth broadcast on the wide bosom of humanity, in the deep fertile soil of the public mind. There it will strike root and spring up and bear a hundredfold and bloom for ages and ripen fruit through remote generations."

For a third of a century Bryan held the center of the stage in politics and political conventions. During those years men condemned him, denounced him, flouted him, despised him, loved him, cheered him, honored him, had faith in him, followed him. They would oppose him or rally to him. But in all these years none could be indifferent to him. He was a storm center. The political history of the period cannot be written without Bryan's role being that of a leading actor, sometimes the star. Though he held public office only 6 years and 3 months, he exerted greater influence over a longer period of time upon public opinion and in the enactment of laws and constitutional changes than any public man of his generation. To be sure, Theodore Roosevelt occupied the center of the stage from 1901 to 1912, and Woodrow Wilson from 1912 to 1920. However, from 1896, most of the time without office or place or the trappings that usually accompany influence, Bryan's position in American political life was as commanding as it was consecrated to the commonweal as he was given the light to see the commonweal.

History will record that other men of his period were more deeply versed in law, more experienced in diplomacy, possessed more executive ability, or exercised more political acumen as measured by victories at the polls, than William Jennings Bryan. Even so, none will be found who heard him in the days of his militant leadership, to deny that he won and held kingship in the realm of true eloquence as America's uncrowned Commoner.

From his triumph at Chicago, Mr. Bryan stood above all of his contemporaries as master of assemblies. Indeed, it may be doubted if his equal in persuasive eloquence, potential for a third of a century, has lived upon the earth. This preeminence was evidenced upon great occasions, as when he captured the House of Representatives by his magnificent tariff speech on March 16, 1892; in the Chicago convention in 1896 when all fell under the spell of his oratory and, with enthusiasm, his party called him to national leadership; in his truly great campaign arguments against imperialism in 1900, when intellectuals who had in 1896 opposed his election gave him cordial support; in his memorable speech at the St. Louis convention, where, defeated in his program, he won an oratorical victory which has been rarely equaled in the annals of the race, concluding with the immortal words, applauded alike by friend and foe: "You may dispute whether I have fought a good fight, you may dispute whether I have finished my course, but you cannot deny I have kept the faith"; in the Baltimore convention, where his courageous leadership, daring to the point of danger, and his compelling appeals, turned the whole tenor of the gathering and insured the nomination of Wilson; or when upon other occasions he stirred the hearts of his followers as he proclaimed with demonstration and power the gospel of Christianity which warmed his own heart and shaped his own life. His rare gift was in evidence equally in the thousands of speeches which were never reported.

Eloquence in a sense dies with its possessor. It is not always the open sesame which crowns its owner with the highest rewards. The two candidates for the Presidency who most completely captured men's hearts by their eloquence were Henry Clay and William Jennings Bryan. Neither reached the zenith of his ambition. Excepting Henry Clay, Bryan was the only man thrice chosen by his party as its Presidential candidate.

Bryan was never cast down even when the verdict of the polls was recorded against the policy he espoused. He never knew defeat. No man is ever defeated until he admits it. Out of one reverse the crusading evangelist planned a new assault. This was best illustrated when the news came in 1896 that McKinley had been proclaimed the winner. Bryan spent no time in questioning the result or in vain regrets. He sounded the note for the next battle in these characteristic words: "In the face of an enemy rejoicing in victory, let the roll be called for the next engagement. If we are right, as I believe we are, we shall yet triumph." Though the Presidency was denied him, Bryan lived to rejoice in the adoption by his country of most of the principles and policies which were dearer to him than personal preferment.

In appraising the chief contributions Bryan made to his country, it would wrong Bryan and do injustice to truth to hold him up as always consistent or always right. No man in a long, active public career has ever been free from mistakes and errors of judgment. These defects, common to all men, were not absent in the Commoner. Bryan's best friends differed with him at times and sometimes radically. They pointed out to him what they deemed his mistakes of judgment. He loved his friends and gave consideration to their views, but he was adamant against suggestions that for personal or political advantage he soft pedal here or be silent there. Upon questions of principle he would not compromise, even when good friends counseled it. Political expediency never controlled him. His course was governed by Lincoln's declaration, "I am not bound to win; but I am bound to be true. I am not bound to succeed; but I am bound to live up to the light I have." It can be literally and truly said of Bryan that he had "rather be right than to be President."

Mr. Bryan could not hate or harbor resentment. "More than any man I have known", said one of his Cabinet colleagues, "he placed the cause above the man." He could and did fight those who opposed the cause in which he was enlisted. He neither asked nor gave quarter. And he was a doughty warrior, none more resourceful or valiant. He never consciously, at least not for long, permitted himself to hold bitterness in his heart toward an antagonist. His hot anger could and did flame against what he regarded as wrong or injustice. Opportunism or subserviency to power were hateful in his sight. His condemnation of wrong was not personal. It was righteous indignation against the act. He was incapable of returning evil for evil even when the provocation would seem to justify getting even. No man since Jefferson and Jackson was the victim of such virulent hatred and abuse as rained upon him. It never either diverted or embittered him. He could not be persuaded that even the most violent abuse was personal. Loving his fellow man, Bryan regarded detraction or denunciation by critics or enemies as not directed at him as an individual. He always felt that the invectives were rather shafts aimed at the policies for which he took up arms.

Just as he rested all his political beliefs on the creed of Jefferson, believing that the founder of the Democratic Party was the fountainhead of the wisest statesmanship, so in the field of morals and religion, Bryan found guidance in the "thus saith the Lord." True to early training, when he came to write his will, the opening words contained in condensed form his confession of faith:

"In the name of God, farewell. Trusting for my salvation to the blood of Jesus Christ, my Lord and Redeemer, and relying on His promise for my hope and resurrection, I consign my body to the dust and commend my spirit to the God who gave it."

It was this fundamental faith which sent him forth as a Christian evangelist and as expounder of the Scriptures. His life was in consonance with his creed. He yielded to none of the temptations which assail youth, having from his boyhood given himself to the practice of virtues taught in his home, in the Sunday school, and in the church. His clean private life was his Gibraltar when he sallied forth to fight the enemies that threatened society. No opponent could weaken his influence by pointing to any flaw in his armor of personal uprightness. Postmaster General Burleson was wont to say: "Bryan is the truest Christian I have ever known in politics." When Bryan opened his heart to his colleagues on the day he retired from the Cabinet, Secretary Lane turned to him and said, with deep feeling: "Mr. Bryan, you are the most real Christian I know."

Would you understand Bryan? Read the appraisement by his wife, a true and equal partner, in these words:

"A source of tremendous strength to Mr. Bryan was his freedom from doubt. Others might waver, drift, and struggle—he went serenely on, undisturbed. This may be explained by his conviction that man was much too puny and finite to understand the ways of God. He said more than once: 'What do these men know? Pitting their poor little knowledge against omniscience! The infinite power which rules and controls is far beyond our finite mind.' He had a firm faith in the inspiration of the Bible in whch he had been nurtured, a strong belief in a guiding and protecting power, and a comforting reliance on the efficacy of prayer."

It was the possession of this unquestioning faith which made Bryan the Sir Galahad of his generation.

"His strength was as the strength of ten,
Because his heart was pure."

The statue we unveil today is the figure of an eloquent orator who commanded "listening senates." Though his voice thrilled millions, this figure in imperishable bronze would not have been placed in the National Capital, midway between the Lincoln Memorial, honoring another illustrious son of Illinois, and the Arlington Memorial, hard by the home of the immortal Robert E. Lee, if his eloquence had not been employed in high dedication to the welfare of his fellow men. As unborn generations pause to look upon his countenance, fashioned by the genius of Gutzon Borglum, betokening benignity and nobility, they will be told: "This is the sculptured likeness of William Jennings Bryan, who was endowed with a voice so melodious as to enthrall all who heard him." That appraisement will interest, for stories of oratorical conquests ever intrigue youths. Unless, however, some new Edison or Marconi can recall the melodies of other years and centuries (and who shall say that tomorrow we will not be under the spell of the songs of Jenny Lind and Caruso, the glory that was Beethoven and Chopin, and the eloquence of Demosthenes and Patrick Henry, still lingering somewhere in the chambers of the upper air?) the youth of another decade will be inclined to say: "Though this man Bryan may have spoken with the tongue of angels to his own generation, what contribution has he bequeathed for the enrichment and inspiration of those who come after him, who were never privileged to hear him, that his statue should occupy this place of distinction?"

When that challenge is made what will be the reply? Unless we of today can make answer to the challenge of posterity, what reason can be offered for the erection of this memorial? It is the duty, therefore, of the living, of those who knew the stuff of which he was made, to reveal the qualities which ennobled him, which justify his right to a place with the American immortals in this American pantheon.

We who were his associates know that he consecrated himself, body and soul, to the advocacy of causes which in their spirit will be as vital tomorrow as when in yonder Capitol or in nearby church or cathedral he summoned men never to sell the truth to serve the hour. Nobody will care about or little reck of the ephemeral campaign issues which he debated. As his speeches are read and conned by the coming generation, however, they will see that underneath the policies which divided the people in his day, Bryan was guided always by underlying fundamental foundations of truth and justice. It was upon the solid rock of principle, not policy, that he rested all his contentions.

When bimetalism was uppermost in the public mind, Bryan clothed the issue with the vestment of hostility to any monetary standard which he thought would tend to enrich the few at the expense of the many. He grew up in the belief that the demonetization of silver in 1873 was "a conspiracy to destroy three sevenths of the money of the world by legislation", and he held with John G. Carlisle, who said in 1878, that the act of 1873 was "the most gigantic crime of this or any other age." Believing that there was not enough gold in the world to furnish the necessary primary money and that the remonetization of silver would restore prosperity, Mr. Bryan advocated with all his earnestness the free and unlimited coinage of silver as a means to that end.

When imperialism was the paramount issue, it was lifted up in his conception to a searching inquiry as to whether any nation had the right to buy dominion over an unwilling people or to control their country by force of arms, even with the altruistic promise of benevolent assimilation. Bryan warned of its evils and dangers. "Be not deceived", he said. "If we expect to maintain a colonial policy, we shall not find it to our advantage to educate the people, lest they learn to read the Declaration of Independence and the Constitution of the United States and mock us for our inconsistency."

When tariff loomed as the paramount question, Bryan declined to debate percentages and schedules or to lower the plane to determining whether a rate of 25 percent was more sacred than one of 50 percent. To him the whole matter of tariff taxation hung upon whether there existed the right to tax one man to give wealth to another. He believed the Supreme Court had laid down the only sound principle in the declaration that "to lay with one hand the power of the Government on the property of the citizens and with the other to bestow it upon favored individuals to aid private enterprises and build up private fortunes, is none the less a robbery because it is done under the form of law and is called taxation." He practiced what he preached. When asked in debate the question which his interlocutor believed would entrap him, whether he would vote for tariff favors to the growers of beet sugar in his own State, Bryan replied in the negative, adding with impressiveness: "When it is necessary to come down to Congress and ask for protection or a bounty for my State, which I would refuse as wrong to an industry in another State, I shall cease to represent Nebraska in Congress."

When a campaign was fought out upon the trust issue, Bryan gave evidence that he had no patience with what he regarded as quibbling about "unreasonable restraint", or suggestions of "regulation." He wrote the trust plank in the platform of the Baltimore Convention, using seven words to compress his lifelong conviction as to monopoly. They were: "A private monopoly is indefensible and intolerable."

When the issue revolved around the policy of his country toward smaller nations, Bryan's attitude was one that harmonized with his measuring every proposition by the yardstick of the Golden Rule. He considered that no public questions could be separate from both morals and the principle of popular government. He was adamant against dollar diplomacy. He declared that his Government, having proven by its action its willingness to protect a little republic in its rights to have its controversies with great nations settled by arbitration rather than by force, is now prepared to assert with equal emphasis its unwillingness to have an American republic exploited by the commercial interests of its own or any other country.

When currency reform was to the fore, as in 1913, Mr. Bryan insisted that the issue of money was an exclusive function of government and should not be surrendered. He refused to endorse a proposed authorization of notes by agencies outside the Federal Government. He also objected to the plan of permitting banks to select representatives to serve as members of the Federal Reserve Board. He argued in favor of making the entire Board of Control appointive by the President, so that the Government would have complete and undisputed authority over the issue of Government notes, which, in his judgment, should be substituted for the contemplated bank notes. There was sharp division of opinion on both these points, but Bryan's view prevailed on both and was incorporated in the measure which made possible the successful financing of the World War. Senator CARTER GLASS, leader author of the measure in the House of Representatives, paid public tribute to Bryan, writing him: "We are immensely indebted to you for effective aid * * * for sound legislation."

When the issue raged, after the Supreme Court, by a margin of 1 vote, declared that the income tax levied in the Wilson-Gorman Act was unconstitutional, it was Bryan who began and successfully carried on the vigorous campaign for the income-tax amendment to the Constitution until it was incorporated as the sixteenth amendment to the Constitution. Hardly was the ink dry on the majority Supreme Court decision before Bryan mobilized the forces of opposition to exemption from taxation of those who were most able to support the Government.

On every stump in 1914 Bryan sounded a blast upon his bugle horn which summoned the people to enlist in a war to the finish for an amendment to grant Congress power to levy an income tax. He quoted everywhere the dissenting opinions of Justices Harlan and White in answer to the charge that he was an anarchist and that his crusade constituted an attack on the Supreme Court. These dissents furnished to Bryan the shibboleths in his crusade against a decision which exempted the rich from just taxation. Nearly all the States ratified the amendment, which became a part of the Constitution shortly before Bryan became Secretary of State. He was permitted to rejoice in after years by the enactment of comprehensive income-tax provisions, drawn by Hon. Cordell Hull, one of his successors in the State Department, as an integral part of the Underwood-Simmons tariff law enacted in the early days of the Wilson administration.

If the name of the real author of the sixteenth amendment to the Constitution should be emblazoned on the proclamation in the State Department, it would bear the inscription: "Made by William Jennings Bryan." It was Bryan who had secured the necessary number of signers to instruct the Ways and Means Committee to incorporate taxation on incomes in the revenue bill of Cleveland's day when it was in the making. As a young student of law under the great Lyman Trumbull, pioneer for income and inheritance taxes, Bryan had profited by the lessons in "radicalism", as such views were called in an era when to run counter to favoritism to the powerful was to invite harsh epithets. In an early argument for the income tax Bryan had said: "The poor man is called a socialist if he believes that the wealth of the rich should be divided among the poor, but the rich man is called a financier if he devises a plan by which the pittance of the poor can be converted to his own use."

When the purchase and sale of seats in the United States Senate had raised the issue of changing the method of electing Senators, it was Bryan who took the laboring oar. For 18 years, in season and out of season, beginning in 1890, when he was elected to Congress from Nebraska, he had inveighed against a system which he believed lent itself to logrolling and corruption. He urged that Senators, like Members of the House of Representatives, be elected by direct vote of the people. In his first term in Congress he urged and voted for an amendment to the Constitution to effect that change, and in 1900 embodied a plank demanding it in the Democratic platform and in subsequent platform declarations. To him, in view of his long fight to secure its ratification, it was a peculiar pleasure, shortly after becoming Secretary of State, to sign the proclamation declaring direct election of Senators by the vote of the people a part of the Constitution. If the name of the man to whom most credit is due for that victory should be inscribed on the seventeenth amendment, it would bear the lettering "Made by William Jennings Bryan."

When the country was aroused about the liquor traffic, it was Bryan who threw himself with moral fervor into the thick of the fight in behalf of national prohibition. Up to 1912 he had opposed making it a national issue. His position then was that, without being able to secure the necessary constitutional amendment, pressing that issue would interfere with the economic reforms to which he was wedded. After those reforms had been adopted, or in process of adoption in the Wilson administration, Bryan gave his active support to the eighteenth amendment. Its executive supporters, when victory came in 1920, wrote him:

"During all the recent months leading up to the final battle, your voice has sounded the high notes of idealism in this fight for humanity, has inspired your friends to confidence and enthusiasm, and has sent the shock of alarm throughout the ranks of the liquor forces" He believed the permanence of prohibition largely depended upon its support by one or both of the great political parties. In the National Democratic Convention at San Francisco he urged the adoption of a dry plank. The ensuing debate on that plank, staged between Bourke Cockran and William Jennings Bryan, was the high light of oratory in that convention. The majority elected not to take sides in what was then called "a moral issue", and Bryan's plank was not adopted. At the close of the convention, when asked for an expression, Bryan declined, saying: "My heart is in the grave with the dry plank, and I must pause until it comes back to me."

When there was an organized and aggressive movement to extend equal suffrage to women, it found Mr. Bryan one of its most earnest champions. His "Mother Argument", often quoted, closed with: "Because God planted in every human heart a sense of justice, and because the mother argument makes an irresistible appeal to this universal sense, it will finally batter down all opposition and open woman's pathway to the polls."

When, as it reached its crescendo in 1896, the use of money in politics became a national scandal, and men sought to purge elections so that offices would not be put up to the highest bidder,

Bryan offered what he thought would lessen the evil, at least in a measure, in the form of a law providing for publicity of campaign contributions. His proposition became a law. It should be labeled "Made by William Jennings Bryan."

When government by injunction had routed the ordinary processes of trial by jury, it was Bryan who joined hands with Gompers and others to curb the ex parte issue of the writ and secure the settlement of disputes by law and by arbitration. When labor felt that men who toil as well as capital should be represented in the Cabinet, it was Bryan who joined with others in advocating an addition to Cabinet membership. He had the joy of being a colleague in the Wilson administration of Hon. William B. Wilson, the first man to serve as Secretary of Labor.

When rebates and high railroad rates caused the people to demand regulation of railroads, it was Bryan who threw his weight for the needed legislation. When such regulation did not bring the results he had expected, Bryan jeopardized his chance for election to the Presidency by advocating Government ownership and Government operation. He had come to the conclusion that regulation had failed to bring about the desired results in a day when neither his own nor any party would support that "revolutionary" position, as it was denominated.

When international friendship demanded that Colombia be recompensed for the taking of Panama, Bryan invited and received denunciation and the accusation that he had been guilty of betraying the honor and interest of the American people by submitting to blackmail. Those were the words employed by Theodore Roosevelt in his vigorous arraignment of Bryan's proposal to pay Colombia $25,000,000, coupled with an expression of sincere regret that anything should have occurred to interrupt or mar the relations of cordial friendship that had so long subsisted between the two nations. Bryan lived to see the so-called "blackmail" paid in the administration of President Harding. There was no material alteration in the treaty he had favored. The change was that the words "sincere regret" were deleted. Colombia acquiesced in the variation because it regarded the payment of the money as admission of American offense by participation in the alienation of a part of its territory without so much as saying "by your leave."

When the ancient monarchy of China, reborn as a republic, was looking for a helping hand, it was Bryan who opposed the sanctioning of the six-power loan. The attitude was thus expressed by President Wilson, who said such loans "might conceivably go to the length of forcible interference in the financial and even the political affairs of a great oriental state." That act was promptly followed by the recognition of the new Republic of China in the "confident hope and expectation that in perfecting a republican form of government the Chinese will attain to the highest degree of development and well-being."

When near war with Japan brought lowering clouds over the Pacific in 1913, it was Bryan who hastened to California in the hope of aiding in ameliorating the situation which had aroused our Japanese friends. Later, in Washington, an impasse seemed to have been reached. Closing an interview with the Secretary of State, the Japanese Ambassador rose with dignity and sadness to leave, saying:

"I suppose, Mr. Secretary, that this is the last word."

The day was saved when Mr. Bryan replied:

"There is no last word between friends, Baron Chinda."

That reply, the product of the sort of diplomacy that comes from the heart and secures results, was the beginning of assuaging influences which caused statesmen to agree with Bryan that it is the business of officials "not how to wage war but how not to get into war."

When the American people, with a long look ahead, envisioned the day when there would be need for another isthmian canal it was Bryan who negotiated the Bryan-Chamorro Treaty, which was ratified by the United States and Nicaragua. Its terms stipulated that the United States agree to pay Nicaragua $3,000,000 for the exclusive right "for the construction, operation, and maintenance of an interocean canal by way of the San Juan River and the great lake of Nicaragua, or by way of any route over Nicaraguan territory." In addition to obtaining this canal route, Bryan secured for the United States "a 99-year lease to the Great Corn Island and the Little Corn Island in the Caribbean Sea", and "a like lease to establish, operate, and maintain a naval base at such place upon the Gulf of Fonseca as the Government of the United States might select." The day may come—it will come as world commerce is sure to expand under enlightened trade arrangements by the nations—when the construction of the Nicaraguan canal will bring the long-cherished dream of John T. Morgan to fruition. Then we shall realize the statesmanship of Secretary Bryan in securing a treaty which will bless not only Nicaragua and the United States but all the nations of the earth as well.

When peace lovers, long before the holocaust that bled Europe white and took toll of the flower of the youth of many countries, were seeking to find a method to lessen the danger of war, or to end that scourge, it was Bryan who drafted and urged a formula which was later approved by 30 nations. It became an integral part of the Covenant of Peace signed at Versailles. To be sure, in every century since the star shone over Bethlehem men of good will had sought some way that would lead to the outlawry of war.

It remained for Bryan as early as 1906 at the Inter-Parliamentary Conference in London to introduce and secure the adoption of a resolution that would call for an investigation and give time for the marshaling of public opinion before a declaration of war. "If we but stay the hand of war until conscience can assert itself", Bryan declared, "war will be made more remote." He saw the need of "cooling time." In 1905 he had, in an open letter to Theodore Roosevelt, urged arbitration as a substitute for war. The compelling motive which induced Bryan to accept the tender of the portfolio of Secretary of State in 1913 was that it provided the opportunity to obtain international peace agreements. He unfolded to the President-elect before his acceptance his ideas of the way to lessen the danger of war, which had long been maturing in his mind. In their passion for peace, as upon most public policies, the views of Wilson and Bryan ran along together. Bryan was the first American statesman to make an avowal that any workable peace program must embrace all disputes. Other plans had excepted from investigation or arbitration disputes involving national honor. That exception was fatal, for it opened a door by which any nation could escape investigation by contending that national honor was involved. Bryan insisted upon the inclusion of all questions. His treaties also provided that a year's time be given for investigation and report, during which time neither party could declare war. The treaties embodying that provision, known as "the Bryan talk-it-over plan", were ratified by 30 nations, representing four fifths of the population of the world, including all of large influence except Germany and Japan. Andrew Carnegie believed the Bryan treaties would "result in the triumph of peace ninety-nine times out of a hundred." He hailed Bryan as "a notable champion of peace", and "the foremost negotiator of international peace treaties."

When Europe plunged into the abyss of war, it was Bryan who supported with most enthusiasm Wilson's adherence to the doctrine of neutrality and continued his support of the President until he became convinced that Wilson's policy might involve the United States in the World War. He insisted that the note sent to Germany should be counterbalanced by one or more accompanying acts. These suggested acts were thus stated by Mr. Bryan: 1. "A statement that the settlement of disputed issues would be deferred in accordance with the principle of the conciliation treaties"; 2. "A prohibition of warning against travel on belligerent ships carrying contraband"; 3. "An immediate note to Great Britain asking satisfaction on the matter of interference with American trade."

When President Wilson did not feel that he could accept these suggestions of his Secretary of State, Mr. Bryan, on June 8, 1915, resigned from the Cabinet. In accepting it "with regret", President Wilson said: "We are not separated in the object we seek, but only in the method by which we seek it." In Mrs. Bryan's diary she discloses that her husband was so disturbed and distressed as to his proper course that his sleep had become broken and she "saw something had to be done." The crucial week-end before his mind was fully made up was spent in the house of a friend, Senator Blair Lee, at Silver Spring. "More heavy-eyed than ever", Mrs. Bryan records, "Mr. Bryan took two long walks." It was hoped they would so weary him physically that he could sleep, but nothing could compose Mr. Bryan in his agony of spirit. He was passing through his Gethsemane. He was torn between conflicting desire and duty. He loved the high station he held. Its associations and opportunities made it impossible for him to lay it down without a wrench. His hostility to war dominated him.

Doubtless in his troubled hour of decision, the declaration of Tolstoy, beloved of Bryan, was with him. Tolstoy long before had declared to Bryan, in answer to an inquiry, "The use of force to protect or create a right is never defensible." These words and Bryan's declaration when he entered the Cabinet that there would never be a war while he was in office were present in his thoughts as he tread the wine press alone. Never did human come to a conclusion through more travail. When the conviction was borne in upon him that he "could do more to prevent war on the outside than inside", he felt impelled to the greatest renunciation of his life. It was reached in a struggle beyond words to describe. "I must act in accordance with my conscience", he said to his Cabinet colleagues in a sad and tearful farewell as they sat at lunch as his guests. "As I leave the Cabinet, I go out in the dark, though I have many friends who would die for me. The President has the prestige and power on his side." Mr. Bryan later compressed his convictions and his course in these words: "Because it is the duty of the patriot to support his government with all his heart in time of war, he has a right in time of peace to try to prevent war. I shall live up to a patriot's duty if war comes. Until that time I shall do what I can to save my country from its horrors." Obedient to these views, Mr. Bryan "on the outside" spoke from coast to coast, with all his passionate hatred of conflict at arms, against American entrance in the World War during the 21 months that intervened between his resignation and the declaration of war. Finally, when the die was cast, Mr. Bryan, the saddest man in America, volunteered his service in any capacity in this telegram to the President: "The quickest way to peace is to go straight through supporting the Government in all its undertakings, no matter how long or how much it costs."

The armistice signed, Bryan warmly supported President Wilson in urging the ratification of the Treaty of Versailles and the creation of the League of Nations, through which the organized nations of the earth undertook to guarantee permanent peace. He counseled the Senate to accept it as it was brought from Paris by President Wilson. To him this covenant of peace was the fulfillment of his long-cherished hope to end wars. When it became clear to him, during the long-drawn-out debate, that the Senate would not ratify the treaty without reservations, Bryan declared "the important thing is ratification—ratification as soon as possible, ratification in time for the first League session on January 16, 1920." If the Senate demanded reservations as a condition precedent, he advised accepting them rather than to contemplate the ills which he thought would follow failure to ratify.

The militant fundamentalists, believing that the teaching of evolution in the schools and colleges was undermining faith in the Christian religion, organized to prevent such instruction. It was Bryan who buckled on his armor and led in the conflict which he had much to do with initiating. He profoundly believed that Genesis gave the only true history of creation and that teaching anything not in harmony with the account recorded in "the inspired word of God" was subversive of religious faith and sound morals. He urged legislatures to make enactments against such teaching in schools and colleges supported in whole or in part by public taxation. The Legislature of Tennessee followed his advice and enacted a law to carry out his recommendation.

Bryan, with the flaming zeal of a crusader, responded with alacrity to the request that he take the leading part in the trial at Dayton to uphold the law. The result in the court was a victory for Bryan and his associate counsel. The fate of the young teacher under indictment was lost sight of in the legal combat between Bryan and Darrow. The verdict won, Bryan spent his last busy hours on earth dictating, and correcting the proofs of the speech with which he expected to close the case for the prosecution. The trial had terminated without argument. He felt that his appearance at Dayton, coupled with the argument which he prepared with great care, was, to quote his own words, "the mountain peak of my life efforts." On Sunday morning, following the trial, he attended church where he offered prayer and after lunch lay down to rest. While sleeping he passed peacefully into the world beyond the stars. Those who stood with him in this last conflict declared that Bryan, "the Christian crusader", literally fell on the field of battle, upholding the authority of the word of God.

Fittingly the closing words of his finished address—the last lines he dictated in life—were from the old hymn which had been his strength and fortress in all the years of his life:

"Faith of our fathers, living still,
In spite of dungeon, fire, and sword;
O how our hearts beat high with joy
Whene'er we hear that glorious word—
Faith of our fathers—holy faith
We will be true to thee till death."

WATERS OF THE COLORADO RIVER

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD certain correspondence between Hon. Harold L. Ickes, Secretary of the Interior, and Mr. W. P. Stuart, editor of the Prescott Evening Courier, at Prescott, Ariz., relative to the waters of the Colorado River. Mr. Stuart's letter clearly and concisely sets forth Arizona's attitude on this vital subject.

There being no objection, the correspondence was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SECRETARY ICKES AND THE COLORADO RIVER

Several weeks ago the Evening Courier, in an editorial, expressed keen disappointment with Secretary of the Interior Ickes because his name was placed on the brief in opposition to Arizona's move in the Supreme Court to perpetuate certain testimony in connection with the Colorado River dispute between this State and California. It was alleged the Secretary unfairly had sided with California in the litigation, but in a letter in reply to the editorial the Cabinet Member denied this, and said:

APRIL 23, 1934.

EDITOR THE COURIER,
Prescott, Ariz.

DEAR SIR: Your editorial of April 3, entitled "Hiram Johnson's Echo in the Cabinet", has just now come to my notice.

The basis of your criticism is my act in filing a brief in Arizona's suit in the United States Supreme Court to perpetuate testimony in the Colorado River water controversy, alleging that I "butted into the case."

You should know that I was named as one of the defendants by Arizona, and my brief was in answer to a rule to show cause issued by the Court on February 19, 1934. If my response to a court order served on me as a Government officer in a suit in which the United States is a party constitutes "butting in", then you have given a new definition to this expression.

Now as to my alleged partiality to the interests of California, which you say influenced my response unfairly. My sole act, personal or official, in this case was to sign a letter on March 1, 1934, to the Attorney General notifying him that I had been served with a rule to show cause in this suit. With the letter, which was prepared in the office of the Solicitor of this Department without instruction from me, I furnished a copy of the bill and rule and recommended that the Attorney General "take appropriate action to protect the interests of the United States." This is the customary procedure, as the Attorney General prosecutes and defends suits involving the United States. In this case he was, in effect, my attorney, and all subsequent steps, including the preparation of the reply brief, were taken by members of his staff. I was not thereafter consulted, nor did I suggest the answer. A copy of my letter is in the official files and is subject to inspection. In the light of these facts, your accusation of intrigue and poor judgment on my part would have to include the Attorney General and his staff.

I realize that as a Government officer my acts are open to criticism from any quarter and that my motives are subject to interpretation or misinterpretation, which is one reason why I do not usually reply to critical editorials. But you so obviously need information on how Government affairs of this sort are handled that I could not resist writing you.

Sincerely yours,

HAROLD L. ICKES,
Secretary of the Interior.

The editor of the Courier, while not questioning the belief of the Secretary of the Interior that, insofar as his information goes, he pursued an impartial course, replied with the assumption Mr. Ickes had been led into a biased attitude through the influence of subordinates, whose duties are to obtain facts in such matters as the Secretary, through stress of work, lacks the time to ascertain on his own account. The answer follows:

MAY 1, 1934.

HAROLD L. ICKES,
Secretary of the Interior, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. ICKES: Your letter of April 23 is at hand.

It was considerate of you to write me, and I appreciate the explanation of your viewpoint and the citing of the reasons why you responded in the premises in a manner that suggested prejudice in favor of California. There is, however, so far as the State of Arizona is concerned, ample grounds for us to be dissatisfied with your action.

Here is a case where Arizona is seeking to perpetuate the testimony of that which actually transpired at the conference in Santa Fe in 1922 and what the parties meant by certain provisions of the Colorado River Compact. What fair-minded person would object to that? What possible harm could come to anybody by putting down in black and white the history of the meeting and a permanent inscription of its details? It is apparent that the spokesmen of five of the States attending the gathering thought the way Arizona did, because Wyoming, Colorado, New Mexico, and Utah have not opposed the taking of this testimony. They ask that they be accorded the right to cross-examine, which, in any eventuality, would be their privilege. California, on the other hand, bitterly has opposed bringing out the real facts of what took place at this conference; and you, acting through subordinates, have espoused the same position that California assumed.

Had those under your direction arrived at their conclusions independently, we would not have the same cause for criticism that we sincerely feel is ours; but, when presumably accurate information comes to us that the solicitors of your Department are working in conjunction with the representatives of the Metropolitan Water District of Southern California, we believe there is an excuse for the impression that we are not getting a square deal from you. Moreover, color is lent to this when it appears the California representatives called a meeting in Denver with the other States and tried unsuccessfully to get them to take the stand this newspaper editorially criticized you for occupying. It seems to us you have gone out of your way to be partial to the interests of one State, in a controversy among States, where no trace of bias should be.

In your letter it is stated your opposing brief to Arizona's request was filed in the capacity of a Government officer "in a suit which the United States is a party", which reveals a phase of the case that we in this State simply cannot see; we are unconvinced that you were required to take any particular stand in behalf of either participant; and if you, or anyone else, can show wherein the United States Government is a party in the action there will have been translated from invisibility and unintention a meaning of which the agents of Arizona are unaware.

Perhaps you do not know that at the time the Colorado River compact was prepared and ready for signature at Santa Fe, in November 1922, it only provided for the division of 15,000,000 acre-feet of water, and that Arizona refused to sign the compact because the Gila River had been included as part of the waters divided, and no provision was made for Arizona on that account, in spite of the fact that the waters of the Gila River entirely are put to use in our State. It was then agreed by all who were present there should be added another provision, whereby 1,000,000 acre-feet should be allowed to the lower Basin States, with the understanding among all of the States that this 1,000,000 acre-feet was to go to Arizona as her compensation for signing the compact with the Gila River included.

California shortly afterward denied this was the true meaning of the inclusion of the 1,000,000 acre-feet, and Ray Lyman Wilbur, your predecessor, accepted California's position on this question. Notwithstanding the fact that the State of California has limited herself to 4,400,000 acre-feet, in order to get the Swing-Johnson bill passed, your predecessor gave to her water contracts for 5,350,000 acre-feet.

It is for these reasons that we want to show the real meaning of the compact and are asking to perpetuate this testimony. I realize the position you have taken has been brought about by the fact that you do not have the time personally to pass on all questions in your Department.

I also want to apologize for references in the editorial to which you found exceptions that were not pertinent to the question at issue. I have the utmost faith in your integrity and am convinced you measure up to the high standard of earnestness required by the present national administration; but I still am of the opinion that your excessive burden of responsibilities has kept you from gaining a correct perspective of the Colorado River controversy between this State and California, and that your perception of the dispute mainly has been through glasses stained with the orange hues of the Golden State.

With assurance of my kindest regards, I am,

Very truly yours,

W. P. STUART,
Publisher Prescott Evening Courier.

RETURN OF FUGITIVE WITNESSES

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I am not sure whether there were included in the messages which have come over from the House this morning the "crime bills", so-called; but, if so, I beg the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST] not to yield readily to certain amendments which were made, particularly to the bill relating to the return of fugitive witnesses.

That bill was mutilated; it was destroyed by what was done in the House. The purpose of the bill is to provide for the return of witnesses to a crime, not the principal. There is a way under extradition proceedings to bring back the principal, but district attorneys and prosecuting attorneys of the country are defeated in their desire to apprehend and prosecute criminals by the disappearance of witnesses who, either by coercion or by bribery or by fear, are driven out of the jurisdiction of the court.

As is universally conceded by the authorities, the particular bill is needed more than any of the other so-called "antigangster bills." I was amazed that the House should strike out what is probably the most important provision of the bill. I was still further amazed at the statement, according to the RECORD, that the Department of Justice had said it was unwise to have the provision in the bill. We might as well defeat the bill as to pass it in the form in which it comes to us from the House.

I am sure the Senator from Arizona, having had his attention brought to the matter, will not yield readily to the action of the House in making the change.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, I wish to join in the statement just made by the able Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND] in an appeal to the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST]. So far as the situation in Detroit, Mich., is concerned, we had the direct testimony before our committee that if this one bill shall be added to the arsenal of defense against crime, our district attorney will take the responsibility for handling all the rest of the situation, but that he cannot hope to handle it, he cannot hope to cope with the interstate character, the mobile character of crime today, except as he may have the assistance provided by this particular bill.

I join with the Senator from New York in urging that the attitude of the House must have been based upon a misconception and misunderstanding of the situation and that the authorities must have the particular protection originally contemplated in the Senate bill.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, may I ask what particular bill it is?

Mr. VANDENBERG. It is the bill which makes it a crime for a witness to disappear across the State line and become a fugitive when wanted in a criminal prosecution.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I may add that it is not the thought of those who wrote the bill that witnesses should be brought back by Federal procedure to testify in a State case. It was our feeling that if it were made a felony for a witness to a capital crime to disappear from the State, the very fact of the existence of such a law would have a deterring effect. The fear of being arrested and tried in a Federal court for a felony because of becoming a fugitive would keep a witness within the State and at the disposal of the officials.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I listened, of course, with interest and sympathy to the statements made by the Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND] and the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG]. In my opinion, the two Senators are correct in their conclusions respecting the so-called "antigangster bills."

I doubt if I have the right, under the rules of parliamentary law, to advert to anything that takes place in another body of Congress more than to say that I believe the bills as passed by the Senate ought to become the law, though we all recognize and respect the right of the House to make amendments.

At the proper time, when the bills shall be laid before the Senate, I shall request the Senate to ask a conference with the House on the subject of the antigangster bills and shall ask the Chair to appoint conferees on the part of the Senate.

I assure the Senate that, so far as I am personally concerned, I shall employ every proper effort and every energy at my command to sustain the position of the Senate respecting the bills.

REGULATION OF SECURITIES EXCHANGES

Mr. FLETCHER. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 3420, being the bill to regulate securities exchanges, and so forth.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Florida.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 3420) to provide for the regulation of securities exchanges and of over-the-counter markets operating in interstate and foreign commerce and through the mails, to prevent inequitable and unfair practices on such exchanges and markets, and for other purposes, which had been reported from the Committee on Banking and Currency without amendment.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I may be a little tedious in endeavoring to state the case to the Senate regarding a measure which is extremely complicated, difficult, and far-reaching. I shall be as brief as I can, and as fair as I may be in presenting the question of the need for the legislation, the demand for it, and what I concede to be the sound conclusions reached in the form of the bill now presented to the Senate.

On March 2, 1932, a resolution was introduced in this body by the Senator from Delaware [Mr. TOWNSEND], at the request of his colleague [Mr. HASTINGS], and was approved on the calendar day of March 4, 1932. It provided that the Committee on Banking and Currency or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof was—

> Authorized and directed, first, to make a thorough and complete investigation of the practices with respect to the buying and selling and the borrowing and lending of listed securities upon the various stock exchanges, the values of such securities, and the effect of such practices upon interstate and foreign commerce, upon the operation of the national banking system and the Federal Reserve System, and upon the market for securities of the United States Government, and the desirability of the exercise of the taxing power of the United States with respect to any such securities—

And so forth.

Other resolutions were subsequently introduced looking in the same direction, among them being a resolution adopted on April 4, 1933, extending the powers of the committee and providing that the committee—

> Shall have authority and hereby is directed—
> (1) To make a thorough and complete investigation of the operation by any person, firm, copartnership, company, association, corporation, or other entity, of the business of banking, financing, and extending credit; and of the business of issuing, offering, or selling securities;
>
> (2) To make a thorough and complete investigation of the business conduct and practices of security exchanges and of the members thereof;
>
> (3) To make a thorough and complete investigation of the practices with respect to the buying and selling and the borrowing and lending of securities which are traded in upon the various security exchanges, or on the over-the-counter market, or on any other market; and of the values of such securities; and
> (4) To make a thorough and complete investigation of the effect of all such business operations and practices upon interstate and foreign commerce, upon the industrial and commercial credit structure of the United States, upon the operation of the national banking system and the Federal Reserve System, and upon the market for securities of the United States Government, and the desirability of the exercise of the taxing power of the United States—

And so forth.

In pursuance of those resolutions the Committee on Banking and Currency appointed a subcommittee. The subcommittee has been almost continuously engaged in the investigation.

There were a few weeks in 1932, during the summer vacation, and in 1933, when the committee were not holding hearings; but beginning October 3, 1933, practically every day, 4 or 5 days a week, hearings were held by the subcommittee. Every opportunity has been given the stock exchange, investment bankers, holding companies, industrialists, bankers, and what not, everybody interested in the subject, to be heard respecting the bill which was introduced and respecting the matters involved in the investigation. Subsequently there was introduced Senate bill 2693, and hearings were had upon that bill, and all persons interested were given opportunity to present their views to the committee.

Some 21 volumes of hearings have been printed. There probably will be two or three more volumes before we shall finish the final print, including the exhibits. In addition to the printed volumes a cross-reference index is being prepared, and is now practically complete. That will enable Senators to have access to the hearings with more convenience and speed, and will make the volumes all the more usable.

We expect later to make a report covering all the hearings, including the printed documents and the index, and to lay the whole subject before the Senate in response to the resolutions of the Senate.

Considerable results have already been attained. For instance, it may be mentioned that the National Bank Act of 1933 contains provisions based upon the developments before the committee, particularly with reference to the separation of commercial banks from affiliates. Another provision based upon the developments before the committee was the extension of the powers of the Federal Reserve Board so as to enable it to have a greater control over the flow of credit away from agriculture, industry, and commerce into speculation. As I say, that grew out of the hearings.

Another act which Congress passed last year, known as the "Securities Act", is the result of matters brought to light in connection with the hearings.

Now the final stage is reached. This bill, demanded by the country everywhere, is before the Senate. It undertakes to provide a system, plan, or method of Federal supervision of securities exchanges.

The hearings already printed are, of course, available to the Senate. As I stated, they are not entirely complete, because some of the work is now under way in the Government Printing Office. The last volumes of hearings and the index itself will be laid before the Senate shortly, so that all the data may be at the command of the Senate.

It may well be claimed that economic and social problems, and even legal problems, are approached under the influence, more or less, of our political and social philosophy. There is room for a difference of view. It may be conceded that legal principles must form a part of economic and social theories.

Events since the fall of 1929 have shown grievous errors of habits and practices in the past, and established universal demand for corrective measures and new methods. The demand was for a new deal, it being understood that this is a slogan, not a new political system or creed. It is a moral attitude in governmental action. Applying it to the measure now submitted, its cardinal principles I conceive to be, first, restoring as a rule of moral and economic conduct, a sense of fiduciary obligation; and, second, establishing social responsibility, as distinguished from individual gain, as the goal.

The President has three times in public messages and communications recommended legislation of the sort embodied in this bill. He has recognized that the stock exchanges of the country are not only a useful but an essential mechanism in our financial and economic structure, and serve a necessary public purpose. They are not private enterprises, free from a public interest or function.

In the hearings before the committee, representatives of the stock exchanges have conceded the principle of Federal regulation.

The objectives are appreciated by the stock exchanges and the administration.

Mr. Richard Whitney, president of the New York Stock Exchange, the giant among them all, said to our committee:

> It is the purpose of the New York Stock Exchange to assist in every possible way in the prevention of fraudulent practices affecting stock-exchange transactions. excessive speculation, and manipulation of security prices. We should be glad to see a regulatory body, constituted under Federal law, supervise the solution of these grave problems. We suggest in principle, and subject to the requirements of law and the constitutional power of Congress, an authority or board to consist of 7 members, 2 of whom are to be appointed by the President; 2 to be Cabinet officers, who may well be the Secretary of the Treasury and the Secretary of Commerce; and 1 to be appointed by the Open Market Committee of the Federal Reserve System; the 2 remaining members will be representative of stock exchanges, one to be designated by the New York Stock Exchange and the other to be elected by members of exchanges in the United States other than the New York Stock Exchange. Such a body would bring together a personnel which would be properly coordinated with the banking system and in other respects qualified to administer the broad supervisory power which our proposal would give. We suggest the inclusion in the power given to this body of authority to regulate the amount of margin which members of exchanges must require and maintain on customers' accounts; authority to require stock exchanges to adopt rules and regulations designed to prevent dishonest practices and all other practices which unfairly influence the prices of securities or unduly stimulate speculation; authority to fix requirements for listing of securities; authority to control pools, syndicates, and joint accounts and options intended or used to unfairly influence market prices; authority to penalize the circulation of rumors or statements calculated to induce speculative activity, and to control the use of advertising and the employment of customers' men or other employees of brokers who solicit business. This body should also have the power to study and, if need be, to adopt rules governing those instances where the exercise of the function of broker and dealer by the same person may not be compatible with fair dealing, as well as the power to adopt rules in regard to short selling, if the supervisory body should become convinced that such regulation is necessary.
> We believe that these regulatory measures will prevent abuses affecting transactions on exchanges, and will at the same time not interfere with the maintenance of free and open markets for securities.
>
> This proposal represents the considered view of the New York Stock Exchange, adopted by its governing committee, which has given me authority to present it to you. I say to you confidently that the exchange will cooperate fully and by all the means in its power to assist in the prevention of unwise or excessive speculation and abuses or bad practices affecting the stock market.

That is a statement by the president of the New York Stock Exchange.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. COPELAND in the chair). Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. FLETCHER. I do.

Mr. NORRIS. I should like to ask the Senator from Florida the date of the statement made by Mr. Whitney, particularly with reference to the time of taking testimony in the investigation conducted by the committee. Was it near the beginning of the investigation, or did he make the statement at its close?

Mr. FLETCHER. Practically at the beginning. My recollection is that it was Mr. Whitney's opening statement to our committee; and it seems to me plainly, inescapably an admission that there are practices on the exchange which are vicious and unjustified and abuses and errors which ought to be corrected. We have not quite conformed to the mechanism of making corrections that Mr. Whitney suggests. In the bill we attempt, however, to accomplish precisely the reforms which he says ought to be accomplished. Every abuse and bad practice set forth in his statement we attempt to correct in the bill.

We do not agree that a commission of seven, such as Mr. Whitney suggests, ought to have the administration of the proposed act. We have provided in the bill now before the Senate for a special commission of five, to be appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate. The proposed commission is to be similar to that which Mr. Whitney suggests, the original bill which was introduced having provided that the administration of the act should be under the Federal Reserve Board.

The bill has been amended three times, and in the form in which it is now before the Senate, it provides that it shall be administered by a special commission of five, to be selected by the President and confirmed by the Senate.

The bill does not provide that one of the commissioners shall be named by the New York Stock Exchange and one by the other exchanges of the country. What is the use of having a regulatory body controlled by those to be regulated? It provides for a separate commission, an independent commission, to be appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate, to consist of five members instead of seven. In other respects the recommendations of Mr. Whitney himself are met, in my judgment, by the provisions of the bill.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. FLETCHER. I yield.

Mr. COSTIGAN. As one member of the Committee on Banking and Currency who prefers using the Federal Trade Commission as a supervising agency, I feel that it might be helpful to the Senate if the able chairman of the committee will state the reasons why he prefers a separate commission.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, frankly, I favored the measure being administered by the Federal Trade Commission and the Federal Reserve Board. I favored the original bill. However, there seemed to be strong demand on the part of the members of our committee for a separate commission, and by a majority vote provision to that end was placed in the bill.

I see no reason why the Federal Trade Commission should not administer the act. I think the Federal Trade Commission have done and are doing splendid work in connection with the Securities Act, and I have every confidence in that Commission; but it was argued before our committee by those representing the exchanges that that is a commission which has had no experience in the handling of securities and that sort of thing, and that this matter ought to be handled by people who have knowledge of transactions involving the distribution and issuance of securities, and so forth. So the committee finally reached the conclusion that it was advisable to have the proposed act administered by a separate commission in connection with the Federal Reserve Board, which has to do with the handling of credit matters.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. FLETCHER. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. It might be added, I think, that one of the reasons which actuated the committee, and also those outside of the committee who felt that an independent commission was preferable, was that, without any sort of reflection upon the good faith or the sincerity of the Federal Trade Commission or its ability to administer the law, necessarily it would have to be done under a subordinate bureau under the Federal Trade Commission; that it would be a sort of a lean-to under the Commission's original activities; while if a separate commission were appointed public attention would always be focused upon that separate commission. It was the theory also that the President could pick five men just as well qualified to administer the law separately as he could pick three additional men to be appointed to the Federal Trade Commission as a sort of a subcommittee of the Federal Trade Commission to administer the law.

I think those considerations had a good deal to do with the amendment substituting an independent commission for the Federal Trade Commission. It ought to be emphasized, however, that it was not done in any way through any lack of faith in the Federal Trade Commission, or any lack of appreciation of the fine work it has done heretofore; but the committee felt that a separate commission, whose duties would be centralized around the stock market and stock securities, would be in a better position to serve the public than a branch of the Federal Trade Commission.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Florida yield to me?

Mr. FLETCHER. I yield.

Mr. GLASS. The Senator from Kentucky has clearly stated the view of those members of the committee who prefer a separate commission, except that it may be added that to some of us it was inconceivable that either the Federal Trade Commission or the Federal Reserve Board could do the work as effectively as could a separate commission appointed for the purpose, in view of the fact that the Federal Reserve Board and the Federal Trade Commission have important and complex duties which to perform them effectively, now occupy all of their time and their ingenuity. There was no purpose and no word uttered which might be construed into a reflection upon the Federal Trade Commission.

Moreover, the distinguished chairman of the committee will recall that it was not done because at one time the stock exchange wanted a separate commission. The distinguished chairman will remember very well that the commission proposed by the stock exchange was as different from the commission embodied in the bill as day is from night. The stock exchange was to have material representation of its own upon the commission it proposed, and on this commission there is to be no member of the stock exchange, and the members of the commission are textually prohibited from having any connection whatsover, direct or indirect, with any of the stock exchanges.

Furthermore, the stock exchange did not stay hitched to its own proposal for an independent commission. Its latest proposal was that the whole thing be turned over to the Federal Reserve Board, and there are those of us on the committee who think the Federal Reserve System ought to be kept as far away from the stock-gambling business as it possibly can be gotten, and its facilities denied to those engaged in stock gambling, or, to be rather more polite, in stock speculation.

It was for those as well as other reasons which might be mentioned, that the committee thought a commission picked for the purpose by the President, to be confirmed for the purpose by the Senate, subject to removal at any time, for reason, by the President, could very much more effectively perform these duties, than would be possible if they were divided up between the Federal Reserve Board and the Federal Trade Commission.

Mr. BORAH. The Federal Reserve Board has demonstrated in the past that it was not very expert in dealing with this matter, has it not?

Mr. GLASS. Exactly.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. POPE in the chair). Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. FLETCHER. I yield.

Mr. COSTIGAN. In fairness should it not be said that much duplication of work will be required if a separate commission shall be established? It has been estimated that approximately half a million dollars a year may be saved if this work is carried on by the Federal Trade Commission.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Florida yield to me again?

Mr. FLETCHER. I yield.

Mr. GLASS. On the contrary, there would be infinite duplication if we adhered to the proposition presented to the committee to divide this work between the Federal Reserve Board and the Federal Trade Commission. In other words, the Federal Reserve Board has immediate and intimate access to all the reports of the Comptroller of the Currency, who is a member of the Federal Reserve Board. In addition to that, the Federal Reserve Board has its own examiners, supplementing the work of the examiners employed by the Comptroller of the Currency. What could be the sane reason for requiring reports to be made by members of the Federal Reserve Banking System to the Federal Trade Commission, when they are examined by these two sets of examiners, and are required to make reports current and at any time to the Federal Reserve Board?

The Federal Reserve Board should not have anything in the world to do with it except to see to it scrupulously and at all times that Federal Reserve member banks do not lend their facilities for stock-speculating purposes.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. FLETCHER. I yield.

Mr. COSTIGAN. I fear that there may be some misunderstanding of my suggestion, which was that a separate commission—my inquiry had no reference to the Federal Reserve Board—would necessarily duplicate much work relating to unfair practices and the administration of the Securities Act of 1933 now being carried on by the Federal Trade Commission. It was to the expense of that duplication alone that my remarks were directed.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, in that connection I may say that, while the Federal Trade Commission has done a splendid work in connection with the Securities Act, I see no really serious objection or sound reason for supposing that a special commission, as provided in this bill, should not efficiently and satisfactorily administer the provisions of the Securities Act, and I have offered an amendment, since the bill carries with it the provision that the Securities Act shall be administered by the special commission, providing for the transfer to the commission to be set up under the terms of this bill of the administration of the Securities Act, so there will be no duplication if the Senate shall agree to my amendment.

The Securities Act itself, and the Securities Exchange Act, will be administered by this special commission. Of course, some delay would be involved. It would involve the turning over largely of the personnel and the set-up already established by the Federal Trade Commission, but these two acts, the Securities Act and this Securities Exchange Act, are so intimately connected that it seems to me advisable that they both should be administered by the same authority, and therefore I have provided in the amendment which I have offered, the transfer of the administration of the Securities Act, with all the records and everything pertaining to it, to this Commission.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. FLETCHER. I yield to the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. BARKLEY. In view of the fact that the Securities Act, which has been very admirably administered by the Federal Trade Commission up to date, contemplated regulation with respect only to new securities issued after the passage of that act, and had very little relationship to securities already in existence, and in view of the fact that the bill under consideration sets up a regulation of the stock exchanges in all securities, whether old or new, the combination of the two acts under the administration of one commission would eliminate the duplication to which the Senator from Colorado has already adverted, and inasmuch as they are inseparably related, not only so far as the issue of securities may be concerned but the purchase and sale of those securities on a registered exchange, the logical thing is to have both administered by the same body.

Mr. FLETCHER. That is the idea, I think, which was in the minds of the committee, and those who have done the longhand writing of this measure, and devoted weeks and weeks of study to it, and our final solution of it is that the two acts should be administered by the same body, which is provided in the amendment I referred to a moment ago. I did not intend now to go into that particular subject. I intended to give, if I could, a sort of general picture of the situation with respect to the bill itself.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. FLETCHER. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. I may be asking a question as to a matter which has been covered by the Senator. The President some time ago appointed an interdepartmental committee of which the Secretary of Commerce, Mr. Ickes, was a member, for the purpose of studying the principles and policies involved in the measure now under consideration, and after an elaborate study the committee reached the conclusion that the administration of the stock exchanges should be placed in the hands of an administrative commission to be appointed by the President. I may add that, largely following their recommendation, I offered an amendment before any was offered in the Senate committee, dealing with the subject, under which it was proposed to vest the administration of the provisions of the law in an independent commission of three persons, to be appointed by the President.

Mr. FLETCHER. The Senator from Utah is quite right. It was proposed in the Senator's amendment to vest authority in a separate commission, and we took advantage of his suggestion in that regard.

We are endeavoring, Mr. President, permanently to correct the evils and abuses which Mr. Whitney mentioned and which he admits should be and may be corrected. We may not fully succeed, but we are making an honest and fair effort in that direction, with every confidence there will result great improvement and real benefit.

We propose by this measure to establish, through Federal regulation of the methods and the mechanical functions and practices of the stock exchange, an efficient, adequate, open, and free market for the purchase and sale of securities; also to correct abuses we know of and others which may exist; to prohibit and prevent, if possible, their recurrence; to restore public confidence in the financial markets of the country; to prevent excessive speculation to the injury of agriculture, commerce, and industry; to outlaw manipulation and unfair practices and combinations by which to exploit the public and misrepresent values, such as pools, wash sales, fictitious transactions, and the like; to oblige disclosure of all material facts respecting securities traded in on the exchanges, which disclosure is essential to give the investor an adequate opportunity to evaluate his investment.

Criticism is made that we are calling upon corporations to make disclosures, and that we are thereby putting them to an enormous expense and trouble, and inquiring into affairs into which we have no business to examine. My suggestion is that if any corporation issues securities which are unfit to be certified because of what is back of them, the securities themselves are unfit to be offered to the public.

What right have brokers to appeal to the public to buy their securities if they are not willing to tell the truth about those securities? That is the whole proposition, and all we ask of them is to tell the truth.

They do not seem to want to tell the truth, in the first place, and, in the next place, they especially complain about liability for material misrepresentations which have misled the public into buying securities. They are willing to expose, to some extent, the facts behind the securities, but they do not want to be liable in case they lie about them. That seems to be the basis of the objection. All we ask in the pending bill and in the Securities Act is that they tell the truth in their registration papers, so the public may know what is behind the securities.

We undertake generally to declare the intention of Congress, and enunciate specific principles as a guide to subsequent administration. That appears particularly in section 2. We lay the foundation for this legislation in section 2 of the bill.

The exchanges themselves, when they complained about our delegation of authority, proposed a bill, and advocated even greater delegation of power in the administrative body than is provided for in the pending bill.

In connection with the propaganda which has been broadcast over the country criticizing and objecting to the provisions of the bill, most of those who criticize say, "We object to the bill in its present form." The language in hundreds of thousands of letters which have come to the Members of Congress is, "We object to the bill in its present form."

This bill has been changed three times. The original bill was revised, and the committee then gave hearings upon the revised bill. The revised bill was introduced in the House. It was never introduced in the Senate, but we considered it in the Senate as a revision of the bill S. 2693. We had hearings on it. Finally that bill was revised. We agreed to certain amendments of that bill, and then the whole question was referred to a subcommittee, and that subcommittee met and considered every word, every line, every sentence in the bill, day after day, week after week, in an honest effort to be fair to all concerned and to eliminate any harsh features that were objected to by those opposing the bill and in endeavoring to satisfy any reasonable demand in connection with the legislation.

Some complained it was too drastic here, some complained it was too drastic there, and we endeavored to straighten that out, and then the subcommittee reported to the full committee a third revision of the bill. The Senate Committee on Banking and Currency unanimously substituted that revision for the original bill, and then by a vote of 11 to 8 ordered a favorable report upon the revised bill, which is the bill S. 3420, now before the Senate.

In the propaganda which was spread all over the country—and we received numerous letters about it—the statement was made: "We understand this bill was prepared by some inexperienced young men in the departments, sometimes called 'brain trusters.'" Such a charge, I believe, was made, as the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] suggests to me, in the chamber of commerce meeting. The question as to who were the authors of this bill is, I think, wholly irrelevant, immaterial, and impertinent.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield there, I do not think that claim was made by the chamber of commerce in any official pronouncement of its own but by somebody who made a speech before it.

Mr. FLETCHER. Doubtless that is quite true, for I never saw any mention of it in their resolutions. Upon that subject, however, the effort, of course, was to arouse prejudice and discredit at the outset of the work by the allegation that inexperienced young lawyers were the authors of the bill. I would not pay any attention to that suggestion, except that publicly it was declared and announced on several occasions, as if that had anything to do with the merits, which I strongly deny.

However, I dismiss that subject by referring to an editorial by Prof. Raymond Moley, in Today, of April 14. It is very short, and I will read it:

> Ah, the truth comes out at the end. This entire tirade against the administration generally, the exhortation to form a new party, this denunciation of Roosevelt, youth, and progressivism—all this is but window dressing to cover up the real purpose of the guardian of reaction. It is the stock-exchange bill that has put the Post so beside itself.

The editorial has been referring to an article in the Saturday Evening Post—

> Here, again, I know the facts at first hand. The ideas of this legislation did not come from a preconceived theoretic system of Government control of business. They were drawn from American experience, found in scores of places. The idea of limiting margins and speculative credit is as old as the hills. The provisions to protect stockholders from exploitation by insiders came from a partner of a most conservative law firm in Wall Street, who has himself taken credit for being the "foster father" of the provisions. (Name furnished on request.) The provision concerning adequate reports of corporations to their stockholders is something the New York Stock Exchange has been seeking for many years, although it had neither the courage nor the strength to put it through. The provisions concerning manipulative practices came from Mr. Pecora's Senate investigation.
>
> The President did not cause a bill to be framed. He asked Congress, under his constitutional rights, for legislation. The responsible committees of Congress proceeded to the task of framing it. These committees were under the chairmanship of two of the oldest and most-trusted Members of the two Houses—Senator FLETCHER and Congressman RAYBURN. Congressman RAYBURN and Senator FLETCHER indicated their objectives and purposes and at least a dozen men—old and young and certainly not inexperienced—drafted the legislation. They were professional bill draftsmen. They did not put their own ideas into the law.
> The bill was revised over and over again. All interested parties were heard. There have been at least 10 drafts of the measure. The bill was gone over word by word by Treasury and Federal Reserve experts, including Governor Black, who as yet has been suspected of no Moscow affiliations. Important sections were gone over and accepted by the Wall Street counsels actually appearing for complaining brokers, dealers, and bankers. The final result is as far from being the work of young and inexperienced men as the Constitution of the United States was the work of Randolph, who submitted the first draft.

Commissioner Landis testified before our committee that from 10 to 15 men worked on drafting this bill, so the claim vanishes that it is the work of a handful of inexperienced young lawyers. Professor Moley knows what he is talking about, and he gives the true statement about it.

Taking up the bill by sections, in a condensed way and without considering its details, it will be found that section 1 simply gives the title.

Section 2 gives an outline of the necessity of and lays the foundation for the bill.

Section 3 gives a definition of the words, terms, and phrases contained in the bill.

Section 4 establishes the Federal exchange commission about which we have been talking, a commission to be composed of five members, selected by the President, and so forth.

Section 5 deals with transactions on unregistered exchanges.

Section 6 deals with the registration of national securities exchanges.

Section 7 deals with margin requirements.

Section 8 deals with restrictions on borrowing by members, brokers, and dealers.

Section 9 imposes a prohibition against manipulation of security prices. That is a very important section.

Section 10 provides for the regulation of the use of manipulative and deceptive devices. That is another very important section.

Section 11 imposes restrictions on floor trading by members.

Section 12 provides registration requirements for securities.

On page 30, line 10, the word "accounts" should be "accountants." We will make that change when we reach it.

Section 13 deals with periodical and other reports.

Section 14 deals with proxies.

Section 15 has to do with over-the-counter markets.

Section 16 relates to directors, officers, and principal stockholders.

Section 17 treats of accounts and records, reports, examinations of exchanges, members, and others.

Section 18 has to do with liability for misleading statements.

Section 19 provides disciplinary powers over exchanges.

Section 20 has reference to the liabilities of controlling persons.

Section 21 has reference to investigations, injunctions, and prosecution of offenses.

Section 22 relates to hearings by the Commission.

Section 23 has reference to the public character of information.

Section 24 provides a court review of orders.

Mr. President, a very comprehensive report, I think, has been submitted by the committee. That report is on the desks of Senators, and I suggest that, if they have not already done so, they read that report, which goes into a very full explanation of the whole bill and analyzes it section by section.

Section 25 has reference to unlawful representations.

Section 26 has to do with the jurisdiction of offenses and suits.

Section 27 refers to the effect on existing law.

Section 28 deals with the validity of contracts.

Section 29 has to do with foreign securities exchanges.

Section 30 provides penalties.

Section 31 has reference to the separability of provisions.

Section 32 provides the effective date.

Mr. President, one of the practices indulged in by the exchanges is intended, as it is claimed, to protect the market for securities at least for a time after the offering, such as pegging the price of the German bonds. The courts here do not appear to have passed on the question, but in England it has been passed upon (2 Queens Bench, 724, Scott v. Brown, 1892). Said the court, speaking by Mr. Justice Wright:

> If persons, for their own purposes of speculation, create an artificial price in the market by transactions which are not real, but are made for the purpose of inducing the public to take shares, they are guilty of as gross a fraud as has ever been committed and of a fraud which can be brought home to them in a criminal court.
> In this case the correspondence put in evidence by the plaintiff in support of the claim he made at the trial shows conclusively that the sole object of the plaintiff in ordering shares to be bought for him at a premium was to impose upon and deceive the public by leading the public to suppose that there were buyers of such shares at a premium on the stock exchange, when in fact there were none but himself. The plaintiff's purchase was an actual purchase and not a sham purchase (washed sale); that is true, but it is also true that the sole object of the purchase was to cheat and mislead the public. * * * I am quite aware that what the plaintiff has done is very commonly done; it is done every day. But this is immaterial. Picking pockets and various forms of cheating are common enough and are nevertheless illegal.

The practice referred to appears to be unfair, unjust, and really fraudulent, misleading the investing public. We endeavor to stop it by this measure.

Evidence before the Senate committee disclosed the case of a specialist who traded for his own account in the stocks in which he was a specialist, bidding it up or down in order to make the market, and thereby a profit to himself. He said that the result of this operation was that he was "murdered." He was a specialist in a certain stock. The theory is that people dealing in a particular stock go to a specialist to make their trades. He had orders to buy and orders to sell. We try to restrain that gentleman from taking advantage of the situation to benefit himself, and to prevent trading in the stocks in which he is a specialist and supposed to represent customers.

He virtually admitted he was trading in the stock in which he was a specialist. As a result of that, as he stated, he was "murdered." He was asked, "What do you mean by that?" He replied, "I only made $139,000." I suppose he thought he ought to have made half a million dollars or more, but because he made only $139,000 for his own benefit, to put in his own pocket, he thought he was murdered. That is a kind of practice we try to correct.

It would weary the Senate for me to go into much detail with reference to the experiences, and to relate some of the practices, but I may refer briefly to the subject of the claim of the stock exchanges that what they want is a free and open market.

The hearing revealed practices which bear upon claims of the stock exchange as a free and open market for securities. Just a few illustrations out of some 250 revealed in the hearings may be cited. The New York Stock Exchange is a voluntary association, not a partnership, not a corporation. It has 1,375 memberships, constituting "an oligarchy of enormous power and wealth." The price of membership has ranged within the past 10 years from $77,000 to $600,000. It is now $190,000. It claims to furnish a free and open market for securities.

Before passing from this feature, let me say that it was brought out the other day before the committee that stock-exchange members had made over $1,000,000,000 in clear profits during the last 6 years. A depression was prevailing everywhere, people were without buying power, impoverished, money scarce, and yet these gentlemen were able to clean up in the last 6 years, from 1929 to 1934, over $1,000,000,000 in profits.

Mr. Whitney made some reply to that, according to the press, claiming that we do not take into consideration what they have lost in the value of their seats; in other words, that the seats have gone down from $600,000 each to about $190,000, I believe they are at this time, and that there was a loss to the stock exchange in the value of their assets by virtue of that fact. That is true in a way. There was a shrinkage in the value of the seats on the stock exchange, but, as Mr. Untermyer pointed out a day or two ago, they have during that time sold some 350 seats. Let us say they sold them at $190,000 each. At that figure their assets must have been considerably built up. Multiplying $190,000 by 350 gives quite a neat little sum.

Passing on, in connection with the flotation of $100,000,000 of German bonds in June 1930, a syndicate was formed to handle them. The bonds were offered to the public at $90 on June 12, 1930. This syndicate or pool acquired a total of $9,200,000 of the bonds and promptly sold them to the public, the syndicate "pegging" them until the issue was sold out, the syndicate making a large profit. They dropped to 35½, and the loss to the investors on that basis of market value was $55,000,000. The operations of the syndicate or pool was to maintain the market price until they were sold out. It was testified by the highest authority that "that is an absolutely sound and customary method of merchandizing and distributing securities." This is the pronounced and admitted feature of the pool.

Here are some results: Kolster Radio Corporation was incorporated under the laws of Delaware, quite a favorite State for obtaining broad charters. It was to manufacture and distribute radio receiving sets, phonographs, and so forth, and was authorized to issue 1,000,000 shares of stock with no stated par value. In 1928 there had been issued 824,829 shares. The earnings of the company in 1927 amounted to 87 cents a share; in 1928, 20 cents. One Breen formed a pool. The market was manipulated. He was able to turn over to Spreckels, the president, $19,200,000 for stock which in the light of events was not worth a dollar and cost Spreckels little, if anything. Breen paid his brokers $182,760 in commissions, and his profit was $1,351,252.50—all coming from the public. Thousands of innocent investors had lost their money—over $19,000,000.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. FLETCHER. I yield.

Mr. DAVIS. Was that profit made on the one particular issue?

Mr. FLETCHER. Yes; it was made in that transaction and in that pool.

Indian Motocycle furnishes another illustration. This company was organized in Massachusetts in 1913. It had 100,000 shares of common stock outstanding, carried on its balance sheet at $40 a share, and $688,000 of 7-percent cumulative preferred stock. In 1927 the company was heading for disaster. The stock was increased to 200,000 shares. A pool was formed. It manipulated the market, made enormous profits, and when they were through the stock dropped from 17 to 4½, then to less than a dollar, and then the victimized holders had only paper.

The Anaconda: A pool was formed, the members of which made enormous profits—about a million dollars. Investors lost as the market went down and down.

Anaconda went into a chill—another pool.

Another Anaconda absorption and pool.

The National City Co. were heavy investors. The insiders cleaned up huge profits. The stock went down from $125 a share to less than $4, and the losses of the public were computed at $160,000,000.

German bonds: Our practice is exemplified here:

First, "pegging" the market for a few weeks during the time the syndicate, composed often of bankers and brokers, loaded up the public with some issue of stocks or bonds. Here the public paid 90 to 91 in June 1930 for these bonds, and they dropped to 35½ on April 21, 1932.

Radio Corporation of America: No dividend was ever paid on the stock. More was issued. A syndicate was formed, managed by Thomas E. Bragg and Bradford Ellsworth.

The day before the pool was formed the stock had been sold at $74, March 6, 1929. The pool boosted the stock to 109¼ and made a profit of $4,924,078 in 7 days. The stock the public had bought at about par fell to $26 before the end of the year, then to 11¾ in 1930, to 5½ in 1931, and 2½ in 1932. A pool is organized to make money for those who are in it (hearings, p. 433; McKim, p. 54).

That is the statement before our committee by witnesses—experts on the subject.

One witness, David M. Lion, testified that he had furnished said publicity in about 4 years to 250 pools (p. 691). Mr. Samuel Untermyer, in 1914, stated:

For many years the pretended market prices of securities of our greatest corporation have been "rigged" and manipulated at the will of a handful of gamblers and operators, and the people of the country have been literally robbed of hundreds of millions of dollars through such transactions.

Those are some of the conditions we wish to correct by this bill.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. FLETCHER. I do.

Mr. VANDENBERG. What the Senator has said with respect to listed securities is unquestionably true. I am wondering about the effect of section 15, the so-called "over-the-counter-markets section." Do I misread that when I come to the conclusion that that would cover any security, listed or otherwise, which might be sold by any broker or dealer?

Mr. FLETCHER. I believe it is intended to cover both listed and unlisted securities.

Mr. VANDENBERG. For example, a multiplicity of minor sales of capital structures for purely local industrial institutions is a popular form of financing in my section of the country. Would a purely local financing undertaking of that character be included?

Mr. FLETCHER. I think not. The Senator will find, in that or other provisions of the bill, that such local enterprises are not included.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Has the Senator in mind the point at which that exemption occurs?

Mr. FLETCHER. I shall be glad to point it out when I get to it, in a few minutes.

Mr. VANDENBERG. The Senator does not think the bill ought to apply to that type of financing?

Mr. FLETCHER. No. The committee had that matter before it, and thought about it a good deal, and we had considerable testimony about it. The purpose was to exclude local enterprises; and if we have not expressly done so, I think we have opened the way for the promulgation of regulations by the commission to effect that result.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I am wondering if the only exemption there is not through prospective rules and regulations. So far as the textual language is concerned, I wonder if the Senator is not incorrect in his suggestion that there is an exemption, and if he is not relying upon rules and regulations for the exemption.

Mr. FLETCHER. I shall have to refer to the exact language in a minute or two. I have not yet reached that subject; but I shall be glad to take it up a little later and discuss it.

LOSSES ON STOCK POOLS

From the face of the records it is practically impossible to calculate what were the actual losses of the speculative public in any one pool, chiefly because as stocks decline some speculators might sell and take a small loss, while those who held and sold at the bottom would take a heavy loss. This is true in relation to the market whether the depressions were caused by pools or manipulations of any kind, or by a lack of public confidence.

However, the market price of stocks in the New York Stock Exchange in October 1929, as I stated in an article in the New York Times of December 31, 1933, was $97,000,000,000. The market price of the same stocks in 1932 was $14,000,000,000; so a shrinkage in market price had taken place to the extent of $83,000,000,000.

The losses are almost fantastic in some cases. For instance, Insull Utilities Investment, Inc., common, quoted in 1932 at ⅛, represented a value of 12½ cents per share; yet those shares stood at one time at $149.25—1,192 times higher, or 119,200 percent.

Another difficulty in estimating losses is that the same stock may be turned over several times in the course of a year, as indicated below:

Name of corporation	Shares outstanding	Turn-over
1930
Radio Corporation	13,130,000	37,038,190
R.K.O.	2,377,315	18,397,908
Westinghouse Electric	2,586,000	10,592,975

Except for the personal gains made by those who manipulated pools successfully, the total effect on the whole market is very small. Contrariwise, if the pool fails, the advantageous effect for the public is almost negligible. This can be realized by considering the turnover of shares, bonds, and so forth, for the various recent years.

The statistics shown elsewhere indicate that the total number of shares on the market as represented by active securities may turn over several times in the year, the quietude of some stocks being outweighed by the very active stocks. This, therefore, meets the usual excuse that activity represents investment. The whole emphasis of all hints, tips, rumors, and the financial publications—good and bad—is on turnover, for the very excellent reason that only by turnover can brokers, either honest or dishonest, maintain their offices and all related equipment.

INSULL 6-PERCENT DEBENTURES AND COMMON

The transactions in the various Insull securities in late 1928, 1929, and onward, can hardly be described as the operations of a pool, but rather that of a syndicate. The market operations were conducted by Halsey, Stuart & Co., Continental Illinois Co., Harris, Forbes & Co., Central Illinois Co., First Union Trust & Savings Bank, Field, Glore & Co., Foreman-State Corporation, the National Republic Co., Insull, Son & Co., and Insull, Son & Co., Ltd., London office (p. 1671, pt. 5, 72d Cong.).

The Insulls agreed to market through Halsey, Stuart & Co., and associates, $60,000,000 Insull Utilities Investment, Inc., 10-year, 6-percent gold debentures, with warrants for common attached. These were issued by the corporation at 94, underwritten at 99½ with warrants, and in this operation alone the profit to the underwriters was $3,300,000.

The common stock—nonpar value—of the same corporation was made available to the stockholders of various Insull corporations at $15, and to Samuel Insull at $12. On January 18, 1929, the common stock had reached 40 on the Chicago market. By August 2, 1929, it had reached 149¼. It was testified in 1933 that it was worth "practically nothing."

In the year 1929 the high ranged from 40 to 149¼; the low from 30 to 104. Volume of business, 3,593,055 shares.

In the year 1930 the high ranged from 70½ to 41½; the low from 27½ to 67½. Volume of business, 2,994,900 shares.

In the year 1931 the high ranged from 49¾ to 11; the low from 4 to 39¾; the volume of business was 2,832,200 shares.

In the year 1932, during the first 4 months, the high ranged from 6¼ down to ¾; the low ranged from ⅛ to 3¾; the volume of business for the 4 months was 463,600 shares.

As 942,050 common shares changed hands in the month of July 1929 at 127½, and 794,480 changed hands in August at 149¼, the loss to the speculating public by contrasting the figures of 1929 and 1932 was something between $125,000,000 and $150,000,000 on the common issue alone.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me to interrupt him——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. FLETCHER. I yield.

Mr. LEWIS. The Senator will recognize that as I am one of the Senators representing the State of Illinois, and myself live at Chicago, that being my home, I am not without some knowledge of the matters touching the Insull properties, which have been alluded to by the Senator in his recital.

I beg to inform the Senator that the morning press carries something of correspondence that has been sent to me, in which it is claimed that this bill prevents the issue and the floating of stocks in different local commercial concerns which are in no wise listed upon stock exchanges. May I ask the able chairman of the committee if such is the construction of the bill, and if there is any provision in the bill which supervises the mere issuance and sale of stock in a purely local concern at home that has naught to do with the stock market, and is not listed, merely because of the wrongs cited by him respecting the Insull properties? Such is the claim made in correspondence to me, and referred to in the press of this morning.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I shall come to that part of the discussion in a short while.

Mr. LEWIS. Then, I shall not now disturb the Senator.

Mr. FLETCHER. The Senator's suggestion was mentioned by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG]. The purpose of the committee is not to bring within the operations of the act local enterprises where the stock is handled in a community with local capital, and not distributed throughout the country, not moving in interstate commerce through the mails, and that sort of thing. We do not attempt to deal with issues of that kind at all. I shall mention that subject a little later.

Mr. LEWIS. I shall not now disturb the Senator further, since he is to allude to the subject, responding to the query of the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. FLETCHER. I shall allude to it in a short while.

The testimony of Harold Stuart was to the effect that in the state of the public mind early in 1929, 10 times as great a volume of Insull securities could have been traded in on the market as was offered; showing how the public went wild on the subject of speculation, induced and led on, in a way, by the efforts to expand the speculative spirit; and prices went to unreasonable heights. We realize that. At the same time, the public lost their money.

POOL INFORMATION RADIO CORPORATION OF AMERICA (NEW STOCK)

[Hearings, p. 467, pt. 2, 72d Cong.]

Mr. President, in connection with the flotation of this stock it is to be borne in mind that the original Radio stock had run up to a very high figure—over $500—and that this new stock was a split-up on the basis of 5 to 1, and issued with no par value.

The pool was organized March 7, 1929, and closed March 30, 1929. However, its actual operations took place between March 12 and March 19, or within a period of 1 week. Thomas E. Bragg, of W. E. Hutton & Co., was manager.

There appear to have been three leading operations.

Firm	Shares	Subparticipants	Deposits	Profits
M. J. Meehan & Co	551,500	24	$9,657,500	$3,217,570.08
W. E. Hutton & Co	257,500	35	2,730,500	1,502,310.68
Block & Maloney Co	35,000	10	285,000	204,197.56
Total	844,000	69	12,683,000	4,924,078.27

[From pp. 469–471, pt. 2, 72d Cong.]

Two million nine hundred thousand shares changed hands in the week, page 517, part 2, Seventy-second Congress.

Early in March 1929 the high on new Radio was $79. On March 16 it was $109.25. On March 23 it was $87.25. At the time of testimony, Thomas E. Bragg, on Thursday, May 19, 1932, it was stated to be quoted at $4.

As evidence of how inspired publicity followed the course of the pool, reference can be made to the hearings, page 518, part 2, Seventy-second Congress. The quotations are from the Wall Street Journal.

In the lists of participants were 16 who put up no deposits, but who received profits as follows:

T. J. Nara	$87,513.24
Mrs. M. J. Meehan	87,513.24
A. G. Fisher	29,171.09
E. F. Fisher	29,171.09
Dr. P. M. Gransman	5,834.22
T. E. Bragg, P. A. Rockefeller, B. E. Smith (joint account)	46,673.73
Walter Richards	$29,171.08
J. F. Reardon	58,342.15
Mrs. D. Sarnoff	58,342.15
Fred J. Fisher	58,342.16
Lee Olwell	5,834.22
T. Clark	5,834.22
Joe Soloman	11,668.43
H. Cunningham	58,342.16
Mrs. P. J. Maloney, Sr	40,839.51
Mrs. P. J. Maloney, Jr	40,839.51

In addition $92,000 was distributed to those who were not participants at all.

DILLON, READ & CO.—POOLS, ETC.

Exhibit C, on page 2224 of the hearings, part 4, Seventy-third Congress, covering 10 pages of tabulation, shows pools, joint accounts, syndicates, and/or trading accounts in stocks in which Dillon, Read & Co. or agencies or representatives participated and of which Dillon, Read & Co. were managers.

Some of the operations were quite small, and show 22 in which profits were made, and 22 in which losses were incurred. The stocks participated in were industrials, utilities, railroads, foreign, and miscellaneous. These tables are inconclusive as to the extent to which the public suffered from inside manipulation.

In the 44, more or less, pools formed by Dillon, Read & Co. the following appear more than once:

American Chain Co	2
General Printing Co	6
Loew's	2
National Park Bank	4
Penn Industries	2
Central States Electric Corporation	4
Commercial Investment Trust	6
International Printing Ink	5
Penn Bank Shares & Securities	2

In the Annalist, covering the stock transactions of 1933, more than one half of the corporations represented by Dillon, Read & Co. pools do not appear as showing any sales or purchases last year. With the facts available, it is not possible to state whether or not this means they have altogether disappeared from the market.

Attention is drawn to the fact that in the stocks of three pools formed by Dillon, Read & Co. there is still heavy activity, as, for instance:

Pool of 1929, Chrysler common: 1932—high 21¾, low 5; 1933—high 57⅝, low 7¾; 1933—turn-over, 12,689,450 shares.

Pools of 1928, Commercial Investment Trust common: 1932—high 27⅞, low 10⅞; 1933—high 44½, low 18; 1933—turn-over, 765,721 shares.

J. P. MORGAN & CO.—DREXEL & CO.

On pages 269–287 of the hearings, part 1, Seventy-third Congress, appears a summary showing pools, joint accounts, syndicates, and/or trading accounts in stocks in which Morgan & Co. or Drexel & Co. were interested. For the most part these were joint arbitrage accounts.

Some of these operations were quite small, and there were 38 in which profits were made and 4 in which losses were incurred. The stocks participated in were industrials, utilities, mining, railroads, and miscellaneous. The summary does not show the extent to which the public lost.

NATIONAL CITY BANK OF NEW YORK, CAPITAL STOCK

On January 27, 1930, Dominick & Dominick, as managers, secured an option on stock of the National City Bank of New York, with an indeterminate date for winding up. The option was as follows, as appears on page 1956 of the hearings, part 6, Seventy-second Congress: 5,000 shares at $212.50, 5,000 shares at $215, 5,000 shares at $217.50, 5,000 shares at $220, 3,000 shares at $225, 3,000 shares at $230, 3,000 shares at $235, and 3,000 shares at $240.

Details of purchases and sales appear on pages 1959 and 1960 of the hearings, part 6, Seventy-second Congress, showing that between January 29, 1930, and March 24, 1930, the profits on transactions were $354,088.10, divided as follows:

Hornblower & Weeks, 19.8 percent participation	$63,098.50
Abbott, Hoppin & Co., 1 percent participation	3,186.79
Dominick & Dominick, 10 percent managers' fee	35,408.81
Dominick & Dominick, 19.8 percent participation	63,098.50
C. D. Barney & Co., 19.8 percent participation	63,098.50
Cassatt & Co., 19.8 percent participation	63,098.50
Brown Bros. & Co., 19.8 percent participation	63,098.50

Succeeding testimony, beginning on page 1965, given by Hugh B. Baker, president of National City Co., shows that that company during 1929 sold to the public upward of 1,300,000 shares of the capital stock of the National City Bank. The testified volume of business in National City Bank stock, as appears on page 1967, was shown to be over $2,000,000,000. The testimony showed that brokers acting for the National City Co. in purchasing National City Bank stock secured credits direct from the National City Bank for the purchase, thus by implication making the bank financially interested in buying its own stock to be handed out to the public through the National City Co.

On page 2178 of the hearings, under date of October 29, 1929, it appears that the National City Co. of California notified Edgar E. Brown, of Pottsville, Pa., but then living in Beverley Hills, Calif., that they had sold on his account 200 shares of National City Bank stock at $320 flat. The public quotation of National City Bank stock on that date was $450, and on October 30, $360.

Bonds were bought by the syndicate at $96.675. The bonds were bought on March 9, and the profit checks distributed April 22, but the testimony does not give the details as to the profits made. The price of these bonds today is not ascertainable from the Analyst covering 1933.

ELECTRIC AUTO LITE CO.

A minor operation took place in March 1931, affecting Electric Auto Lite Co. It was managed by M. J. Meehan & Co. on joint account of Bradford Ellsworth and Jos. B. Higgins. An option has been granted to Mr. Higgins on 25,000 shares at 70. The total shares purchased in the market was 94,000, and the total sales 92,000. A profit of $35,000 was made in the operation. There appears to have been no money put up in carrying the operation through. On March 10, the public was paying 71½, and on April 27, 1931, 49. The above statement is based upon a formal paper prepared for the use of Mr. Gray, counsel of the committee, May 18, 1932.

COPPER STOCKS

On March 19, 1929, W. E. Hutton & Co. announced by a private and confidential circular that they were forming a copper-stock trading account, to be managed by them. The pool lasted until May 24, 1929, handled 676,000 shares, and lost in general the difference between stock at 163¼ and 127¾, later dropping to 104. There had, however, been an Anaconda syndicate formed January 27 to March 25, 1929, which had traded 298,000 shares on a deposit of $2,583,826.58, the profit on which transaction was $1,225,765.54.

AIR REDUCTION

The following is a quotation of what occurred in the hearing, as appears on page 326, part 1, hearings in the Seventy-second Congress—a discussion in which Mr. Gray and Mr. Percy Rockefeller took part. The point was chiefly as to his operation in Air Reduction stock, as follows:

Senator FLETCHER. That stock went from about 214 to 55, did it not?

Mr. GRAY. Now?

Senator FLETCHER. Fifty-five now, and it was 214.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER. I think that is approximately correct. I think it is below 55 now.

Mr. GRAY. What have been the high and low quotations of that stock since your pool was organized?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER. I don't remember what the quotation was when the syndicate was arranged. I think it got up to over 200.

Mr. GRAY. What is it today?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER. About 40.

ATLANTIC GULF & WEST INDIES

According to the testimony of Richard F. Hoyt, an officer of Hayden, Stone & Co., a pool in Atlantic Gulf & West Indies stock (A.G.W.I.) was operated for 6 weeks from November 17 to December 31, 1920. It was claimed that this pool was organized to support A.G.W.I. at 102, but it was later shown that members of the firm of Hayden, Stone & Co. " were secretly unloading their stock under cover of an active campaign by their customers men, directed by Mr. Richard F, Hoyt, urging the stock as a splendid investment," according to a statement by Miss Grace Van B. Roberts, appearing on pages 1821–1826 of the hearings, part 6, Seventy-second Congress.

While the records show no complete totals as to the number of shares in this poll, or the losses the public sustained, in the testimony of Miss Roberts, on pages 1127–1144 and 1821–1826, there were several discussions in the committee, because the evidence of Miss Roberts showed that the members of Hayden, Stone & Co. were unloading their stock and yet at the same time urging customers to buy. The correspondence from Richard Whitney with various people named in the testimony defended Hayden, Stone & Co.; nevertheless, Miss Roberts secured a verdict against Hayden, Stone & Co. in court for $16,000, which Hayden, Stone & Co. paid, as appears on page 1129.

SENATOR GLASS ON POOLS, ETC.

On page 499, part 2, Seventy-second Congress, in the cross-questioning of James F. McConnachie, of M. J. Meehan & Co., Senator Glass put this question:

What difference does it make in the principle of the thing whether a syndicate loses money or makes money if it is organized to manipulate the market?

HAROLD STUART

[Hearings, p. 1674, 72d Cong.]

In connection with other testimony, when invited to make suggestions as to the betterment of conditions, Mr. Stuart said:

I will speak briefly, because I know that you have not much time and want to hear others. I think that we should adopt the English practice of not only having very complete prospectuses of all issues, but that we should write in the prospectus what the security cost, what the company got for it.

Senator COUZENS. Is that along the lines of the British Companies Act?

Mr. STUART. Yes, sir. The investor in England sees, therefore, when he buys a security just what the company got for it and how much spread there is between the price the company got and the price he is expected to pay.

(There is no prompt way of reporting on total sales over the counter or out-of-town markets, or unlisted of various kinds, but the same trends may be safely counted on. The industrial and miscellaneous shares sold, for instance, on the New York Produce Exchange securities market in 1933 are estimated at about 10 million.)

ONE ALCOHOL POOL

Mr. President, the committee on Banking and Currency in April 1932 began its examination of stock-exchange practices. During our careful series of hearings from that time until now, we have produced evidence that the investing and speculating public had been the victims of much manipulation by insiders.

The demand for our research came from the stock-exchange collapse of 1929. We had hoped that the revelations of wrong done would have produced a chastened attitude in the Street or an enlightened suspiciousness among investors and caution among speculators. However, during July 1933—on July 18, to be exact—there was a feverish market, and a collapse in what were called "repeal" or "alcohol stocks", stocks which might be affected by the repeal of the eighteenth amendment. The rapid rise in prices of these so-called "alcohol stocks" and the subsequent decline, prompted your committee, through its counsel, Ferdinand Pecora, to request information from Richard Whitney, president of the New York Stock Exchange, as to trading and operations between May 13 and July 24, 1933.

On October 16, Mr. Whitney forwarded to Mr. Pecora without comment "the report made by our accounting department concerning the trading in the so-called 'alcohol stocks'" during the period I have indicated.

The report of John Dessau to the committee on business conduct of the New York Stock Exchange, dated October 1, 1933, referred to the following stocks: American Commercial Alcohol, Commercial Solvents, Libbey-Owens-Ford Glass, National Distillers Products Corporation, Owens-Illinois Glass, and United States Industrial Alcohol.

I now quote from the report:

With the exception of the situation disclosed at Lehman Bros. and Redmond & Co., which situations also are reflected in a minor way in other firms used as their brokers and the possible exception of the situation at W. E. Hutton & Co., which is still under investigation, no material situation appears.

While the limitations of time available for these examinations precluded a detailed examination and tie up of every transaction, it is my opinion that there were no material deliberate improprieties in connection with transactions in these securities. Although the repeal situation appears to have created a public interest in these stocks great enough to account for their activity, each examiner was directed to watch out for any evidence of "wash sales" or of other activities which might have stimulated improperly the activity of these stocks, yet none were reported.

Mr. Pecora had, however, very strong conviction that these alcohol stocks had been traded in for pool accounts; therefore, when our committee met on February 14, 1934, to hear opinions on the National Securities Exchange Act of 1934, Senate bill 2693, certain material in the possession of Mr. Pecora and witnesses confirmatory of the significance of that material were brought forward, because it had become evident that neither the stock exchange, the officials of certain corporations, nor the professional manipulators and specialists had learned anything from our previous hearings as to rights and wrongs in market operations.

I should like to cover all the evidence of hearings on February 14, 15, 16, 20, 21, and 22, but shall confine myself to comments on the testimony of Russell R. Brown, chairman of the board, American Commercial Alcohol Corporation, of New York City, and of those called in substantiation of his testimony. This testimony shows a repetition of all the typical deception and double dealing that brought on calamity for the gullible public in 1929. These words are severe, but their severity will be justified by direct quotations from or mention of sworn testimony of Russell R.

Brown, Ruloff E. Cutten, Frank Altschul, J. K. Whanger, Charles C. Wright, and others.

I quote from testimony given from February 14 to February 22, 1934:

Mr. PECORA. At the time of the incorporation of the company, what was its capital structure, Mr. Brown?

Mr. BROWN. Bonds, preferred stock, and common stock.

Mr. PECORA. In what proportions and amounts?

Mr. BROWN. I think approximately $4,000,000 in bonds, and $2,000,000 in preferred stock, and the balance in common stock.

Mr. PECORA. How many shares of stock was the corporation authorized to issue, and what were the classifications of stock?

Mr. BROWN. That I do not remember.

Mr. PECORA. Do you know what the capital structure of the company was at the time you became chairman of the board in April of 1931?

Mr. BROWN. There was nothing but common stock outstanding then.

Mr. PECORA. And how many shares?

Mr. BROWN. If my memory serves me correctly, 380,000 shares of no-par value, which was subsequently changed to $10 par value, and afterwards cut in half to 190,000 shares of $20 par value.

Mr. PECORA. When was the stock put on a $20 par value basis?

Mr. BROWN. I think in 1932, if I am not mistaken.

* * * * * * *

Mr. PECORA. Now, since you became chairman of the board have there been any additional issues of capital stock?

Mr. BROWN. That is correct. There have been approximately 55,000 or rather 66,000 shares issued.

Mr. PECORA. When was that issue made?

Mr. BROWN. In June or July, or at least in May, June, or July of 1933.

Senator GORE. How much?

Mr. BROWN. What was that?

The CHAIRMAN. Senator Gore wishes to know how many shares were issued.

Mr. BROWN. Approximately 66,000 shares; of which 25,000 shares were issued in exchange for other corporations, and forty-one thousand-odd shares issued for subscription by stockholders.

The CHAIRMAN. And did those shares have any par value?

Mr. BROWN. That all has a par value of $20 a share.

The further questioning of counsel was interrupted by the request of Mr. Brown to submit a formal statement in advance of any specific approach to pools, options, syndicates, and so forth. From this statement I quote portions of two paragraphs:

The plan was my own undertaking, with the intention of aiding the company in its emergency, and in this I had the support of my associates in the company. For their acts in so cooperating I wish to assume full personal responsibility. I, with their help, and through market support, protected the company and its stockholders in a grave emergency, more grave than the emergency of 1929, when, as has been said, undisclosed market support by companies was not only justified but desirable.

The method employed was unusual and abnormal. The emergency and the abnormal time and no selfish motive created the necessity, and the present excellent condition of the company is one of the best evidences of the justification of the steps that were taken.

Later in this statement it will be shown that Mr. Brown and other officials shared directly in profits from pool operations, as well as indirectly, through names which would not reveal their interest; that dummy representatives brought other corporations into existence to give an apparently broader base to the A.C.A. Corporation; and that these dummies appeared in the distribution of profits and in corporations that were declared to be in existence but never functioned.

Mr. PECORA. Now, during the year 1932, while you were chairman of the board, did you and other directors and officers of the company give any options?

Mr. BROWN. Yes.

Mr. PECORA. Covering the capital stock of the company to any individual or individuals?

Mr. BROWN. Yes.

Mr. PECORA. Did you give more than one such option during that year?

Mr. BROWN. Yes, sir.

Mr. PECORA. How many did you give?

Mr. BROWN. I cannot tell you exactly. I think the first one was given to Mr. Frank E. Bliss, and I think the next one was given to Ames Bros. The next one was given to a man named Goodwin.

Mr. PECORA. Will you talk a little louder? We cannot hear you.

Mr. BROWN. The next one was given to Goodwin, or to Prentice & Slepack.

Mr. PECORA. You will have to talk a little louder. We cannot hear you.

Mr. BROWN. And finally a series of options was given to Mr. Ruloff Cutten.

Mr. PECORA. What was the business of these optionees whose names you have given to us?

Mr. BROWN. Well, they were connected with the stock exchange or——

Mr. PECORA (interposing). Do you mean the New York Stock Exchange?

Mr. BROWN. Either with the exchange, or they worked down in the Street there; yes, sir.

Mr. PECORA. That is——

Mr. BROWN (continuing). All of them were connected with the exchange, I believe.

Mr. PECORA. As members?

Mr. BROWN. I think so.

Thereupon photostatic and other material evidence was introduced as to the options.

1. Russell R. Brown to Frank E. Bliss, February 15, 1932, for voting trust certificates, option to run 30 days: 1,500 shares at 7 per share, 1,500 shares at 8 per share, $1,500 shares at 9 per share, 1,500 shares at 9½ per share, 1,500 shares at 10 per share, 1,500 shares at 11 per share.

2. Philip Publicker to Frank E. Bliss, February 15, 1932, for voting trust certificates, option to run 30 days: 1,000 shares at 7 per share, 1,000 shares at 8 per share, 1,000 shares at 9 per share, 1,000 shares at 9½ per share, 1,000 shares at 10 per share, 1,000 shares at 11 per share.

(Philip Publicker was a director of the A.C.A. on this date.)

3. William S. Kies to Frank E. Bliss, February 15, 1932: 1,000 shares at 7 per share, 1,000 shares at 8 per share, 1,000 shares at 9 per share, 1,000 shares at 9½ per share, 1,000 shares at 10 per share, 1,000 shares at 11 per share.

(William S. Kies was a director as well as chairman of the executive committee of the A.C.A. on this date.)

4. Richard H. Grimm to Frank E. Bliss, February 15, 1932, for voting trust certificates, option to run 30 days; 1,500 shares at 7 per share, 1,500 shares at 8 per share, 1,500 shares at 9 per share, 1,500 shares at 9½ per share, 1,500 shares at 10 per share, 1,500 shares at 11 per share.

(Richard H. Grimm was president of the A.C.A. on this date.)

Mr. PECORA. How many shares were listed at that time on the New York Stock Exchange?

Mr. BROWN. I should say approximately 380,000 shares.

Mr. PECORA. Three hundred and eighty thousand.

Mr. BROWN. Yes.

Senator TOWNSEND. What was the amount of the options given?

Mr. PECORA. There was a total of 30,000 shares covered by these four options.

The testimony shows that these shares were personally owned by Brown, Publicker, Kies, and Grimm.

At this time the stock was selling for between 6¾ and 8. The testimony of Mr. Brown was that he did not expect Mr. Bliss to sell the stocks, but only to sponsor them, and to serve in "stabilizing the price."

Mr. BROWN. If I remember that particular option, when the option expired, much to my surprise, Mr. Bliss called the entire quantity, all of it. Also, if my memory serves me correctly, I immediately replaced all the stock that had been called by purchase in the open market.

Senator BARKLEY. You mean he called all the 9,000?

Mr. BROWN. Yes.

Senator BARKLEY. At less than 11?

Mr. BROWN. I called him one day and told him that we did not want to renew the option.

Senator TOWNSEND. When did the option expire?

Mr. BROWN. I have forgotten.

Mr. PECORA. It was a 30-day option.

Senator GORE. Give us the history of what transpired.

Mr. BROWN. When the option expired—I do not know the range of the stock during the time the option was out, but if my memory serves me correctly, when I called Mr. Bliss and told him that we did not desire to renew the option, he called all the stock. He apparently had disposed of the whole business, and that was very much of a surprise to me, and I immediately went in the market and replaced it.

Senator STEIWER. At what price?

Mr. BROWN. A price above this—around 11 or 12.

Senator BARKLEY. He called this stock, then, in violation of your agreement with him?

Mr. BROWN. He had the option.

Senator BARKLEY. But the private understanding was that it was not to be called.

Mr. BROWN. I told him what our desires were.

* * * * * * *

Mr. BROWN. No. In all fairness to Mr. Bliss, I would say that I told him, at the time the options were given, that we did not want any of the stock called. He made no commitment on his part.

Mr. PECORA. Did the same thing happen with regard to the other three option agreements, those given by Mr. Kies, Mr. Publicker, and Mr. Grimm, respectively?

Mr. BROWN. I think they were all called.

Mr. PECORA. All 30,000 shares?

Mr. BROWN. I think so, and I think they were all replaced.

Mr. PECORA. During the period of these options was the purpose that you had in mind of stabilizing the market well served?

Mr. BROWN. Yes; except that it cost me money.

Testimony was then given as to other options, as follows:

June 11, 1932, to Prentice & Slepack, 29 days' option: 2,000 at 12½, 2,000 at 13½, 2,000 at 14½.

Option given by Russell R. Brown July 11, 1932, to Prentice & Sleback, 32 days' option: 1,000 at 12½, 2,000 at 13½, 2,000 at 14½.

Option given by Brown & Grimm July 22, 1932 to Prentice & Slepack, 21 days' option: 1,000 at 13½, 1,000 at 14½.

Mr. PECORA. What was the purpose that you and Mr. Grimm had in granting these three options to Prentice & Slepack?

Mr. BROWN. I don't remember.

Mr. PECORA. What is that?

Mr. BROWN. I don't remember.

Mr. PECORA. Well, now, isn't it rather singular that you recalled with some clarity the reason——

Mr. BROWN (interposing). Well, I assume——

Mr. PECORA (continuing). Why you and Mr. Grimm and Mr. Kies and Mr. Publicker gave the options in February 1932 to Mr. Bliss, and do not recall the reason why you gave these options in June and July 1932 to Prentice & Slepack?

Mr. BROWN. No. I assume it is for the same purpose.

Mr. PECORA. The same purpose for which the options were given in February 1932 to Bliss?

* * * * * * *

Senator GORE. Mr. Brown, you say the purpose of all these options was to stabilize the market?

Mr. BROWN. Yes; that was supposed to be it.

Senator GORE. The only way you could do that would be to buy when the stock was too low and sell when the stock was too high, wouldn't it?

Mr. BROWN. I suppose they did that; I didn't do it.

Senator GORE. Was that what you had in mind?

Mr. BROWN. However, they operate in the market. I assume that that would be it.

Senator GORE. It was your idea that they would sell when the price ran up too high?

Mr. BROWN. That is correct. Yes, Senator.

Senator GORE. Now, of course, I don't understand much about this market business——

Mr. BROWN. Neither do I.

Senator GORE. But it seems to me that the only way they could profit by these actions would be by some means to raise the price in the market higher than the price you would stipulate in these options, and then call the options at that higher price.

Mr. BROWN. I don't know.

The next option discussed was as follows:

August 9, 1932, to Stephen M. Ames, 30-day option: 10 lots of 1,000 shares each progressing from $16.50 to $21 in half-dollar rises. Option given by Russell Brown.

Mr. PECORA. And on whose initiative was this option given to Mr. Ames?

Mr. BROWN. On my own initiative.

Mr. PECORA. On yours? And what were your purposes in giving him this option?

Mr. BROWN. Same idea that prevailed before.

Mr. PECORA. That is, to stablize the market?

Mr. BROWN. Yes, sir; if I remember correctly.

Mr. PECORA. Was the market then in need of stabilization?

Mr. BROWN. We thought so.

Mr. PECORA. Had there been any violent movements in the quotations?

Mr. BROWN. Not that I remember.

Mr. PECORA. It had been pretty orderly from February 1932 when you gave the first of these options to Mr. Bliss, had it not?

Mr. BROWN. Well, I mean I really don't remember.

Mr. PECORA. Was not the stock steadily increasing in value on the exchange from February 1932 after you gave the first of these options?

Mr. BROWN. Might have been; yes, sir.

Mr. PECORA. Was there any apparent need at the time you gave this option to Mr. Ames of any stabilization of the market?

Mr. BROWN. Well, we felt so.

Mr. PECORA. Who felt so?

Mr. BROWN. I felt so, with my associates.

Mr. PECORA. What were the evidences showing the existence of that need at this time, in August 1932?

Mr. BROWN. Well, I just don't remember.

Mr. PECORA. As a matter of fact, the market had been steadily going up, hadn't it?

Mr. BROWN. Well, apparently, from the prices at which these options were given.

Mr. PECORA. Can you recall any circumstance that suggested to you a need for stabilization which was effected through the medium of this option to Ames?

Mr. BROWN. No, sir.

These options, with perhaps one exception, all contained a clause agreeing to hold a certain number of shares available for borrowing by the optionee.

Mr. PECORA. Now, I notice that in the options to Mr. Bliss there are provisions corresponding to these that I have specifically called to your attention from the options to Ames and to Prentice & Slepack, respectively.

Mr. BROWN. Yes, sir.

Mr. PECORA. In other words, the Bliss options contain a clause which I will read to you from the option you personally gave Bliss: "The party of the first part"—meaning yourself—" agrees to loan to the party of the second part at any time during the option period all or any part of such 6,000 certificates then remaining unsold under this option, such loans to be made according to the usual Street custom", and so forth.

You observe that?

Mr. BROWN. Yes, sir.

Mr. PECORA. So that in all of these options, beginning with those given to Bliss in February 1932, the discussion between you and the optionees, respectively, contemplated short selling too. Is that right?

Mr. BROWN. On their part; yes, sir.

Mr. PECORA. On their part, and that was part of the scheme to stabilize the market, was it?

Mr. BROWN. I assume so.

Mr. PECORA. Was it?

Mr. BROWN. Yes, sir.

The hearings then took up options given to Ruloff E. Cutten by Russell R. Brown, as follows:

September 12, 1932, to Ruloff E. Cutten, 90-day option: 2,500 at 22, 2,500 at 23, 5,000 at 24, 5,000 at 25, 5,000 at 25.

September 11, 1932, to Ruloff E. Cutten, 90-day option: 2,500 at 27, 2,500 at 28, 2,500 at 29, 2,500 at 30.

December 12, 1932, to Ruloff E. Cutten, 90-day option: 2,500 at 20, 2,500 at 21, 2,500 at 22, 2,500 at 23, 5,000 at 24, 5,000 at 25, 5,000 at 26.

March 12, 1933, to Ruloff E. Cutten, 60-day option: 2,000 at 16, 2,000 at 17, 2,000 at 18, 2,000 at 19, 2,000 at 20.

Each of these Cutten options contained two illuminating paragraphs, one providing for the use of an equal number of shares for borrowing purposes, and the other—

The party of the first part will be entitled to receive 25 percent of the net profits of such account and will not be required to participate in the losses of such account.

Now, Mr. Brown, did you have any associates in the granting of these four options to Mr. Cutten?

Mr. BROWN. Yes; Mr. Grimm, Mr. Publicker, and Mr. Kies.

Mr. PECORA. Then why didn't they sign the agreements, or why aren't they even set up as parties to the agreements?

Mr BROWN. Well, as to that I cannot explain it, except that it was the practice for me to sign the various options, is all.

Mr. PECORA. Well, the practice originally was for each optioner to execute a separate agreement in his name.

Mr. BROWN. Yes, sir.

Mr. PECORA. That was the practice followed in the case of the four options given to Mr. Bliss?

Mr. BROWN. Yes; that is correct.

Mr. PECORA. Who drew up these agreements with Mr. Cutten?

Mr. BROWN. I think I did.

Mr. PECORA. Was it your contemplation at the time you gave Mr. Cutten these options that he would call upon you for the stock covered by the options?

Mr. BROWN. No.

* * * * * * *

Mr. PECORA. Now, the period of time covered by the four Cutten option agreements terminated on May 12, 1933.

Mr. BROWN. That is correct.

Mr. PECORA. You and those same associates of yours had commenced to give options to stock-exchange members as far back as February of 1932, a period of a year and a quarter.

Mr. BROWN. That is correct.

Mr. PECORA. During that time was any announcement made to the stockholders of your company as to you and your fellow officers and directors giving these options?

Mr. BROWN. No.

Mr. PECORA. Do you know who the other participants were in the trading account that was provided to be maintained by Cutten under these four option agreements?

Mr. BROWN. No, sir.

Mr. PECORA. Did you ever learn who they were?

Mr. BROWN. No, sir.

Mr. PECORA. Well, would it surprise you to know that they were as follows:

Mrs. Augusta Edgerton, who, I understand, is the wife of a partner of the brokerage firm of Melady & Co.

Mitchell Hutchins & Co., Chicago brokers.

Adrienne Ames, who was the wife of Stephen E. Ames, the broker to whom you had given the preceding option.

First Chrold Corporation, which, I understand, is a trading company in the office of E. F. Hutton & Co.

Cutten & Co., Ltd., which we have heard of before in the hearings before this committee, as a Canadian company organized for the benefit of some of the brothers or sisters or relatives of Mr. Arthur Cutten, who is a cousin of Ruloff Cutten.

Now, did you know that before?

Mr. BROWN. No, sir.

Mr. PECORA. Well, in view of the fact that you and your associates had, among the four of you, a 25-percent interest in this trading account, weren't you interested in knowing who the other participants were in that trading account?

Mr. BROWN. I never realized that there were other people in it. I assumed that Mr. Cutten was taking that.

Mr. PECORA. Well, were there profits received by you and your brother officers and directors of the company, from your participation in this trading account?

Mr. BROWN. Yes, sir.

Mr. PECORA. And you received them after the 12th day of May 1933, I presume?

Mr. BROWN. Yes, sir.

* * * * * * *

Mr. PECORA. Subsequent to the giving of these four options to Mr. Cutten, did you give any options on the stock of your company to anyone else?

Mr. BROWN. On the 2d day of May I gave an option to Thomas E. Bragg.

This option was for 90 days and was based on 25,000 shares at $18 per share, with shares held available for borrowing up to the total unsold on any one day during the option period. The option also contained this provision:

4. It is understood that this option is to be assigned to a syndicate to be formed by the party of the second part.

The option was increased to 40,949 shares at $20 on May 31. The syndicate manager, T. E. Bragg, was to receive $1 a share for his services.

Mr. PECORA. Now, Mr. Brown, do I understand you to say to this committee that the option given to Bragg on May 2, 1933, is in some way directly related to the necessity which became apparent to the officers of the company in March of 1933, that it would have to raise additional working capital?

Mr. BROWN. That is correct, sir.

Mr. PECORA. All right, for that. Now, in view of the fact that this option is not given by the corporation, and does not provide for the corporation receiving any part of the purchase price which the optionee would be required to pay for the 25,000 shares optioned to him at $18 per share, how did this option serve to provide your company with that increased or additional working capital?

The subsequent statements of Mr. Brown regarding these Bragg options was that they were designed to bring financial strength to the corporation. To do this he and his associates had set up two subsidiary corporations, as follows: Maister Laboratories Co., $180,000; Noxon, Inc., $270,000.

Mr. Brown accepted an unsecured note from K. B. Phagan for $180,000 and transferred to him 10,000 shares of A.C.A. stock as giving financial backing for Maister Laboratories Co. by thus purchasing its stock. Phagan was acting solely as a "dummy." Mr. Brown accepted an unsecured note from C. C. Capdevielle for $270,000 and transferred to him 15,000 shares of A.C.A. stock as giving a financial backing to Noxon, Inc., by thus purchasing its stock. Capdevielle was acting solely as a dummy. Here it is appropriate to quote direct from the testimony.

Mr. BROWN. The procedure, Senator, that was followed in this Noxon case was that Capdevielle's note was in for $270,000, and there were certain other arrangements with Noxon, Inc., and as a result of that Capdevielle acquired certain securities of Noxon, Inc., which he in turn made a deal with us which had been orally and verbally accepted in the early part of May 1933 for 15,000 shares of the company's stock, which was delivered under this option at $18 a share, and he received the cash; then, having liquidated American Commercial Alcohol stock, proceeded to liquidate his note for $270,000.

That, then, brought under the control of the American Commercial Alcohol Corporation the $180,000 in the Maister organization, $270,000 in the Noxon organization, and there is your total of $450,000, funds which were used to improve the financial situation of the consolidated organization.

* * * * * * *

Mr. PECORA. Maister came in 100 percent controlled and owned; Noxon came in 65 percent controlled. Immediately funds were borrowed from both of those corporations by the American Commercial Alcohol Corporation, and payments were immediately made.

Mr. PECORA. Funds were borrowed from both of them, you say?

Mr. BROWN. Yes.

Mr. PECORA. By American Commercial Alcohol Corporation?

Mr. BROWN. Yes.

Mr. PECORA. Both of those corporations merely had promissory notes.

Mr. BROWN. As I indicated to you during my replies, these shares of stock which were received by Capdevielle and by Phagan were immediately put out by them at $18 a share. They were then in possession of funds with which they liquidated their notes.

Mr. PECORA. To whom did they put out capital stock of the American Commercial Alcohol Corporation?

Mr. BROWN. They either put it directly to Bragg or listed it for Mr. Grimm and me.

Mr. PECORA. Which did they do?

Mr. BROWN. Half and half, I should say.

Mr. PECORA. In other words, they made deliveries under this option to Bragg, the option which you gave to Bragg on May 2, 1933?

Now let us move over to stock-exchange practices as covering such an indirect method of raising money from the investing public. The application for listing was made in the usual form or forms, covering in two applications a total of 25,000 shares, to be utilized in acquiring dummy corporations, and in offering forty-one-thousand-two-hundred-and-ninety-three-odd shares to be offered to stockholders of the A.C.A. at the ratio of 1 to 5 already held, to be paid for in cash at $20.

Incidental to these applications the testimony of Frank Altschul, chairman of the committee on stock lists, New York Stock Exchange, shows that the application for listings was granted, though there were later shown to be questionable over-valuations in connection with Noxon, Inc., particularly, involving in a few days an increase in "good will, and so forth" from $80,000 to $380,000.

Finally, when Mr. Altschul was questioned very closely as to stock-exchange procedures, he stated that, after all, the investing public was not fully protected by stock-exchange listing, in the following words:

Mr. ALTSCHUL. * * * I tell you in that case we were deceived. I have here, in case it is of interest to you, a rather lengthy document, which I do not think would be of very much interest, showing you the general tightening up in our procedure from 1926 to 1933. It is constantly in process of development, on the basis of experience. I do not know of any experience in any field that is going to forearm you against every new kind of deceit. With the enormous number of applications acted upon when they are put on the floor, the cases of deceit are rather few, and we try to improve our procedure every time something new comes to our attention, but the trouble about those things is that there is always somebody who is smart enough to try something new, and if he tries something new that has never been tried before, even with the most rigid requirements in the world, he may find some way of fooling you. Whenever that happens, we try to profit by it. I think Mr. Whitney's statement that our requirements go far beyond those of any other market place in the world is unquestionably so.

* * * * * * *

Mr. ALTSCHUL. My recollection is that this application—that in the first instance the committee on stock list received from the executive secretary of the committee a report covering this application; that then later, in the usual manner, they received the application on a Friday afternoon, having an opportunity to go over it before the committee on Monday morning.

The usual procedure was followed in this case: The members went over the application. They saw the different things that were set forth in the application and were prepared to act on it at the meeting on Monday.

In the case of an application of this sort, which is for an additional listing of stock, the questions that are asked by the committee of the executive secretary, who has all of the documents in charge, are to determine whether all of the papers have been placed on file, whether the opinion of counsel is in order, whether the documents that have been filed with us substantiate the printed material that is in the listing application.

Having found nothing in the application that disturbed us in any way, the application was thereupon acted on.

Mr. PECORA. You have through the medium of the testimony given by Mr. Brown today and that you have heard, learned, or acquired knowledge of many facts which you did not heretofore possess with regard to this application, have you not?

Mr. ALTSCHUL. Yes, sir.

Mr. PECORA. Now, if that information and that knowledge of those facts that you gained through hearing Mr. Brown's testimony here today had been before your committee, had been in the possession of your committee or had been acquired by your committee prior to its acting upon the application, do you think your committee would have granted the application?

Mr. ALTSCHUL. If the information, as we understand the information that has been developed here today, sir, had been before us, it would have appeared that this stock was being issued for the purpose of supplying the company with working capital, not for the purpose of acquiring properties. Under those circumstances the question of the preemptive right of stockholders would have been immediately before us and the application would have probably been turned down on that ground, if upon no other.

Now we will turn back to the Bragg options and the syndicate contributions:

Russell R. Brown	$10,000
Rich H. Grimm	10,000
K. B. Phagan	5,000
William S. Kies	10,000
—. —. Chadbourne	5,000
C. C. Capdevielle	1,000
H. S. Brown	2,000
M. M. Ewing (secretary to B. B. Brown)	1,000

W. J. Butter	$1,000
Philip Publicker	5,000
Carl C. Conway	12,500
L. C. Young	12,500
John Bowen	12,500
Thomas Bragg	12,500

According to later testimony the subscriptions to the second Bragg options show only Bragg, Phagan, and Capdevielle putting up a total of $339,103; but in these figures were concealed interest of the various officers of the A.C.A.

Mr. PECORA. What benefits did you think your corporation would get under this underwriting agreement?

Mr. BROWN. I thought that the company would be placed in a splendid financial position, and my judgment in that connection I think is evidenced by the situation in which the company finds itself today.

Mr. PECORA. What benefits did you think would accrue to your corporation, not from the issuance of these forty-thousand-odd shares to its stockholders at a price substantially below the market, but from this underwriting agreement under which your corporation obligated itself to pay a commission of 5 percent?

Mr. BROWN. I thought that I was assisting in assuring the company of the success of the underwriting.

Out of this transaction one J. K. Whanger, an accountant, was led to testify that he had received $65,827.29 and definitely $25,000 out of "the alcohol thing" without any investment on his part.

Pool profits were distributed to various people as follows, but the actual recipients of profits were artfully concealed:

JULY 31, 1933.

W. E. HUTTON & Co.,
New York City.

GENTLEMEN: Kindly let me have checks drawn to the following names and for the following amounts, and charge account no. 296.

L. Young	25,161.74
C. C. Conway	25,161.74

Yours very truly,

The third letter, marked "Exhibit No. 30", is as follows [reading]:

Now for the specialist in this stock. His name was Charles C. Wright, of Wright & Seaton.

Mr. WRIGHT. I will swear to you, Mr. Pecora, that I could not answer what a pool account is.

Mr. PECORA. Well, you have often heard the term, have you not?

Mr. WRIGHT. I have often heard it, and have tried to define it, but I cannot answer the question. There are some pools that are put together for the apparent purpose of buying, and for the apparent purpose of selling, and some for distributing stocks, and for the purpose of making a market in stocks, and some for this purpose, that purpose, and the other purpose. I just have no way of defining the term.

Mr. PECORA. Well, let us take a pool organized for the purpose of making a market in a stock. You have been a participant in such pools in the past, I take it?

Mr. WRIGHT. Yes, sir.

Mr. PECORA. How do such pools operate? Will you tell the committee, from your familiarity with the activities of such a pool account, how it is operated?

Mr. WRIGHT. Some pool accounts operate on options—that is, some by way of direct purchase of stock and redistribute it—and others may be accumulation pools, where they accumulate stocks that somebody desires. Each one is in a different group.

Mr. PECORA. Well, let us take a pool account organized for the purpose of making a market in a stock.

Mr. WRIGHT. All right.

Mr. PECORA. In which an account is organized to trade in the stock.

Mr. WRIGHT. All right.

Mr. PECORA. How does such a pool actually operate in the market? How does it make a market?

Mr. WRIGHT. By creating activity.

Mr. PECORA. And how does it do that?

Mr. WRIGHT. By trading in the stock.

Mr. PECORA. That is, the pool buys and sells the stock?

Mr. WRIGHT. Yes, sir.

Mr. PECORA. For its own account?

Mr. WRIGHT. Yes, sir.

Mr. PECORA. And frequently, if not invariably, such a pool has an option covering the stock in which it trades?

Mr. WRIGHT. That is right.

Mr. PECORA. And it gets that option as a rule from what kind of persons?

Mr. WRIGHT. Sometimes from individuals, and sometimes from officers of the company, and sometimes from large stockholders, and sometimes from the corporation which might hold a good block of stock and which wanted to get rid of it.

Mr. PECORA. And as a rule what is the object sought to be accomplished by those persons who organize a pool account in order to make a market in the stock?

Mr. WRIGHT. Will you put that question again, please?

Mr. PECORA. The committee reporter will read it to you.

(Thereupon the committee reporter read the last question.)

Mr. WRIGHT. To redistribute the stock at a higher price if possible.

Mr. PECORA. That is, to raise the price level of the stock as much as possible?

Mr. WRIGHT. Yes, sir.

* * * * * * *

Mr. Wright made from A.C.A. trades between May and July 1933, $138,000, besides brokerage fees of something in the neighborhood of $2.50 for each 100 shares sold. The total trading in the stock on the New York Stock Exchange between May 15 and July 22 was 1,145,100, of which Mr. Wright handled about one fifth, carrying out instructions to buy and sell, as well as buying and selling for his own account.

Mr. PECORA. Now, Mr. Wright, by such processes or activities on behalf of pool accounts, especially where trading for such pool accounts is done by brokers who are also members of the pool or participants in it, isn't it a fact that the public gets a false notion of the activity in the stock?

Mr. WRIGHT. I would have to think for a second before I try to answer that question.

Mr. PECORA. Surely. You may do that.

Mr. WRIGHT (after a pause of a few moments). Do you want me to talk freely and frankly on this?

Mr. PECORA. Yes; very frankly indeed.

Mr. WRIGHT. Because the public will not trade in stocks that are not active. Naturally when you make a stock active the public will trade in that stock. And many times you are successful and many times you are unsuccessful in such an effort in any particular stock; and if you are running a pool and they do not trade in the stock, that is your hard luck.

Mr. PECORA. Then, activities engendered by pools that are organized to distribute stocks that they hold under option, or which they have already accumulated, at prices which would represent profits to themselves, are activities designed primarily to induce the public to come in and buy, so that distribution may be effected at higher levels?

Mr. WRIGHT. Yes, sir; which is just the same as distributing groceries or any other commodities.

Senator ADAMS. In other words, it is just like anybody going fishing; he wants to fish where the other fellows are.

Mr. WRIGHT. Yes, sir. In many cases, Mr. Pecora, prices of stocks go far beyond what anybody had in mind. I think the history of almost every stock down town is that some days it goes far beyond any dream that anybody had.

Summing up this statement to get a general conclusion on just one stock, we find a stock very inactive, because closely held, raised from $6 plus in February 1932 to $89⅞ on July 18, 1933, then dropping to around $30, and at the time of the hearing selling at about $40. My comments on it do not touch on whether it is valuable and with ample background of business activity, but that various dummy processes and the work of options, syndicates, pools, and so forth, created a false sense of activity that led the public to invest.

Furthermore, it deliberately deceived the New York Stock Exchange on two occasions; on both occasions the New York Stock Exchange according to the statement of Mr. Altschul, did not show alertness as to any deception used to secure the valuable listing privilege of the Stock Exchange.

Consequently it is reasonably clear that no one should speculate in any stocks unless he can afford to lose either in buying or selling; that an investor should always investigate; and that if he cannot do that, he should stay away from any buying, as he is almost helplessly on the outside, subject to suggestions that reach him, not to strengthen his position, but just to make him inclined to buy.

Finally the repeated arguments during our 2 years' hearings that short selling and margin buying are paralleled by any orderly purchase of material goods is not sound, since a stock transaction, for speculation, at least, is a transaction in an intangible thing, fluctuating up and down in price simply by the vagaries of warring minds, and not at all related to intrinsic values.

Mr. President, it will be remembered that the stock exchange claimed the right to make its own rules and regulations, and insisted that it could prevent abuses and correct errors and was willing to attempt it, and it claimed it had been doing so.

There have been some amendments to the rules and regulations. The officials gave us some assurance that they intended to continue to work out certain reforms and make certain revisions of their rules and regulations which would effect the correction of the abuses to which I have referred.

We appealed to them to do that. We hoped they would inaugurate rules and regulations and establish practices which would overcome what Mr. Whitney so clearly stated existed in connection with the stock exchanges, practices which needed to be reformed. They promised to do that, and they did adopt some amendments to their rules which I think were helpful. But evidently—and I believe this is their own view—they are powerless to accomplish all that should be accomplished. In the first place, they have no jurisdiction except over their own members. They have no jurisdiction over outside people issuing securities. In the next place, they have not the power or authority to accomplish what they would like to see accomplished. There is, therefore, need for some regulatory body with ample power to supervise these conditions.

Mr. President, this is shown by the experience, after they had assured us they were amending their rules and were working out reforms, in July and August of last year, in connection with the stocks to which I have referred, showing that these abuses, the formation of pools, the operations of the specialists, and all that sort of thing, were taking place as late as last summer, proving, I think, that the country cannot depend upon the stock exchange to bring about the reforms and the corrections which they themselves admit are necessary in order to correct vicious and unwise practices.

There are some people, of course, who say that the gambling propensity exists in nearly all men, and women as well, and that law should not interfere with its indulgence; in other words, that we cannot prevent people from gambling on the stock exchanges or anywhere else. To a large extent that is true. We cannot by law protect a fool against his folly. We cannot by law do away with gambling propensities. But we can take away the facilities and the attractions and the inducements to people to invest their money in speculative securities and really gamble. We can minimize that sort of thing.

The argument that people must gamble, that they have that impulse which they cannot control, and will gamble, simply leads to a reductio ad absurdum. If it is carried to its full extent, it means that we ought to repeal all laws against gambling in all the States; we ought to establish a lottery in the United States and let people gamble by means of a national lottery, because it is much less harmful than gambling on the stock exchange.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. FLETCHER. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. I was called out today just as the Senator reached the portion of his speech in which he was discussing the question of an independent commission or the Federal Trade Commission as an enforcer of the act. Is it not true that the Federal Trade Commission already has a set-up of experts, and has it not had quite an experience in the handling of other securities, and does not the Senator believe that we would really get a more efficient enforcement of the proposed act by having it administered by the Federal Trade Commission?

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, as I stated while the Senator from Tennessee was out of the Chamber, my personal view was expressed in the terms of the original bill, S. 2693, whereby the administration of the act was reposed in the Federal Trade Commission. I think that Commission has done splendidly in administering the Securities Act. It is a Commission in which I have the fullest confidence, and I have nothing but praise and commendation for what it has already accomplished.

Mr. McKELLAR. I feel the same way about it. I think it has done a wonderful work.

Mr. FLETCHER. But in view of many objections raised to the Federal Trade Commission administering this proposed act on the ground, as was claimed, that its members were not bankers or financiers or acquainted with the handling of securities and that sort of thing, and that those charged with its administration ought to be specially qualified men, acquainted with such transactions and experienced in stock-exchange matters to a large extent, the prevailing sentiment seemed to be that there ought to be a special commission. That was the claim, and that was the demand—that there should be a commission. Partially, I think, in response to that, but in part independent thereof, there was a large sentiment in our committee in favor of a special commission.

To my mind it does not make very much difference one way or the other. If we shall have a special commission of five, appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate, I think we will get a very efficient and capable body to administer this act; so we provided for such a commission.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I have very great doubt about the appointment of experts in that line of business, because I am fearful that their enforcement of the act would not be so good as that of disinterested men, such as the members of the Federal Trade Commission. The House in its bill provided for the Federal Trade Commission as the enforcer of the act, and it seems to me that is a very wise provision to have contained in the bill. I have the greatest confidence in the honesty, the sincerity, and the ability of the Federal Trade Commission. I think it is a wonderful piece of machinery. It has done splendid work. In my judgment, this measure would be better enforced and more equitably enforced, if I may use that expression, in the hands of the Federal Trade Commission than if the enforcement were given over to a new commission. I have very great doubt about a new commission.

Mr. FLETCHER. I am not disposed to disagree with the Senator about that. At the same time, a special commission seems to satisfy the demand and meet the approval of most people—at least, some of the critics of the original idea—and I think a special commission named by the President and approved by the Senate undoubtedly would give entire satisfaction.

Mr. McKELLAR. What was the vote of the Senate committee on this subject?

Mr. FLETCHER. My recollection is that there was a vote of about 2 majority in favor of the special commission. I think the vote was 10 to 8.

I believe the special commission provided for in this bill would give satisfaction to the country and meet some objections; so, accordingly, I have offered an amendment which provides for the transfer of the administration of the Securities Act to the same commission.

Mr. LEWIS. Does the Senator mean to the Federal Trade Commission?

Mr. FLETCHER. No; to the special commission of five.

It is claimed and it has been argued that this proposed legislation would interfere with business. Business is based on confidence. Credit is the result of confidence. Let us insure confidence by giving securities an acknowledged status and recognition by requiring them to be registered and requiring exchanges where they are dealt in to be registered by a responsible agency. Inevitably that will help business, reassure capital, and increase investments.

It is claimed that pools or trading accounts are formed to stabilize prices and maintain a steady market. This is not what the broker wants. He wishes a gyrating market, because he makes commissions on its active movement up or down. Stabilization is the last thing he wants. He is after making money.

The Securities Act has saved millions of dollars to the people—the public.

This act will save billions of dollars—that is, prevent the loss of billions of dollars. Those whose money will thus be saved are some of the people for whom we are speaking.

It is testified that one out of six may win in stock speculation. These people I should like to serve.

It is said that 93 percent of the odd-lot traders lose.

It has been said this bill will put people out of business; will adversely affect business. What business?

There can be no interference with securities exempted from this bill. What are they? See paragraph 12, page 6, of the bill.

Uncontrolled and arbitrary management of security issues, security markets, speculative pitfalls for the unwary investor, selfish and individual management of large corporations affected with a public interest must come to an end.

The principle of trusteeship in all affairs so affected with the public interest must be made dominant and effective.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. FLETCHER. I yield.

Mr. LEWIS. At this point I should like to ask the able Chairman of the Senate Banking and Currency Committee if he is not aware of the fact that England has had for a very long time a form of legislation carrying many provisions similar to those of the present bill and which have been recognized as working a most corrective benefit to and aiding the general welfare of the stock exchanges and the stock holdings in England? I should like to hear a little from the Senator on that subject.

Mr. FLETCHER. Undoubtedly what the Senator says is true. The British companies act has been in effect for many years and is giving great satisfaction. Its provisions have been construed by the courts and form quite a body of precedent for our guidance. The British companies act is largely followed in this bill.

There is one thing I will mention. Under the practice on the London Exchange, there are no margin accounts. The allowance of margins and margin trading in this country has led to a great many abuses and to excessive speculation. That is not permitted in England. When a person is permitted to put up a few dollars on margin to buy stocks and take chances of winning or losing, he is tempted to do so. Margin operation, in my judgment, is responsible for the ruin of thousands and thousands of people.

Judge Clark, of New Jersey, who testified before us, advocated doing away entirely with margins. From his long experience he mentioned the fact that the penitentiaries are crowded with men who have been found guilty of embezzlement and other offenses, all by reason of their operations on the stock exchanges. Not only that, but men have lost their business, lost their property, lost their reputation and their good name by the hundred thousand in this country because they have been tempted to speculate on margin on the stock exchange.

I want to warn the people who have flooded this country with propaganda against this bill and against legislation of this kind, misrepresenting the alleged loss to business, the alleged harmful effect of this proposed legislation on business, the number of people who are going to lose their business, and all that sort of thing, that they will not be able to stem the tide of public opinion demanding this legislation in our country.

It has got to come. They are powerful, but they are not powerful enough to defy Congress. They are strong, but they are not strong enough to obstruct the Government. At least that is my hope and my belief, and I am convinced that unless we pass this proposed legislation now they will take on new strength and double their efforts and we will never pass it.

I feel like warning these gentlemen to this effect, "Continue your opposition and your fight and determination to have your own way, to be free absolutely from any supervision or regulation by anybody; regulate yourselves; I feel that if you persist in that struggle and that determination and that sort of fight and that sort of propaganda, the next movement that will come will be a determined and a successful effort to wipe away margins entirely from stock exchanges." That will take away from the exchanges 40 percent of their business. They will not like to see that; they will not enjoy that; but they are bringing that about, in my judgment, by their attitude respecting this proposed legislation.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. FLETCHER. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. In line with what the Senator just said, I wanted to suggest that, notwithstanding the Committee on Banking and Currency has been engaged in an investigation of this subject for more than 2 years, resulting in more than 21 volumes of printed testimony, notwithstanding the fact that it held open hearings for weeks on this particular measure, many of those who were given an opportunity but did not take advantage of it to come here and offer suggestions as to this proposed legislation, now that it is out of committee and on the calendar of the Senate, are taking advantage of every opportunity to persuade the Senate and the House not to pass any legislation at all on this subject, on the ground that we have not as yet investigated the subject sufficiently to know what sort of act to pass.

Mr. FLETCHER. Precisely. They do not want any legislation at all; that is the whole story. As I said a while ago, I cannot understand why the director of any corporation, or the president or an officer of any corporation should object to a requirement that when he appeals to the public to buy the securities of his company it shall be exacted of him that he put upon the record the truth regarding those securities. Why should he not state the truth? And if he states the truth that is all that is required of him.

Mr. President, Senators have received letters and communications of all sorts from all sections of the country protesting against this proposed legislation; Senators have been flooded with such letters; but perhaps they have not heard from the unorganized victims. I have had bushels of letters from them. It would weary the Senate for me to portray the individual pictures that have been presented, but they ought to be known and they ought to be considered. I could for 2 or 3 hours tell the Senate about particular pathetic cases. I may mention just a few of them. For instance, a maiden lady in a certain town in a certain State had $10,000 of Liberty bonds—and that was all she had in the world—when along comes one of these high-pressure salesmen and persuades her that she ought to be getting 8 percent, at least, in dividends from the stock which he represented and which he claimed was bound to rise in value. He persuaded her to sell her Liberty bonds, and put her $10,000 into an Insull company, and she has lost her whole fortune. That sort of thing is going on everywhere.

I have one from a street sweeper in the city of St. Louis who had accumulated three or four thousand dollars in cash, which was all he had, according to his letter to me, and I have no doubt his statement is true. He was persuaded by one of these salesmen to invest in the stock of an affiliate company, all that he and his wife had saved up, and today it is not worth a cent.

A trucker down in Florida—poor fellow—and his wife worked hard all their lives, taking all the chances of the seasons, fighting insects and what not, taking the chances of the market, selling their products and finally accumulating $1,000 apiece. He saw quoted on the curb exchange in New York the stock of a big Midwest corporation at $1 a share. He thought there must be some profit in it, and he communicated with a broker. The broker told him to send on his $2,000 and he would send him the stock.

He sent the $2,000 and the broker sent him the stock all right. The man who bought it sent me the certificates, and they were very good looking certificates, with a stamp showing the transfer tax paid, and all that kind of thing. Then the purchaser could hear nothing from the corporation or any of its officers, and wrote me to inquire about it. I did inquire and found that the corporation had been in the hands of a receiver for 8 or 10 months, and that at that time it was in bankruptcy. I communicated with the referee in bankruptcy and he told me there were not sufficient assets to pay the Government tax.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. FLETCHER. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Was that broker operating on the exchange?

Mr. FLETCHER. Yes; he was a broker operating on the exchange; yes. I do not know whether he ought to be brought to task about that transaction, because the man wrote him and said, "I see quoted on the curb exchange this stock at $1 a share and I want 2,000 shares of it," 1,000 for himself and 1,000 for his wife. The broker took his order; that is all. Perhaps the broker ought to have warned him what the stock was, but he did not do so; he merely complied with his order, sent him the stock, and got his money, $2,000. In the first place, there ought to be some rule prohibiting the curb exchange or any other exchange listing or carrying on their trading list at all stock of a corporation that has been for some time in the hands of a receiver.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, may I ask if the stock was listed on the exchange?

Mr. FLETCHER. It was listed on the curb exchange, not on the regular exchange; it was quoted on the curb exchange; and that is where this man saw it quoted in the newspaper at a dollar a share. He simply wrote the broker and said, "Buy me 2,000 shares of the stock." It turned out that this stock was not worth the paper on which it was printed, because the corporation itself was in bankruptcy and there were not sufficient assets to pay the Government tax. I could go on and give similar instances involving school teachers and others all over the country who have suffered in that sort of way. They are entitled to some consideration.

I wish to read just some sample cases described in letters which I have received on the subject. I will not take the time of the Senate to read the entire letters, but here is one, for instance, from New York. The writer says:

> I wish to advise you that in 1932 midsummer I bought 300 shares of Macy stock at $44 and I paid for same. Between two brokers, who were handling the transaction, I lost the money completely, so that up to date I have not even received $1.

> Your bill should pass both Houses, and it should be 100 percent more strict in controlling the stock exchange than it now is.

I do not need to put the whole letter in the RECORD. I just read extracts from it.

Some people wrote me who did not want to give their names. I do not believe the writers of any of the letters I now have in my hand made that request. Here is one from St. Louis, Mo., from J. D. McCutcheon, and dated April 19. Perhaps the Senator from Missouri may know the firm.

It is said that we cannot stop speculation, and we ought not to stop speculation. The stock-exchange people want to encourage stock speculation. The writer makes this point, which I will read, in order to emphasize it.

He says:

> Speculation not only makes no essential contribution to the capital financing of business enterprises but creates enormous obstacles to the legitimate performance of this necessary function. By an appeal to their avarice it first destroys the investment consciousness of countless small investors and then destroys their savings and their confidence. Mr. President, I will ask that this letter may be printed in full in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The letter referred to is as follows:

JOHN D. MCCUTCHEON & CO.,
St. Louis, Mo., April 19, 1934.

Hon. DUNCAN U. FLETCHER,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SIR: Speculation not only makes no essential contribution to the capital financing of business enterprises but creates enormous obstacles to the legitimate preformance of this necessary function. By an appeal to their avarice it first destroys the investment consciousness of countless small investors and then destroys their savings and their confidence. It is congenital with our system of capital financing, as at present organized, and feeds on itself at a constantly accelerating pace until it crashes. This cycle will inevitably be a recurring one unless the present system is drastically reorganized. Capital issues should be bought to hold, but they never will so long as the managers of corporations and brokers, who play the game with them, can so handsomely profit by systematically milking the owners and creditors of these corporations.

For 13 years I have been in the security business (5 of which were as manager of the St. Louis office of H. M. Byllesby & Co.) and have reasonably close contact with numerous investors. Judging from these contacts it is my humble opinion that the owners are not only ready but anxious for a drastic reorganization of the system.

Any reform that is at all substantial jeopardizes the interests and property of someone, and those injured become highly articulate in their opposition. But it sometimes happens that the failure to enact a reform injures more people very much more substantially in the aggregate, but, because they are unorganized and inarticulate, their Senators and Congressmen do not hear from them. Naturally, large corporation officials, margin speculators, and members of stock exchanges are violently opposed to the Fletcher-Rayburn bill and the Federal Security Act. It is their particular racket that is injured. And how quickly these rackets become a right. Not so with the real investor who buys bonds to hold to maturity or stocks as a permanent investment, for income and not for speculative profits. I do not know a single such investor who is opposed to the Fletcher-Rayburn legislation. And make no mistake, these are the people who furnish the permanent capital for American business. They not only favor the principle of the measure but definitely believe that the bill cannot, under the circumstances, be too stringently drawn.

The specimen enclosed herewith, which has been very widely distributed throughout this territory, gotten out by a self-appointed group purporting to represent all or substantially all Missouri security dealers, is a sample of the hollow emotionalism by which hundreds of unthinking people are persuaded to write you letters objecting to the legislation.

The propaganda campaign has become so bitter that a good many salesmen, who feel as I do, are afraid to write such a letter as this for fear of blacklisting by employers. This is also true of numerous small dealers, like myself, who fear blacklisting by large underwriting houses upon whom they are dependent for their supply of new securities.

Let us not break faith with millions of honest investors who want a genuine new deal in security issues and in the organized market places for them.

Very respectfully yours,

J. D. MCCUTCHEON.

Mr. FLETCHER. I will next quote from a letter from J. R. Edwards, of Cincinnati, Ohio, who writes under date of April 20, as follows:

> The proposed law before Congress at this time to regulate the stock exchanges is a very necessary law, but due to the fact that so few people know why the system is bad and also due to the intense, seductive propaganda of the New York Stock Exchange the actual facts are perverted.

I will ask, Mr. President, that this letter may also be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The letter entire is as follows:

J. R. EDWARDS & CO.,
Cincinnati, April 20, 1934.

Senator DUNCAN U. FLETCHER,
Senate Building, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR FLETCHER: The proposed stock-exchange control bill is being considered by your body. It is good in every respect, except one dangerous weakness.

The proposed law before Congress at this time to regulate the stock exchanges is a very necessary law, but due to the fact that so few people know why the system is bad and also due to the intense seductive propaganda of the New York Stock Exchange, the actual facts are perverted. Of course the New York Stock Exchange know they are in for a spanking and they are agreeing to many of the proposals in the law to prohibit pools, manipulation, etc., but when it comes to marginal accounts great pressure is being brought to bear that these marginal accounts be permitted to exist. That's where the brokers make their money in two ways. More people can buy stocks on margin and then they lend the public from 50 to 75 percent of the cost of the stocks and they charge 1 to 3 percent over and above the ruling rate for the money so lent.

Now the preamble of the original proposed law, section 2, which I earnestly request you to read (it may be expunged from the redraft of the measure) gave the reasons why speculation should be controlled. It blamed the whole depression upon extravagant speculation from 1927 to 1929, which is true, and I can prove it.

Now extravagant speculation can only be fostered through the use of tremendous sums of borrowed money. First, millions of gamblers buy stock on margin. Then the brokers lend them the balance of the purchase price. The next operation is that the brokers borrow this money from the banks to cover their extension of credit to their customers, and thus brokers loans are created. Now Congress is attempting to regulate the margin, whereas the margin is not the dangerous factor, except that 98 percent of the public lose their margin. The dangerous fact is the creation of brokers' loans that never can be liquidated except through the forced sale of the stocks in a panic, that always wipes out the margin.

This is too important a subject to gloss over or to compromise.

I know that the brokers are bringing great pressure on Congress to continue marginal accounts, but the danger is not in the margins; it is in the brokers' loans that are created by the margins. Congress must understand that brokers' loans are the most unusual class of loan. Unlike any other commercial credit, brokers' loans have no element of self-liquidation. A non-self-liquidating loan is a permanent loan that can only be paid off through the forced sale of assets. Now, brokers' loans can only be paid off at the end of a speculative era through the forced sale of the collateral stocks, which causes or accentuates a stock-market panic. Now, the stock-market panic started on October 23, 1929, and through a period to June of 1932, these brokers' loans were continually under forced liquidation, until stocks were forced to one tenth of their former prices. These loans were liquidated from eight and one half billion dollars down to $250,000,000.

Now, you can see that the forced liquidation of brokers' loans caused everybody that had stocks on margin to lose their margin, and in this case the public took losses estimated between nine and ten billion dollars. There were no original margins big enough to withstand the shrinkage. No country can take these staggering losses without feeling the effect, and the effect was a terrific curtailment of the buying power of the public through these staggering losses plus fear and the loss of confidence. The next effect was the terrific curtailment of business. We know this happened, and we know that this curtailment of business threw 12,000,000 people out of work, whose buying power was destroyed to the tune of $60,000,000,000 in the past 4 years. Nobody can dispute this fact.

But the disasters did not stop here, because with the curtailment of business to 25 percent of normal, the profits normally used to pay interest charges disappeared, and thus there were billions of defaults in bank loans, mortgages, and bonds. This destroyed confidence in most credit and froze billions of credit. Now, you begin to understand why the banks were affected, because they had much of the credit that was involved, either because it was in default or frozen. But in addition, since confidence in credit was destroyed, it demoralized the bond market, so that the bonds held by the banks had terrifically declined. Thus confidence in banks was shaken and hoarding came in waves. Deposits declined from $56,000,000,000 to under $40,000,000,000, which caused banks to liquidate their assets. But this was impossible to do, so 5,000 or 6,000 of them failed, many through no fault of their own. Thus confidence in the remaining banks was destroyed until President Roosevelt had to declare the bank holiday.

In recounting the above I want to bring out the fact it was not the margins that caused the trouble in the first place. It was the liquidation of these brokers' loans. Of course, the loss of margins started the lack of buying power. Therefore don't you see, as a legislator, that it is very dangerous for Congress to recognize margin accounts. You are legalizing the biggest gambling game in the world, of which the public knows nothing, wherein 98 percent of them always lose.

Why should Congress get into hot water by recognizing marginal accounts and try to standardize them? You are simply standardizing the borrowing capacity of millions of gamblers who are not entitled to credit, who are able to put up their life savings as margin; thus they are gambling on a shoe string.

The economic conditions call for a discontinuance of margin accounts. Prevent the brokers from accepting marginal accounts, wherein they have to borrow money on brokers' loans with their customers' stocks as collateral. Prevent the banks from making these dangerous brokers' loans that have no element of self-liquidation. When a panic starts the banks and brokers liquidate brokers' loans by selling the collateral that accentuates and continues the panic until it spreads to all lines where all values are liquidated, because economic pressure is exerted in every direction. This is too dangerous a subject to temporize with. It has always caused the period of distress to millions of people, that starts a chain of disastrous events.

If Congress would adopt the process that I have suggested, it would force everyone desiring to gamble in stocks to go to their local banks for their speculative accommodations. The banks would not lend money to their local customers unless they disclosed their financial statement, which would show that 80 percent of those desiring speculative accommodations were not entitled to them. It would establish an educational campaign against speculation where there is no possibility to win, because of brokers' loans, whereas the brokers always encourage the worst type and never look into the financial status of anyone.

Don't you see that the brokers should not be considered in this law, because the havoc they wrought in commerce, in banking, was terrific. The public and the United States should be given first consideration.

The proposed law is good in everything except the recognization of marginal accounts, and if you recognize marginal accounts, you have not corrected the weakness in our speculative system and the same conditions we had in 1927 to 1929 will be reenacted. It does not matter whether the Federal Reserve Board or the Federal Trade Commission is given authority to regulate margins; public pressure will be brought to bear against them when they endeavor to raise margin requirements, but no matter what percentage of margin they establish, it will be too late to stop the public when they become overconfident and when the easy facilities of gambling in stocks are ever presented to them from every angle.

It is just foolish to regulate margins. You must regulate the public, and this regulation can only be done by forcing them to go to their local banks for speculative accommodations, where they can be advised and cautioned against this hazardous game, where they can be refused speculative accommodations when they are not entitled to them. Think of the ribbon clerks, the janitors, the workingmen, small-business men, and millions of employees who got into the market in 1929, because they had enough margin to buy two or three times the amount of stock they should have purchased through the ease with which they borrowed the remainder of the purchase price, whereas if they had had to go to their local bank, they would have been refused and thus they could not have speculated.

The marginal system is all wrong wherein the individual who is not entitled to this class of credit borrows the remainder from the broker. Then he goes to the bank and borrows money without disclosing the fact that he has borrowed on stocks, but still considers his margin as cash or stocks, and so states it at the bank. Furthermore, he goes to his merchandiser and gets credit for goods purchased. The merchandiser thinks he is O.K. In all cases his margin eventually will be lost, because 98 percent of those who buy stocks on margin lose their money. As a matter of fact, the granting of credit on securities should be concentrated in banks. Then the banks would actually know the financial condition of each individual. Take the case of the big men in New York City. Their company borrows money, they personally borrow money at the bank, in addition to which they borrow money on margin at the brokers, but they do not disclose this last fact. As a matter of fact, the individual very rarely knows he borrowed money from the broker, because he thinks his margin is his only commitment. He does not have to sign notes with the brokers for his borrowed money and hence is not impressed with this fact, and eight and one half billion dollars was borrowed this way in 1929.

Won't you go to the front when this law is being considered? If you compromise, the old speculative system is still as bad as ever.

Very sincerely yours,

J. R. EDWARDS.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I have a letter from the pastor of the Prospect Congregational Church, of Cambridge, Mass., in which he says:

A resolution was introduced and unanimously adopted in which this body of people expressed their disapproval of the gambling practices of the stock markets and calling upon Congress to regulate strictly the practices of the stock market and condemning unequivocally all such practices as may be called gambling operations.

I will ask that the entire letter may be published in the RECORD at this point.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The letter referred to is as follows:

THE PROSPECT CONGREGATIONAL CHURCH,
Cambridge, Mass., April 17, 1934.

Hon. DUNCAN FLETCHER,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR FLETCHER: I am not sure whether I have your first name right or not. Please excuse the error if I am mistaken. My reason for writing you is to assure you and the committee of which you are chairman that there is a strong undercurrent of popular opinion in favor of your efforts to control the gambling practices of the stock market. In every newspaper published from day to day there is spread forth many objections to calling a halt to the practices which have ruined thousands of people. These objections are offered by various bodies who are prompted apparently by the gentlemen who are addicted to speculation. Back of all the blatant objectors are a host of plain people who want Congress to proceed without fear or favor in protecting the savings of the American people.

Here is a bit of evidence of what I mean. The Suffolk North Association of Congregational Churches and Ministers met here in Cambridge last Wednesday. I had the privilege of serving as moderator. The meeting was attended by about 500 people representing 25 churches in greater Boston, and having a total membership of nearly 10,000. This is just one little section, a district, of the Congregational Churches of Massachusetts which date their origin here to the Pilgrim Fathers.

A resolution was introduced and unanimously adopted in which this body of people express their disapproval of the gambling practices of the stock market, and calling upon Congress to regulate strictly the practices of the stock market and condemning unequivocally all such practices as may be called gambling operations. An expression of this sort is expressive of the sober judgment of a body of high-minded citizens and should offset many of the messages which are reaching you begging you to let the gentlemen of the stock market settle their own methods of doing business.

With best of wishes for the success of your committee in its difficult and necessary task, I am,

Yours very truly,

W. M. MACNAIR.

Mr. FLETCHER. I have another letter of date April 14, 1934, with reference to the business failures which have resulted from this speculative tendency. I ask to have that letter printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE INTERNATIONAL LAWYERS,
New York, April 14, 1934.

(In re stock-exchange regulation.)

Hon. DUNCAN U. FLETCHER,
Senator from Florida, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SIR: The other day I believe that Judge Clark of the Federal bench called your attention to the number of criminals that the unlicensed stock exchanges had caused.

I wonder if it has ever occurred to any of your committee the number of business failures which can be attributed to the same causes?

From 1920 until 1932 I was a credit investigator and adjuster for one of the largest credit agencies in the United States. I covered the States of Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, and parts of Tennessee, West Virginia, and Kentucky. Invariably, in making a call on a local retail business man, I would find him out. But I always knew where to look for him. If there was a branch of one of the members of the New York Stock Exchange—and there usually was—you would find him there from the time the market opened until it closed. While the manager of the chain store in the same town was on the job at his store from early in the morning until closing time.

Today, travel the same territory, as I had occasion to do the other day, and what do you find? Solid blocks of chain stores, few, if any, independent local stores, and these, as well as other local enterprises, dependent upon local conditions for their subsistence dying of dry rot, their proprietors still at their old game—watching the stock market.

Yours respectfully,

H. S. THOMAS.

I know of no stronger argument against marginal trading on stocks; do you?

Mr. FLETCHER. I have another letter from George R. Sims, a stockholder in 20 leading corporations which are listed on the New York Stock Exchange. He says:

I have been urged to write to you protesting against the proposed securities-exchange act. Instead I wish to notify you that I am heartily in favor of the measure, as it will, in my opinion, safeguard the investments of more than 20,000,000 shareholders in American corporations.

I ask that the entire letter may be incorporated in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PORT RICHEY CO.,
New Port Richey, Fla., April 4, 1934.

Hon. DUNCAN U. FLETCHER,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR: As a stockholder in 20 leading corporations which are listed on the New York Stock Exchange I have been urged to write to you protesting against the proposed securities-exchange act.

Instead I wish to notify you that I am heartily in favor of the measure, as it will, in my opinion, safeguard the investments of more than 20,000,000 shareholders in American corporations.

The only man this legislation can hurt is the manipulator, the promoter, the speculator, and the corporation executive who is more interested in the stock ticker than in the welfare of his shareholders.

It was at one time my ambition to be a shareholder in about 30 leading corporations representing a cross section of American commercial and industrial activities. Reluctantly I am coming to the conclusion that these great corporations are in many cases run primarily by the inside few to feather their own nest by trading in and manipulating their own securities.

The small shareholders, who furnish the capital, although they constitute a large majority, have no one to represent them; consequently they must be satisfied with the few crumbs which are occasionally thrown their way after the officers and insiders have liberally helped themselves to exorbitant salaries, bonuses, commissions, and profits on stock-market operations.

I hope you will not let the bill be emasculated. It means a new day for millions of American investors, and when it becomes law I wish that our great President would give this ultimatum to the corporations: "Pay at least 75 percent of your earnings every year to your stockholders in cash or pay it to the Government."

That would increase purchasing power by releasing money which is now kept locked up where it is not needed and where its retention is desired primarily for the purpose of power, influence, and control.

Regardless of propaganda the investing public is with you and will always owe you a debt of gratitude for your leadership in this campaign.

With kindest regards, I remain,

Sincerely yours,

GEORGE R. SIMS.

Mr. FLETCHER. I have a letter from Pittsburgh, Pa., signed by J. E. Lammert, which I ask to have inserted in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PITTSBURGH, PA., April 2, 1934.

Hon. DUNCAN U. FLETCHER,
United States Senate, Washington, D.C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I am taking the liberty of enclosing you herewith envelop and contents as received from the ——— Statistical Corporation, Newark, N.J., entirely unsolicited.

I assume that having been a "sucker" in the "new era" days of 1929, I and millions more like myself are still on the "sucker list." How "Mr. ——— made $1,000,000 in stocks, starting with only a few hundred dollars" is the same old bait, and it seems to me that if all the suffering of the last 5 years is not to have been for naught, during which period millions of our citizens, and the type who could least afford to suffer financial loss, have been robbed of their hard-earned savings by get-rich-quick financial schemes of the type being revived by Mr. ———, if the past has taught us anything, surely we must take steps to protect the gullible in the future, and it seems to me further that your stock-market regulation bill is none too severe and perhaps not drastic enough to forever stop this form of daylight and legal robbery. Can't you gentlemen down in Washington do something to put men of Mr. ———'s stripe behind the bars and keep them there?

I congratulate you, sir, on the courage you have manifested thus far in standing firm against the onslaught of Wall Street and its sewer of propaganda, lies and more lies, threats and yet more threats, and I am sure that your efforts to protect the weak and innocent against these financial parasites, who are truly nothing more than common crooks, is much appreciated by millions of our honest citizens, most of whom, unfortunately, have been so downtrodden that they don't have enough "guts" left to write and encourage you and Mr. RAYBURN, or who feel, "Oh, what's the use; we're sunk anyhow, and you can't beat that money gang."

Remain steadfast and strong in courage, and in the end you shall receive the crown of life—the love of your fellow common folks and the thanks of millions unborn.

Here's hoping you don't weaken and that our beloved President will use the big stick to get your bill enacted into law.

Sincerely and respectfully,

J. E. LAMMERT.

Mr. FLETCHER. Attached to some of these letters are circulars which have been sent out and distributed by stock exchanges, with their branches and their correspondents, and by brokers' offices, with their branches and their correspondents, as a result of which employees and others have been induced to invest in some of these stocks. They have sent throughout the country such circulars, requesting the recipients to protest against the passage of the bill. One day I received 50 letters from one city in New York, all written in identically the same language. At another time I received about 100 letters, all alike, from one community, showing that there is no question about the propaganda and its extent.

I have here a letter from Stokes, Hoyt & Co., sent to me by a man who received the circular. It will be noted that he says in a footnote following the printed portion of the letter:

I hope this bill will be passed. Had such a law been in force, I would not have been stuck on stock of this company which they have already forced me to exchange for new stock of 50-percent value of the original.

I ask that the circular letter be printed in the RECORD in full.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NEW YORK.

In our capacity as members of the New York Stock Exchange we have at one time or another served you to the best of our ability. From this fact we deduce that you have had a certain confidence in our judgment and integrity and we value this confidence.

The proposed national securities exchange bill, which is now under consideration in Washington, will, in our judgment, directly or indirectly affect adversely practically every business and business man in this country; it will destroy the liquidity of securities markets; it will vastly curtail the incomes of the thousands who have made their living through perfectly legitimate dealing in securities, and it will cause wide-spread unemployment in the ranks of the many more thousands who have been employed by them. These are the immediate direct effects of the passage of the bill. Its indirect effects will be deflationary throughout the entire country through the progressive loss of purchasing power which will be suffered by all those above named.

The New York Stock Exchange is an institution whose fundamental intent has been the protection of the public interest in the maintenance of a balanced and orderly securities market. Its record for honesty and efficiency over the past many years has been noteworthy. Abuses creep into every business, and those attendant on the securities business have been publicly magnified so that the original and more important purpose of the exchange to enforce just and equitable principles of trade has been practically obscured.

Governmental supervision of exchanges would not be opposed by any constructively minded business man. The conclusions reached by the Roper-Dickinson committee, after prolonged study of the situation, were to this end, but they have been disregarded by more hurried and less intelligent commentators.

It is not our wish to attempt to influence the opinions of our clients, but knowing the lethargy which nearly everybody feels toward writing to their congressional representatives, we take this liberty of urging that, if you agree with our contentions above expressed, you will write or telegraph to your Congressman and Senator in Washington demanding their opposition to the present securities bill and urging that its eventual form shall be supervisory rather than regulatory.

STOKES, HOYT & Co.

Received this date.

In connection with the revised legislation for regulation of stock exchanges which is now pending before Congress, companies of the Associated Gas & Electric System having securities listed on the New York Stock Exchange have received the following communication from Mr. Richard Whitney, president of the exchange:

"The revised bill for the regulation of stock exchanges introduced yesterday in the House of Representatives still contains the most objectionable features of the original Fletcher-Rayburn bill. Rigid margin requirements, capable at times of being either prohibitive or overliberal and similar to those originally proposed, are still retained although some small measure of control is given to the Federal Reserve Board instead of the Federal Trade Commission.

"The Federal Trade Commission is still given power to control listed corporations and is also given complete power to operate and control stock exchanges. In spite of the reassuring statement that has been issued in regard to this new bill, an analysis of its provisions shows clearly its authors, who are the same persons who drafted the original bill, have not receded from their position that in the guise of stock-exchange legislation the Federal Trade Commission should be given power to dominate business and industry.

"The practical consequences of this bill to the security markets of the country will be just as severe as the original bill, and in my opinion will necessarily cause serious declines in security prices which will inevitably retard the economic recovery of the Nation."

In a previous communication we expressed our opinion that this bill will be injurious to the company and to your interest in it. We wish to thank those who acted on our suggestion to write to the President, their United States Senators, and their Congressmen opposing his bill, which provides for the domination of affairs of private corporations by the Federal Trade Commission. Mere modification of objectionable features, however, is not enough.

We suggest that you again write, urging the elimination of the damaging features of this bill.

APRIL 7, 1934.

I hope this bill will be passed. Had such a law been in force, I would not have been stuck on stock of this company, which they have already forced me to exchange for new stock of 50-percent face value of the original.

H. A. LITTLEJOHN,
Lake Wales.

Mr. FLETCHER. From Pittsburgh, Pa., came another letter from a lady, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD in full.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PITTSBURGH, PA., April 12, 1934.

Hon. DUNCAN U. FLETCHER,
Chairman Senate Committee on Banking and Currency, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SIR: I have been asked by my broker to write you expressing my disapproval of the National Securities Exchange Act of 1934, known as the "Fletcher-Rayburn bill."

On the contrary, I am very much in favor of just such a bill, and I am sincerely hoping that the bill will go through.

It has the approval of my family, and you are to be congratulated when said bill has been passed and becomes a law. I have some stock and got badly "stung" in 1929; worse in 1930.

I am wishing you every success in having this passed with the least possible bother.

Respectfully yours,

MARGARET SANDLER.

Mr. FLETCHER. From William B. Heller, of New York City, I received an interesting letter, which I ask may be inserted in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

APRIL 12, 1934.

Hon. DUNCAN U. FLETCHER,
United States Senate, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR FLETCHER: I want to express to you the unvoiced thanks of thousands of Americans for the work you are doing in connection with the stock exchange control bill.

Do not be deterred by noisy demonstrations or remonstrances. You are working to protect the inarticulate millions who by saving and self-denial and by deprivation have tried to save a competence for their old age and for the education and protection of their children.

America is not all labor and capital, not all forgotten men and bloated bondholders. I appeal to you for the great army of small security holders, not speculators, who by hard work, thrift, and self-denial have furnished the sinews to make America great.

Therefore, infinitely more important even than the control of the exchanges is the control of the corporation managements.

We, who are unable to protect ourselves from self-perpetuating managements, beg you to protect us by law from those officers and directors who habitually run the large corporations for their own benefit and enrichment, not for the benefit of their stockholders.

1. Prevent public corporations engaged in interstate commerce from telling their stockholders only once a year something of their earnings and progress. This enables the officers and directors to accumulate and unload stock to the detriment of their stockholders.

Compel every such corporation to issue a statement every 3 months giving sales, earnings, and all other necessary financial information, with comparative figures for the last 3 years. The stockholders are entitled to this information for their own protection.

The specious arguments of unnecessary expense, divulging of trade secrets, etc., now being put forward by managements unwilling to give up their present unfair advantage over their own stockholders, are false and should be disregarded.

2. Make it a felony for officers or directors of such corporations to circulate or cause to be circulated false rumors or statements as to the sales, earnings, losses, or activities of the corporation. It is common knowledge that many of the annual statements of the large corporations are "doctored." And that false rumors are circulated to enable officers, directors, or their friends to accumulate or unload stock of the corporation at advantageous prices.

3. Prevent any such corporation from owning, buying, or selling its own stock, except in the form of regular stock issues to acquire additional capital or to purchase companies in its own line of business. Neither should any such corporation be allowed to own a subsidiary whose primary object is to deal in the stock of the parent corporation.

Untold fortunes have been lost to stockholders through corporations' speculating in their own stocks. A corporation engaged in the oil, steel, chemical, or dairy business should concentrate its activities on that business. It has no right to gamble in its own stock with the stockholders' money.

Furthermore this leaves too much of a loophole for the officers and directors to sell back to the corporation stock with which they are stuck. Any repurchased stock now held by such corporation should be canceled.

4. It should be illegal for any such corporation to give a bonus in stock to any officer or director. If any bonuses are necessary they should be paid in cash and duly shown on corporation reports.

5. It should be illegal for any such corporation to grant to any officer or director an option to buy below the prevailing market or sell above the prevailing market stock of the corporation. This insidious "racket" is prevalent in many of the largest corporations. Millions of the stockholders' savings have been taken from them in this manner, without their knowledge or consent.

6. The proxy is the insidious weapon used by large corporate managements to perpetuate themselves. The great majority of stockholders return proxies sent them without any realization or knowledge of the blanket powers they are thus conferring on the directors.

The proxy is actually a blank endorsement of any act, known or unknown to the stockholder, performed or to be performed by the directors or officers.

I strongly urge that it be made compulsory that there be printed in red ink on every proxy sent out by a public corporation engaged in interstate commerce, a clause informing the stockholder that by signing this proxy he is giving his consent to the present officers and directors to perpetuate themselves and that he is giving his approval of all acts, known or unknown to the stockholder, which have been or are to be performed by the officers or directors.

If the directors and officers have conducted themselves in an upright and efficient manner, no stockholder will object to signing such a proxy. He will, in fact, gladly thus express a vote of thanks and of confidence in the management of his company.

Therefore there can be no legitimate objection to including this clause in every proxy.

I cannot urge too strongly that you devote your fullest efforts to the proper control and regulation of the corporations themselves. The regulation and control of the exchanges is undoubtedly necessary, but margins, etc., mean little, only speculators are concerned.

Infinitely more important and more vital is the regulation of the corporations. They represent the savings of millions of Americans.

Our confidence in the integrity of the managements of these corporations has been terribly weakened. If the investors (not the speculators) of America lose faith in the honest management of their corporations and sell their securities, where will the corporations obtain capital? And what will become of the industrial structure of this country?

Permit me once more, my dear Senator, to urge you once more to devote all your energies and talents to this subject.

There is abundant evidence of the abuses which I have outlined. Annually they cost the millions of American investors many times the sums lost through the present operations of the exchanges. This concerns the investors, who outnumber the gamblers a hundredfold.

With my sincere admiration for the wonderful work you are doing and the great ability you have shown, believe me to be,

Very sincerely yours,

WILLIAM B. HELLER.

Mr. FLETCHER. I have a communication from the Twentieth Century Fund, Inc., which I should like to have printed in the RECORD. They have done a splendid work. The Twentieth Century Fund published a book on the subject. Their research work and what they have accomplished through that fund have been of very considerable help and benefit to the committee. The book they issued is entitled "Stock Market Control" by the Twentieth Century Fund, Inc. It is a very interesting book. I ask that their letter may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TWENTIETH CENTURY FUND, INC.,
New York, March 24, 1934.

The Honorable DUNCAN U. FLETCHER,
The Senate, Washington, D.C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: On March 6 I had the honor of appearing before the Senate Committee on Banking and Currency in reference to S. 2693, known as "The National Securities Exchange Act of 1934."

In my capacity as director of the security-markets survey staff of the Twentieth Century Fund, Inc., I took that occasion to point out what I deemed to be specific defects in the bill, with the general objective and purpose of which, however, I found myself in thorough sympathy.

I have examined the revised draft of the National Securities Exchange Act, under the designation H.R. 8720, and I am of the opinion that the revisions that have been made broadly meet my previous criticisms, and bring the bill into substantial accord with the program of recommendations prepared by the staff of the Twentieth Century Fund on the basis of a 5 months' study of the organization and operation of security exchanges in the United States.

On behalf of the staff, therefore, I am taking the liberty of urging the speedy enactment into law of H.R. 8720 without serious amendment.

Respectfully,

ALFRED L. BERNHEIM.

Mr. FLETCHER. I offer also for the RECORD a letter from Wurtsboro, N.Y., written by Edwin R. O'Reilly. I ask that it may be inserted in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WURTSBORO, N.Y., April 5, 1934.

Senator FLETCHER,
Washington, D.C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: It has been a great pleasure to follow your noble fight to eliminate the forces that make Wall Street "one end a graveyard, the other a river." How can the board of governors and Mr. Whitney be sincere in their reforms when today they find it impossible to check the greatest evil of the Street? Many years ago I ran a customers' ledger in New York Stock Exchange houses. Ninety-seven percent of all odd-lot and low-price stock traders are losers. Ask any honest margin clerk's opinion. They are the customers man's sucker list.

The comments of the financial writers; the action of the market; the tips around the street, through the country—the old tout system operates today. The C.M. plug the phones just as strong as any bucket shop ever did. The nets are set stronger than ever for the low-price stock gambler. The law of averages says they must take a loss—97 percent of them. April 4, 161,800 shares traded in selling under $8. The low-priced field plugged and touted—the cold-deck dealers' stock in trade. The press proclaim it.

May God bless you in your endeavor to protect those foolish people who cannot afford to lose but under the present system have little chance to win. Mr. Whitney and the board of governors are well aware of these cheap tips being touted. Why not look into the profit on the interest of the debit balances, short interest withheld—it is seldom given unless demanded. The odd-lot houses strongly represented on the board of governors. How about them? Ask Allyn Ryan and Mr. Saunders what they (O.L.H.'s) did when caught short. May you be able to lead the small fish away from tout and ticker. They will then get down to business and work instead of heading from that crooked, narrow street to the river or under the sod, a lost faith.

Yours truly,

EDWIN R. O'REILLY.

Mr. FLETCHER. I have also a letter from Bryan Kemp & Co., of Richmond, Va., which I ask to have inserted in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

BRYAN, KEMP & CO.,
Richmond, Va., April 7, 1934.

Hon. DUNCAN U. FLETCHER,
United States Senate, Washington, D.C.

SIR: Being a member of the New York Stock Exchange and the Chicago Board of Trade, I have followed with much interest your efforts to give the country a law that will protect investors against certain corporate evils.

I have not been engaged in active business since July 1933, but I am a stockholder and bondholder in probably 20 different companies, all of which companies have their securities listed on the New York Stock Exchange. I am a director of one large corporation, and I was chairman of the committee of stockholders of the Chesapeake & Ohio Railway Co., which opposed the Van Sweringen interests before the Interstate Commerce Commission for a period of more than 2 years; and, largely as a result of our efforts, their railroad-consolidation scheme was not approved by said Commission.

In my opinion, the greatest evil from which stockholders suffer is the lack of information from corporate interests generally, and especially on the part of directors and officials. In some cases with which I am thoroughly familiar, directors have absolutely refused to give to stockholders essential information to which they were entitled. I cannot see any good reason why directors and officials of corporations should be given monthly statements of earnings and this same information withheld from stockholders until several months after the close of the fiscal year. When a stockholder has the temerity to ask what salaries are being paid to officials, I have known of instances where this information has been refused. There are few annual reports of industrial corporations showing the salaries paid officials. Directors have the machinery of the company to reelect themselves; and if stockholders could be given these facts, in some cases I am sure many of them would not be reelected.

I, therefore, sincerely hope that in whatever form the bill is eventually written, you will endeavor to see that all corporations whose securities are traded in on the various exchanges are required to publish monthly statements of their earnings and expenses. In many large corporations this information is given to directors weekly.

In my opinion, it is nonsense to say that if this information is published monthly it would cause an injury by reason of competitors having knowledge of same. With such information in the hands of stockholders and the public generally, directors and officials would not have the unfair advantage which they now enjoy.

Very respectfully,

GEO. S. KEMP.

Mr. FLETCHER. I have a letter from the Springfield Daily News, of Springfield, Mass., enclosing an editorial relating to the bill. I ask that the letter and editorial be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter and editorial were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SPRINGFIELD DAILY NEWS,
Springfield, Mass., March 23, 1934.

Hon. DUNCAN U. FLETCHER,
United States Senate, Washington, D.C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: Enclosed is Scalpel on Wall Street's latest opposition to your stock-market control bill.

I hope Congress will now stand firm, undaunted by the yapping of the Wall Street wolves, and speedily enact the bill as revised into law.

Sincerely yours, ARTHUR HOYT BOGUE.

[From the Springfield (Mass.) Daily News, Mar. 23, 1934]

THE SCALPEL

It was to be expected that the president of the New York Stock Exchange would object to the revised stock-market regulation bill, for Wall Street bankers and stock brokers would be against any legislation that in any way even curbed the banking, speculative, and investment rackets that Wall Street has been permitted to practice for more than a century.

This legislation is designed to protect both the speculating and investing public against the exploitation that has not only brought ruin to these two groups, but has brought disaster to all business and seriously injured every man, woman, and child in the Nation. It is just because of this that Wall Street is vigorously fighting, for Wall Street stripped of its license to exploit, must go out of business. Nothing short of the gigantic profits that resulted from playing its rackets will satisfy the bankers and stock brokers of Wall Street. These would far rather quit business than be compelled to exist on the reasonable profits that result from an honestly conducted banking, investment, and brokerage business and so the Street is fighting against the revocation of its long-permitted exploitation license.

Wall Street's inherent attitude was brilliantly brought out by the president of the stock exchange when he declared that this legislation was designed to carry out "social theories." Social and economic justice for the people is utterly beyond the mental capacity of Wall Street, which is and always has been the center of the kingdom of unrestrained greed and ruled by financial kings, obsessed and consumed by greed to the point of stark insanity, and this is vividly spread on every page of Wall Street history.

The revised Fletcher-Rayburn bill is actually little modified as to regulation of the stock markets. The chief change is that much of the regulation is now discretionary instead of mandatory, and the power is contained to impose even the most drastic control when occasion demands. The control over credit is placed with the Federal Reserve Board, while general supervision remains with the Federal Trade Commission.

As this legislation now stands, there will be no more stock-market regulation than any administration at Washington wishes to exert. If this proposed legislation had been the law during the stock-gambling orgy of 1928 and 1929, there would probably have been no more control of that madness exerted than there was under both Coolidge and Hoover.

From this it follows that it all depends on who is President, and this places the responsibility on the people to keep control of their Government at any cost, for their interests will only be protected and safeguarded to the extent that they elect Presidents like Roosevelt, who will protect them against the industrial, banking and financial wolves that have so long fed and fattened on the people.

With the credit regulations placed in the hands of the Federal Reserve Board, which may act or fail to act as this Board did all through the stock-gambling orgy of 1928 and 1929, it becomes even more paramount that the Government own and operate the Nation's banking business.

The stock exchanges cannot operate an hour without banking credit. Banking credit is the heart of the stock exchange; and unless the flow of the credit blood is under absolute Government control, the private bankers will find a way to circumvent any law, as they have so successfully done for themselves and so disastrously accomplished for all the people throughout all our history.

The only sure control of banking credit is through Government ownership and operation of all banking, and this the people should insistently and constantly demand until it is accomplished, for this is vital to the people's welfare, and for posterity it means slavery or freedom.

Mr. FLETCHER. I have a letter from Miss Erna M. Brenneman, of Los Angeles, Calif., a public-school teacher, which I ask to have printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

LOS ANGELES, CALIF., March 19.

DEAR MR. FLETCHER: As a representative of a large group of hard-working men and women who have lost part or all of their savings through stocks bought from "high pressure" stock salesmen, I implore you to do your utmost in seeing that the Fletcher-Rayburn bill be passed.

Yours truly,

ERNA M. BRENNEMAN,
Public-School Teacher.

Mr. FLETCHER. I have a letter from the commissioner of finance of Fresno, Calif., which I ask to be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CITY OF FRESNO,
Fresno, Calif, March 19, 1934.

Hon. DUNCAN U. FLETCHER,
United States Senate, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR: Incomplete and unsatisfactory statements come over the wire in regard to your bill, proposing to regulate the stock exchanges.

I am very much interested in the subject. I had 8 years' practical experience on Wall Street, New York, and understand the stock business, as it was transacted years ago, thoroughly. I presume it has not changed in essentials. I regard it as being the most direct of any of the causes that bring about financial disasters and commercial and industrial break-downs.

Now, I notice by the dispatches, that the friends of the exchange are endeavoring to break you down on the threat of interference with land speculation. Now land speculation, dangerous as it often turns out to be, is an entirely radically and fundamentally different matter from this stock speculation. A man may buy land on the installment plan by putting up a first payment, but in that case he gets possession of the land, and so it is with all goods and merchandise sold on the installment plan. Possession goes with the first payment. Now, when a man buys stock on the New York Stock Exchange and puts up a marginal payment, he does not get possession of the stock certificate. The broker who holds his money which was paid on the margin also holds possession of the stock certificate. The so-called (he is only the so-called) "buyer" of the stock certificate does not get possession of it and does not expect to ever own it. He is making a bet on next week's or next month's price of the stock and the broker holds the stakes in the bet. He holds the certificate to protect him against a rise in the price, in which case he must pay some money to the bull operator, and he holds the said operator's money to protect him against a drop in the future price of the stock.

It is a matter of gambling and nothing else. In October 1929, 7,200,000 accounts of speculators were closed out, thus depriving those 7,200,000 people of a buying power which they previously had. The demand for diamonds, fur coats, automobiles, and other things which successful people, whether gamblers or others, are wont to purchase fell off, and hundreds of thousands of working people lost their jobs in consequence.

The gambling on the stock exchange in New York is a worse evil than wars, floods, or famine. May you be encouraged to keep up your righteous warfare upon it.

May I ask you to send me a copy of your bill?

Yours very truly,

WILLIAM GLASS,
Commissioner of Finance.

Mr. FLETCHER. I have a letter from Detroit, a letter from New York City, and a third letter from St. Louis, Mo., all of which I ask to be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the letters were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Senator FLETCHER,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR: I am strongly in favor of stock-market regulation and of rigid control by the Government when necessary. There is a decided disposition of the exchange governors to wink at violations of fair dealings, because they themselves were brought up as boys in that same school of racketeering.

I, myself, was legally swindled out of $5,000 by sale to me of stock in the Hutton Engineering of Detroit (listed only on Detroit board) by wash sales—a process I had vaguely heard of but did not know that form of thievery was permitted in this land.

This outright form of swindle is and has been foisted on millions of people by financial racketeers. By granting an option on a quantity of stock any executive can have his company's stock "washed up" to as high a figure as the public will take it. This is done with market letters, newspapers, fictitious sales, dummies, etc.

I am strongly in favor of laws with no loopholes and a prison term to throw a fear in hearts of this useless class of men. I favor to include the financial editors who knowingly give extra space, for a consideration, in their columns during the time a particular stock is being "run." Difficult to prove. Last summer a vacuum cleaner was "run" in just such a manner. Larceny by trick. This stock rose from 9 to 18; and when the 2 months' option expired, the stock fell back to 7.

Yours truly,

EDW. FRUMVELLER.

NEW YORK, March 16, 1934.

Hon. DUNCAN U. FLETCHER,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR FLETCHER: I have just read your article on Financial Racketeers published in the current Liberty. The splendid battle which you and your committee are waging almost single-handed merits the profound gratitude of all right-thinking people. In view of the enormous organized power against which you are contending and the far-reaching importance of the issues, your success in effecting the passage of your bill will mark an era in the history of progress and reform.

Very sincerely yours,

ARTHUR M. WICKWIRE.

ST. LOUIS, MO., March 13, 1934.

Hon. DUNCAN U. FLETCHER,
Senate Chamber, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR FLETCHER: I have read and reread your article published in the Liberty Magazine of March 17, as have many others of my acquaintance, and we all desire to thank you for bringing these matters into the light of day by your article and for the splendid work which you are doing for the American people in stopping and prohibiting the abuses of the bankers and brokers all over the country, and particularly those in Wall Street, for they were the ones who fed out to the others the false information and the rotten securities.

It is my humble and honest opinion that the industrial and financial condition of our country today had its source in Wall Street, and those of us who are trying to be fair and honest are looking to you to force the "wolves" of Wall Street to honest dealings and integrity, and you can be absolutely assured that in your efforts and actions you have the whole-hearted support and carry the hopes of the decent people in every community. May you be given the health and strength to carry out your purpose.

Sincerely yours,

EDWIN W. LEE.

Mr. FLETCHER. I have here a newspaper clipping to the effect that $1,000,000 of securities issued in 1929 have become wall paper for the Union League Club in 1934. In other words, the Union League Club of Chicago has papered a room with stock certificates which the members held amounting in face value to a million dollars. That is an evidence of what has been put upon the public in this country through these various enterprises.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator ask to have printed in the RECORD the clipping to which he refers?

Mr. FLETCHER. Yes; I ask to have it printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, that order will be made.

The clipping referred to is as follows:

ONE MILLION DOLLAR SECURITIES OF 1929 TO BECOME WALL PAPER FOR UNION LEAGUE CLUB IN 1934

CHICAGO, ILL., March 9.—The Union League Club, whose membership includes many financiers, has found a way to use about $1,000,000 worth (face value) of stocks and bonds that today are just so much paper.

They are going to be used for wall paper!

On the assumption that each club member has at least a small quantity of the paper desired, a call has gone forth for them to bring it in to the house committee.

And these gold-engraved and green-bordered stocks will be used to cover the walls of a private dining room.

Fittingly enough, this dining room, located on the eighth floor of the 23-story club building, overlooks the center of the stock and bond business in La Salle Street.

The room has already been dubbed the "million-dollar room, or the folly of 1929."

The idea originated with Harry Doherty, manager of the club, and Dayton Keith, banker and chairman of the club house committee, when they were seeking unique ideas in spring decorating.

"And we found one", chuckled Doherty.

In his opinion, union leaguers might do well to bring their stock brokers to luncheon in this room when it is completed.

"One look at the walls would leave even the stoutest of brokers in a weakened condition", he said, "and you know there is nothing dearer to the heart of present-day business men than to see their brokers in a weakened condition."

Doherty said that the room would remind the diner of the American tendency toward overspeculiation.

"An overspeculation", he added, "that inevitably leaves us with funny little pieces of paper that are good for nothing but a bit of wall paper."

The newly elected president of the club, John McKinlay, head of Marshall Field & Co., is lending a helping hand.

Mr. FLETCHER. I ask to have certain other letters, which I shall not stop to enumerate, printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The letters are as follows:

BOSTON, MASS., March 2, 1934.

MY DEAR SENATOR FLETCHER: Your bill to regulate the stock exchange seems to me very mild. The stock market has been the cause of more suffering to the people of this country than any other factor. It has swept away the life savings of millions. It has driven thousands to suicide. Its path is strewn with the wreckage and devastation of the hopes, lives, and fortunes of our people.

In view of the monstrous record connected with the stock market, it would be perfectly justifiable to close the exchange forever.

I hope you will not relax in your efforts to give the people some sort of protection against the manipulations of schemers. As long as we allow the exchange to function, we must give it the strictest supervision. Any modification of your bill will nullify its good intentions.

Very sincerely yours,

H. FEIN.

BURNHAM & CO.,
Washington, D.C., February 28, 1934.

Hon. DUNCAN U. FLETCHER,
United States Senate Office Building,
Washington, D.C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I listened to a radio address by the college professors of the University of Chicago, and many of their views were so opposite to mine that I wrote them, a copy of which I have the honor of enclosing to you.

Just why college professors should know how this bill will work out is not clear in my mind.

I can only say, my dear Senator, that for more than 30 years I have been on the inside and on the outside of the stock exchange, both as a floor trader and as an outside speculator, on my own account, and I consider your bill a wonderful piece of constructive legislation.

With kind personal regards, I am,

Sincerely,

CHARLES HENRY BURNHAM, JR.,

SOUTH ORANGE, N.J., February 28, 1934.

Senator D. U. FLETCHER,
United States Senate, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR FLETCHER: I take the liberty of congratulating you and your committee, also Mr. Pecora and his staff, for the splendid job you are doing in behalf of the American people.

We earnestly urge that you put through your bill to regulate the stock exchange in its present form, rather than permit these financial racketeers and their associates to draw the teeth from this necessary law.

Your recent investigation of income and practice of these chieftains of high finance prove that without exception they all beat the law; and therefore if any loopholes are put in your bill, this crooked gang will take advantage as usual.

The present administration has the moral support of the majority of the decent American public, and this public opinion is supporting your committee and all the other good work the present Congress is accomplishing. If there is any doubt of this fact in your mind, simply request by mail over the radio an acknowledgment, and I promise you will be swamped.

Wishing you all good health and success in all of your endeavors, I remain,

Sincerely,

L. ROBINSON.

NEW YORK CITY, April 25, 1934.

Hon. DUNCAN U. FLETCHER,
United States Senate, Washington, D.C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I appreciate your letter of April 21 enclosing the so-called "stock-exchange control bill", prepared by your honorable committee and presented by you to the Senate.

I congratulate you and your associates in the preparation of this bill with such intelligent comprehension of this complex problem in all of its phases.

It seems to me that no honest man in American business life should fear the effect of this bill, if finally passed by Congress. On the contrary, I am of the opinion that, in spite of the criticisms which have been leveled against same, it will convince the American people that in buying and selling stocks under such a bill they will, at least, be dealing in legitimate securities at prices based on ethical methods by all concerned.

Personally I am of the opinion that, instead of injuring the business of the stock exchanges in future, the bill's demands will be the means of greatly increasing legitimate stock-exchange business. Crooked or unethical trading should be eliminated, and I believe that every decent business man in America agrees heartily with that idea.

Sincerely yours,

W. P. DEPPÉ.

THE POLYCLINIC,
Seattle, March 7, 1934.

Senator FLETCHER,
United States Senate Office Building,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR FLETCHER: As a casual student of our financial and economic structure I am interested in the pending legislation designed to regulate stock and grain exchanges. I herein present a point which, as far as I know, has not been used in the controversy. It contains a large element of truth and is particularly valuable as propaganda as it lends itself gracefully and eloquently to oratorical discussion and newspaper publicity.

The pirates of old who preyed on the commerce of the seas did not contribute one iota of essential service to the production and distribution of the commodities affected by their activities. For a time their business flourished, and the men engaged therein were accepted in society as gentlemen. Later they were given ill repute and their practice was suppressed. Our own Government aided in the effort.

Financial buccaneering has grown up in the United States coincident with the growth of the corporation idea in our economic structure and reached its zenith in 1928 and 1929. Nearly all corporations of tempting size have had one or more experiences in the hands of pirates or highjackers.

Had financial pirates been able to buy Ford for $1,000,000,000 through reorganization, they would have filched from the public in cash far more than the total purchase price and yet would have retained controlling interest so the investing public would have continued at their mercy. Upon their inability to buy they tried to highjack Ford out of his property. He saved himself and rendered the public a meritorious service for which to this day he has been criticized rather than praised.

Law should prevent Dillon, Read & Co. and every other fiscal service agency in the country doing what they did with Dodge. They should be limited by law to a nominal commission for fiscal services rendered, payable in stock or otherwise, and under no circumstances should the percentage of voting stock so acquired be a greater proportion of the whole than the total commission is of the total stock issue, including all classes thereof.

These buccaneering financial agencies contribute no more essential service in the production and distribution of commodities than did the pirates of old; yet it is largely by their methods that wealth has been concentrated in the hands of the few.

Buccaneers in charge of two or three large units, by artificial stimulation of production and unfair practices in selling a product in order to unload stock on the public to their own profit, frequently throw the whole industry out of balance.

The evils of their practice are as discernible as were those of pirates of old and are as vulnerable and as definitely remediable. It will be a new day for industry in this country, a new day for the investing and commodity-buying public, and a new day for labor when executives can go about their daily pursuits secure in the guarantee that they are safe from the menace of financial buccaneers. The sale price of stocks will be determined by normal economic laws and will more accurately reflect their dividend-earning power. Industry will be relieved of the supercargo of stock now imposed, and satisfactory dividends will the more easily be earned and maintained.

Executives can then better devote constructive thought to solution of problems incident to distribution and to those affecting the relations between industry and labor.

The present attacks by financial interests do not reflect the sentiment of the public and are not in the direction of the welfare of the country as a whole. The United States Chamber of Commerce and affiliates are considered by many to be dominated in this matter by financial interests.

Today's papers tell of militant opposition by bankers and brokers; it is analogous to the opposition by the pirates of old, whose business was hurt, causing individuals and companies of that day to go bankrupt; the ruin of the former will be as salutary as that of the latter. The one opposed with powder and ball; the other opposes with verbal barrage.

Yours truly,

H. J. DAVIDSON, M.D.

MARCH 10, 1934.

Senator DUNCAN U. FLETCHER,
United States Senate, Washington, D.C.

HONORABLE SIR: Enclosed herewith is a clipping from the San Francisco Daily News of March 8.

Believing that you will be interested in talk and developments on the Pacific coast as regards this bill, I am writing to tell you what the brokerage houses are doing and saying.

Meetings of stock exchange and brokerage houses are constantly being held, and those in attendance are told: The brokerage business of the country employs, directly and indirectly, over 5,000,000 men and women. Every one of these people must get their friends to write letters to the President, to their Congressmen, to their Senators condemning the Fletcher-Rayburn bill and demanding that it be defeated; they must threaten to refuse to vote for anyone voting in favor of the bill. The aim of the brokers and exchanges is to flood Washington with 20,000,000 or more letters and telegrams against the bill. Brokers in many instances are having clerks in their offices write the letters and then persuade their clients to sign them. Some of the most vitriolic terms and expressions in the letters were conceived in the brain of some $60-a-month board marker, put into a letter by some employee of the firm he works for, signed by some client who may not have even read the letter, and mailed to some official in Washington as representing the true thought and belief of the sender.

Brokers are freely forecasting that the Congress will not have the courage in the face of the apparent Nation-wide opposition to pass the bill.

Sincerely,

GEORGE G. CALKINS.

STOCK CONTROL BILL TO BE LIBERALIZED—CHANGES PLANNED ARE INDICATED BY SENATOR FLETCHER

WASHINGTON, March 8.—Liberalization of the Fletcher-Rayburn stock-market control bill before it is reported to the Senate was indicated today by Senator DUNCAN U. FLETCHER (Democrat, Florida). He listed the following changes as likely:

Liberalization of margin-requirement provisions to make them more flexible.

Revision of the section dealing with over-the-counter markets to make it more definite.

Exemption of railroad and municipal securities, already subject to regulation.

Grant of power to the Federal Trade Commission to exempt certain securities if advisable.

Modification of registration section.

SAN MATEO, CALIF., March 9, 1934.

Senator DUNCAN U. FLETCHER,
Chairman Committee on Currency and Banking,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SIR: I am informed by the newspapers, much to my regret, that a very wide-spread and determined opposition to the Fletcher-Rayburn bill is being brought to the public's attention by means of advertisements, circulars, speeches, etc., authorized, as one might expect, by those people whose business the bill is intended to correct.

Knowing full well the evils of stock gambling and what an insidious, cankering, and pernicious scourge the stock-exchange system has been to the people at large in this country, I am here giving expression to my enthusiastic approval of the bill and to a desire to exert my endeavors in support of it. I earnestly hope that it will be enacted into law without any of its salutary provisions—the one dealing with margin accounts in particular—amended to make it less effectual. If the bill is to be changed at all, make it more drastic. I should like to see margin accounts so nearly divorced from the element of temptation that their unpopularity would all but preclude them. The poverty, misery, and moral degradation which they have caused make such a curb eminently advisable.

By means of the Fletcher-Rayburn bill you have laid the ax to the root of the tree; a tree which has grown strong and wide-spreading to cast its baleful shadow on thousands of homes throughout our land. More power to you; drive the blade deep and cut it down! The issue involved merits consideration equal to that which was accorded slavery during the administration of Abraham Lincoln. The American people can well thank their lucky stars that they have a President who, like Lincoln, has the perspicacity, intelligence, and moral courage to meet it with appropriate action.

Very truly yours,

JOHN KRUTTSCHNITT.

MARCH 10, 1934.

Senator DUNCAN U. FLETCHER.

DEAR SIR: I am a widow with four children.

My husband died in 1929, so all my investments were made at the peak, and I find myself in great difficulty trying to live on my dividends.

I have a loan at the bank and practically all my listed securities are up as collateral.

The other day I was called in and told either to pay off a large part of the loan or put up more securities. When I asked why this was necessary, they said they had to anticipate a bad slump on the exchange because of the stock-market bill you are sponsoring. I wonder if you realize how many people there are like myself who have been hanging on desperately, hoping to avoid the final blow of being sold out, but who may be ruined by such a bill as you propose? I am sure what we need is encouragement to business and confidence in the future, and if too drastic a control affects the banks adversely it will retard recovery rather than protect stockholders.

I hope the appeal from one who is in desperate straits will have some influence upon your policy.

I am an enrolled Democrat and have done all in my power to back the administration in my small sphere.

I hope that the future course of the Government will not be so radical that you will lose the support of those loyal Democrats who have the best interests of our country at heart.

Very truly yours,

ANNA C. SMITH
(Mrs. Fred W. Smith).

PITTSBURGH, PA., May 2, 1934.

Senator FLETCHER,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SIR: Please consider this suggestion in regard to your bill to make better regulations for the stock exchange.

I had an order in to sell 100 shares of General Cable Preferred at the market on April 28. It was then selling at 31, and today the stock was sold at 25¾. If the only offer for the stock had been $1, I would have been sold out for that price. This is unfair, and there should be a regulation that stocks offered at the market should not be sacrificed to some ridiculously low bid. There should be no more than a dollar difference between sales or the stock should not be permitted to be sold.

This will prevent an insider from taking advantage of small dealers by grabbing market offerings with unreasonably low bids.

Even if I had inquired and learned the quotations were 25¾, by the time my order would be received in New York the order may be withdrawn and a $1 bid substituted and sold.

The suggestion of the difference between sales is, of course, subject to your opinion.

An answer to this letter will be appreciated.

Yours truly,

PHILIP MILLER.

ST. LOUIS, March 6, 1934.

Honored Senator FLETCHER:

May I at this late date, in the only possible way, stress the overshadowing importance of the one item which may well be termed the "crux" of all in the contemplated regulation of stock-exchange matters in the hope that it will prove of some service in your noble effort.

Very respectfully,

F. E. NIESEN.

To the Honorable Chairman and Members of Senate Banking Committee:

My 65 years of actual business career in the financial field has afforded me ample opportunity to observe and weigh the consequences of sweeping inheritance, life insurance, trust funds, savings of every kind and nature, even cherished family heirlooms, into the bottomless maelstrom of the New York Stock Exchange by so-called "margin tradings"; invariably followed by sorrow, want, default, and ruin, and finally the ready revolver, causing millions of our very best citizens to lose faith in mankind and confidence in themselves and their Government.

All the panics and depressions during that period originated in the New York Stock Exchange.

The debacle of 1929, causing the major number of our population to lose their earning power, precipitating in time the loss of the farmers purchasing power, is the prime reason for our present wide-spread depression and its prolongation.

In normal times Americans consume 95 percent of the entire surplus of farm products at remunerative prices. All is well with the farmers, as well as railroads, banking, industrial pursuit, and the wage earners then.

Pools with all their ramifications cannot get far from their base without a public following.

Unfortunately as long as such margin trading is permissible the general public either will not or cannot refrain; because it seems so easy.

Such trading, if it can be dignified by that name, is the curse of the Nation. More brain money and energy centers in the New York Stock Exchange than any other institution in the world, hence the well-organized opposition. And in order to befog the whole issue, strenuous attempts are being made to place such so-called "margin trading" on par with the purchasing of secured first-mortgage interest-bearing bonds, household goods, and other necessities, all of which at once becomes the property of such purchaser upon paying the first installment, subject only to meeting the deferred payments as and when due, in definitely fixed sums, instead of merely wagering against overwhelming odds on some equity shares subordinate to first, second, and third mortgages plus preferred stocks, in the hope and belief that they will be pushed to still higher levels with no intention of ever making any further payments, and no hope of ever even getting a glimpse at such share certificates, is the crux of all other stock-exchange evils.

No other country in the world could hope to survive it; nor need we take the shopworn "bogy" of the old Louisiana lottery too serious, as respecting constitutionality. Half-way action will not avail. The only way to cure the cancer is to cut it out.

If your committee will be instrumental in exterminating this swashbuckler, maldistribution of wealth will be reduced to a minimum and Mr. Whitney may well say, with good graces for himself and his followers, "We have fought each other hard. Thank God that we were beaten." And it will go down into history as the master stroke of American statesmanship.

Very respectfully,

F. E. NIESEN.

A veteran retired broker once said margin trading on the New York Stock Exchange is pitiful.

NEW YORK, N.Y., May 3, 1934.

Senator DUNCAN U. FLETCHER,

Chairman Senate Banking Committee:

If you will ask for the figures of short selling on the New York Stock Exchange during the past few days you will find out what is depressing prices. Those professional operators on the floor absolutely control the trend of the market, especially on the down side. They strike concertedly after the morning buying power is absorbed and that is causing unnecessary public liquidation. Get after them. They have already started an undermining of confidence in the administration.

Mr. FLETCHER. There is one letter here which I should like to have read from the desk. I think the Senate ought to hear it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the letter referred to by the Senator will be read.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

MCDOWELL NATIONAL BANK,
Sharon, Pa., May 2, 1934.

HON. DUNCAN U. FLETCHER,
United States Senate, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR FLETCHER: We have been following the Securities Act and the stock exchange control bill with considerable interest, and particularly have we noted the strong opposition which has been registered by those who are interested in keeping things as they were.

For the reason that we have not seen published any of the following facts, I am calling these matters to your attention:

In our opinion the Securities Act should be changed very little, if any, and the stock exchange control bill should be adopted with plenty of teeth.

We base this opinion on facts which are of record. We refer you to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, page 7063 et. seq., of the issue of April 20, 1934, being a brief in connection with the Northwest Bancorporation of Minneapolis, which demonstrates clearly the need for the control of stock selling.

The following figures are furnished by Standard Statistics Co., Inc.: In the year 1931, 1,075 different bond issues defaulted involving $2,047,432,950. In 1932, 1,069 issues defaulted involving $2,609,971,740; and in 1933, 862 issues defaulted involving $3,454,870,513, making a total of 3,006 issues of bonds which tied up over eight billions of money.

We do not have, in all cases, the record of when these bonds were issued; but many of them were issued during the period following 1920, and perhaps most of them after 1925.

We do not have any record of the amount of investment trust stocks, unlisted bonds, or other stocks which were marketed during this period; but we believe it is safe to assume that the total amount of money taken from the public through stock and bond issues involved somewhere near twenty-five to thirty billion dollars.

This destruction of purchasing power, including the tying up of principal as well as income, had a great deal to do with the necessity of the Government establishing media of relief.

While much has been said about foreign bonds, of the total of $8,000,000,000 listed above, only $1,100,000,000 consisted of defaulted foreign bonds. All of the rest were domestic railroad, industrial, public utility, and real-estate securities, many of which were issued either under statements which were false, misleading, or incomplete, to the extent that they concealed the real condition of the company, very much as in the case of the Northwest Bancorporation's sale of stock, as disclosed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

It was our experience to see a bond circular describing an issue of bonds, setting forth figures of earnings and conditions which were absolutely false in every particular. We had a company's statement before us showing readjustments required by the house that was to sell the bonds and showing adjustments in earnings and balance sheet made necessary by these adjustments, but the house that issued the bonds used figures before the adjustments.

In our opinion, the present Securities Act has not interfered in any way with the sale of securities. Banks generally have been liquidating and have not been buying securities; and if they had been in their market, their faith in the houses of issue has been so exhausted that they would not have bought them anyway. A restoration of confidence is necessary. Good legitimate banks are not interested in peddling securities or in stock-exchange gambling.

For our own information we have kept a partial list of defaulted bonds. We have traced the securities back to the house of issue and we have now included in that list bond issues which had no justification at any time, and the list of houses of issue includes practically every house of any consequence in the country, including banks, affiliates, and investment bankers; and we do not find any house which did not issue at least one of the class of securities which good judgment or good faith would have prevented them from handling.

We cannot, of course, judge as to the mechanics of the bills now before Congress, nor can we approve in detail the Securities Act, for the reason that we do not know the exact mechanics of their operation. However, we wish to record that we favor in principle a securities act which will compel the house of issue to tell the truth about the securities offered, and we favor a stock-exchange control bill which will not only regulate speculation but will compel corporations to publish statements which fully reveal the financial condition of the company.

We have no regard for the objection that complete statements reveal trade secrets. In our opinion, there are no trade secrets for the reason that business, as at present conducted, is operating under a spy system which makes known to each corporation all of the secrets of another.

We are writing you thus at some length, because it is our opinion that a great many people fail to express themselves, who are in favor of the bills which have been presented to Congress, while organized opposition is very vocal.

Propaganda against the bills is being carried forward at great expense and effort on the part of the opponents. Those who do not have a selfish interest do not have the means to carry on a campaign in favor of the bills, and it behooves some of us to speak up and support those who represent us.

In order that you may know that we have some knowledge of the sentiment among bankers and others, it may be of interest to you to know that the writer in 1930 served as president of the Pennsylvania Bankers Association and recently served as chairman of the bankers' N.R.A. committee for the State of Pennsylvania.

With best personal regards, I am

Very truly yours,

H. B. MCDOWELL, President.

P.S.—Attached hereto is a copy of a notice sent out by Chas. D. Barney & Co., below which we have listed some of the closing quotations for today, indicating the sort of club that is being used to force a change in the stock exchange control bill.

"The stock exchange bill is now on the floor of both the House and Senate. As an owner of securities you are vitally interested in how your Congressmen and Senators vote. A careful study of the bill in its present form indicates that if passed your interests may be seriously and adversely affected. Therefore we urge your immediate and vigorous protest by wire to both your Congressmen and Senators. It is important that you act now.

"CHAS. D. BARNEY & Co."

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I think it would be helpful to the Senate if I should have printed in the RECORD an explanatory statement of the suggested amendments to the Securities Act. I, therefore, ask to have that done.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The statement referred to is as follows:

Memorandum: Explanatory of suggested amendments to the Securities Act.

Amendment to section 2 (1): The purpose of this amendment is to make it clear that certificates of deposit, fractional oil royalties, and similar interests are included within the definition of a security and thus subject to the Securities Act. Some doubt exists whether they are so included under the present language of the act.

Amendment to section 2 (4): The purposes of this amendment are: (1) to eliminate a guarantor from the definition of an issuer, and (2) to define the issuer of fractional undivided interests in oil, gas, or other mineral rights. The words "or persons" have also been deleted from the definition of an issuer of certificates of deposit, etc. The singular will include the plural where necessary and the express use of the plural word has caused some doubts about the Commission's interpretation that a committee, trust, or other entity, and not the individual members, is the issuer intended by the definition. By putting the status of an issuer of the guaranteed security upon the guarantor raises serious practical difficulties in connection with the filing of registration statements. The act will adequately cover guarantors and the furnishing of information concerning them without this clause. The amendment respecting fractional undivided interests in oil, gas, or other mineral rights is necessary in connection with the amendment to section 2 (1).

Amendment to section 2 (10): The purposes of this amendment are: (1) to make clear beyond any doubt the interpretation of the Commission that literature accompanying a prospectus as well as literature sent subsequent to the sending of a prospectus shall not be required to conform to the prospectus requirements of section 10 of the act; and (2) to remove from a person required to furnish a prospectus the absolute duty to see that the prospectus is received by the person to whom it is sent. It seems sufficient to require proof of the actual sending of a prospectus without making the sender take all risks of nondelivery.

Amendment to section 3 (a) (2): The purposes of this amendment are: (1) to put the District of Columbia upon a parity with the States with reference to the exemption of bank stocks issued by banks organized under the laws of the District of Columbia; (2) to exempt municipal bondholders' protective committees; and (3) to extend the scope of the public instrumentality exemption to expanding activities in which governments are indulging. The exemption of municipal bondholders' protective committees is dictated purely by consideration of expediency. These committees have generally had a good record in the past. There is far from the urge present in these cases as contrasted with industrial and real-estate organizations for committee members to take responsibility for the sake of profit, so that as a practical matter there is hesitation on the part of committee members to assume even a slight responsibility. The extension of the public instrumentality exemption is dictated by conservative decisions of courts which have refused to regard as essential governmental functions such activities as the furnishing of light, transportation, power, and even water.

Amendment to section 3 (a) (4): The purpose of this amendment is to correct an obvious error in the original act which limited this exemption simply to corporate organizations when its extension to unincorporated associations is equally defensible in practice and in theory.

Amendment adding sections 3 (a) (9), (10), and (11): This amendment has several purposes. The primary purpose of the amendment is to make clear that the exemptions accorded by the present sections 4 (3) and 5 (c) of the act extend beyond the particular transactions therein covered, to the security itself. Considerable confusion has existed on this point, and the amendment is merely a confirmation of interpretations of the sections by the Commission. The new section 3 (a) (9) incorporates the first clause of the existing section 4 (3) and makes clear, in accordance with the interpretation of the Commission, that in order that the exemption may be available the entire issue must be exchanged exclusively with existing security holders. This paragraph also affects a change which makes clear that the type of commission or other remuneration the payment of which will remove the exemption is that paid for soliciting an exchange. This conforms to the interpretation of the Commission. The new section 3 (a) (10) incorporates the second clause of the existing section 4 (3) and substantially extends the present provisions in order to cover various forms of readjustments of the rights of holders of outstanding securities, claims, and property interests where the holders will be protected by court supervision of the conditions of the issuance of their new securities. Also, such readjustments under the supervision of officials and agencies of the United States and under the supervision of State banking, insurance, and similar officials, are brought within the exemption. Thus, the amended section will afford an exemption to securities issued in connection with a readjustment of outstanding real-estate bond issues, and the exemption will also cover securities issued under the supervision of the Comptroller of the Currency, the Federal Reserve Board, and similar Federal officials, as well as State banking and insurance officials. By the requirement that securities, claims, and property interests must be bona fide outstanding, the new section will provide protection against resort to the exemption for the purpose of evading the registration requirements of the act. The new section 3 (a) (11) incorporates the existing section 5 (c) of the act and further makes clear that the exemption is not limited to the use of the mails. Thus, a person who comes within the purpose of the exemption, but happens to use a newspaper for the circulation of his advertising literature, which newspaper is transmitted in interstate commerce, does not thereby lose the benefits of the exemption.

Amendment to section 4 (1): The purposes of this amendment are: (1) to remove the phrase "not with or through an underwriter" in the second clause of the section; and (2) to correct an error in the third clause of the section; making it clear that the original date of the public offering is the date from which the year is to be calculated during which a dealer is bound to supply his customers with a prospectus. The Commission has recognized by its interpretations that a public offering is necessary for distribution. Therefore, there can be no underwriter within the meaning of the act in the absence of a public offering and the phrase eliminated in the second clause is really superfluous.

Repeal of sections 4 (3) and 5 (c): These are in accordance with the amendment provided by the new sections 3 (a) (9) (10) and (11).

Amendment to section 10 (b) (1): The purpose of this amendment is to place only a reasonable instead of an absolute duty upon the user of a prospectus 13 months after its issuance of keeping the information therein up to date. It was originally conceived that users of prospectuses could protect themselves herein by contract with the issuer, but it appears only too likely that users of the prospectus will not have the forethought, and therefore will be left in a situation where they cannot of their own accord conform with the requirements of the act.

Amendment to section 11 (a): This amendment limits recovery under section 11 for damages resulting from misstatements or omissions in registration statements to those persons who acquire securities in reliance on such misstatements or omissions.

Amendment to section 11 (b) (3): This amendment restates the existing section. It seems that the section as written, though meaning the same thing, has had an unfortunate psychological effect.

Amendment to section 11 (c): This amendment has the same purpose as the preceding amendment. The term "fiduciary relationship" has been terrifyingly portrayed. The amendment substitutes for that language the accepted common-law definition of the duty of a fiduciary.

Amendment to section 11 (e): This amendment is the most important of all. It has three purposes: (1) It permits the defendant in an action under section 11 to reduce the damages so that he will not be liable for damages which he proves had no relation to his misconduct; (2) it provides that an underwriter who does not receive any preferential treatment is permitted to limit his total liability for all suits brought under section 11 to the extent of the public offering price of the securities which he underwrote; and (3) it provides, as a defense against blackmail suits as well as a defense against purely contentious litigation on the part of the defendant, that a court can require a bond for costs and can assess costs against either the plaintiff or the defendant, where the court is convinced either that the plaintiff's suit had no merit or that the defendant's defense had no merit. The suggested amendment seems equitable.

Amendment to section 13: The purpose of this amendment is to reduce the periods of limitations on actions to one half of those at present provided by the section; and also to correct an apparently inadvertent omission by making the 5- (formerly 10-) year period of limitation on actions expressly applicable to section 12 (2).

Amendment to section 15: The purpose of this amendment is to restrict the scope of the section so as more accurately to carry out its real purpose. The mere existence of control is not made a basis for liability unless that control is effectively exercised to bring about the action upon which liability is based.

Amendment to section 19 (a): The purpose of this amendment is to permit the regulations of the Commission, under the powers conferred upon it, adequately to protect persons who rely upon them in good faith. The powers of the Commission are also extended to include the defining of technical as well as trade terms.

Mr. FLETCHER. With reference to the question raised by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] and the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS], I will ask the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES] to refer to the specific language in the bill.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, thanking the Senator from Florida, the Chairman of the Banking and Currency Committee, for the courtesy of yielding at this point in order that the Senator from South Carolina, a member of the committee, may respond to the query which I assumed to present, in addition to that presented by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG], I now inform the members of the subcommittee that I am in receipt of many communications on this subject from my home in Chicago, and largely from other portions of the State of Illinois. The writers of these communications seem to be under the impression that the organization of little commercial companies which have no stock-exchange listings, and no purpose of selling stock for speculation, is covered by the bill.

I desire to give three illustrations which will serve to define what is meant.

Companies are being organized in my city to operate busses to connect with electric lines outside the big city. In the big city a number of companies are proposed for the purpose of taking over banks which have had misfortunes. They wish to issue the stock among those who are seeking to constitute the new establishment. Third, an effort is being made to build a little electric-line crossing from one village in the county to another village and thus to join the larger area of the elevated or the ground electric railway; and they fear that they are within the bill.

I take the liberty of offering this illustration in order to say to the able chairman of the committee that those undertaking similar measures seem to fear that this bill will prevent their organization, and are saying to me that it will destroy the prospect of their incorporation for the aid of their own interest in such manner as I have described. I ask the able Senator, following with my query that of the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG], if the bill covers such a situation and works such an embarrassment as these who write me seem to fear it does.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, if I understood the Senator from Illinois correctly, he referred to the organization of companies——

Mr. LEWIS. And selling their stocks among themselves.

Mr. BYRNES. And selling their stocks. There is nothing in the bill so far as I know that would in any way affect it. I was under the impression that the Senator desired to know whether or not such corporations would be required to file reports.

Mr. LEWIS. Yes; that was the second query, I may say, and I am pleased to have the Senator answer it now.

Mr. BYRNES. The language of the bill in section 13 is:

> The Commission may require every issuer of a security registered on a national securities exchange to file with the exchange and with the Commission * * * in such form and detail * * * as may be prescribed—

The information thereof is then set forth. There is no provision requiring a corporation which is, as the Senator states, listed on no exchange to file a report. The only language I know of in the bill which could give justification for the fear that that might be true is the provision in section 15, called the "over-the-counter markets" section, in which it is provided that—

> Rules and regulations may provide for the regulation of all transactions on any such market, for the registration with the Commission of dealers and/or brokers making or creating such a market—

And so forth. I do not even construe that language as giving to the Commission the power to call upon corporations whose stocks are dealt with in that manner—the small corporations cited by the Senator from Illinois—for the reports which are specifically required by section 13. That certainly is my construction of the bill, because it refers to those corporations whose stocks are listed upon some national securities exchange.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. BYRNES. I yield.

Mr. VANDENBERG. The Senator realizes, however, that section 15 refers to unlisted securities.

Mr. BYRNES. Yes.

Mr. VANDENBERG. And the language textually permits the Commission, in terms, to provide rules and regulations which will "insure to investors protection comparable to that provided by and under authority of this act in the case of national security exchanges."

Mr. BYRNES. Yes. I have said, in response to the question of the Senator from Illinois, that I could think of no language that could possibly have caused this impression on the part of those who have written to the Senator, unless it was the language in that section where the language gives to the Commission power to adopt rules and regulations to control a transaction. It does not refer to the submission of reports, and I do not believe could be accurately construed to include such powers, but it does give the Commission the specific power to control the transactions referred to in section 15, the so-called "over-the-counter" market transactions. There is no doubt about that.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. BYRNES. Certainly.

Mr. VANDENBERG. In a colloquy I had with the able Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] some time ago, he stated his belief that it was not the purpose or intent or desire to extend the authority of the act into purely localized industrial financing.

Mr. BYRNES. It was not the intent. I will say to the Senator that this good day is the first time those of us who have been charged with the consideration of the bill have heard of the proposal that section 15 would extend the powers which are specifically provided for in section 13 so as to require reports. The Senator is correct; it was not so intended, so far as I know.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Entirely aside from the question of reports, how about the intended control of the sale of purely localized industrial securities?

Mr. BYRNES. As to the language here, I think there is a very good reason for the provisions of this section, because the purpose of the bill is to seek to regulate the character of trading in stocks, which has been so well described by the chairman of the committee. I think the Senator from Michigan may well see that when Congress seeks to place its regulatory powers over these corporations, they might promptly delist from the exchange. The language of section 15 is calculated to cause those corporations to remain upon the exchange because it will let them know that they will be subject to regulation, either on the exchange, or if they try to avoid the regulatory powers provided for in the bill and endeavor to have their securities traded in over the counter, they will meet the same regulation.

If the Senator asks about the small, purely local corporations, of course, there was no intent to injure or handicap such corporations at all, and I do not know of any section in the bill that would so result.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, of course I should not want to open the back door to the delisting of the securities to which the Senator refers, and I fully understand the necessity of keeping that door closed. At the same time, if it were possible, without reopening that back door, to exempt the purely localized, the secondary financing, it seems to me it would be helpful in allaying a great deal of discontent.

May I ask the Senator this specific question—and the suggestion comes to me from my own able colleague [Mr. COUZENS]—might it not be possible to exempt from this section corporations, let us say, whose total outstanding securities do not exceed $250,000, or something of that character?

Mr. BYRNES. Certainly, so far as I am concerned, I should be delighted to join with the Senator in a provision which would limit it, and make certain that the intent should be carried out.

The Senator from Kentucky suggests to me, and it is undoubtedly correct, that under the bill the Commission is given the power to take care of the matter, and, of course, we assumed that the powers granted would be administered with some wisdom, and that in adopting rules and regulations, the situation referred to would be taken care of. However, if the Senator feels that it would be unwise to place that confidence in the execution of these powers in that way, and he wants specifically to provide for it, I should have great sympathy with his desire.

Mr. VANDENBERG. In other words, what I am discussing does not run counter to the Senator's conception of the purpose of the proposed legislation?

Mr. BYRNES. No; our theory was that the Federal Trade Commission, or the stock-exchange commission, as one may choose to call it, would never seek to extend its powers to control local corporations of the type referred to; but if there were any general fear that that might result, we should be willing to have the language of the bill changed so as to take care of that matter.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. BYRNES. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. I will ask the Senator whether it is not true that one of the reasons which actuated the committee in dividing the securities into two categories—one listed securities and the other unlisted, and fixing in the law itself the character of reports which must be made on listed securities and leaving in the discretion of the Commisson the regulaton of unlisted securities—was in order that the Commission might take into consideration not only the size of the corporation, so far as its outstanding stock is concerned, but all the circumstances connected with it, in order to determine whether there ought to be any regulation applying to a given type of corporation, or whether it should not be exempted entirely by the regulation.

One objection which occurs to me to the suggestion of the Senator from Michigan with reference to the fixing of a limit of $250,000, or any other limitation, is that we all know that not only on the exchanges listing stocks, but even in connection with unlisted stocks of quite important corporations, oftentimes the outstanding stock is small and is closely held, and is, therefore, easily manipulated. I might mention certain stocks listed on the New York Stock Exchange of which not more than $250,000 worth is outstanding, and because of the small number of shares, and the closeness with which they are held, it is easy to manipulate the prices of such stocks on the stock exchange, and run them up and down, by the sale of a small number of shares.

The difficulty we might find, I think, in fixing a limitation in the law itself as to the amount of outstanding stock, providing in the law that it should not be subject to any regulation at all, would be that we might run up against that very situation. That is why I think it important that the commission be given full power and freedom to survey the whole situation as to unlisted stocks, large and small, and make regulations according to the circumstances and conditions which they find from their investigation.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BYRNES. I yield the floor.

Mr. BARKLEY. If I have the floor, I yield to the Senator.

Mr. KING. I might state, in the light of the suggestion made by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG], that it is quite customary in these days for corporations to issue stock of no par value, and their nominal value might be insignificant, yet the real value of the stock might mount into colossal figures.

Mr. BARKLEY. That is undoubtedly true, and that would make it more difficult to fix a limitation as to outstanding stock as a criterion for regulation by the Commission, so far as unlisted stocks are concerned.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, is it not the Senator's construction that as the language now reads, it would be within the jurisdiction or discretion of the Commission to consider the size of corporations?

Mr. BARKLEY. It would be; yes.

Mr. BORAH. And include purely local corporations?

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes; if those local corporations were having their stock traded in in what are called "over-the-counter transactions." Of course, there are thousands of small corporations, organized in small towns, where the stock is altogether owned by local people, where everybody knows the business of the corporation, where a man who holds 100 shares of the stock can go to the bank in the town which knows about the success of the company and borrow money on the stock and put the stock up as collateral.

It is inconceivable that any sort of a commission would undertake to reach out and bring under its jurisdiction any such local corporation, where the stock is locally held, not traded in on any exchange, not active in over-the-counter transactions. It is inconceivable that any commission would want to bring such companies within the power of regulation to the same extent they would a $1,000,000 or $5,000,000 corporation which did not happen to be listed on the New York or any other exchange, but which might be manipulated, as Wiggin manipulated some of his stocks which were not listed on any exchange.

Mr. BORAH. It does seem true that the Commission would not likely do that; but it could do it, under the bill?

Mr. BARKLEY. It could do it; undoubtedly that is true. But if we attempt to take away from the power of the Commission to do what in all probability it never would do, we may very materially handicap it in crippling its ability to do what it ought to do with reference to some other company.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield.

Mr. KING. Did the committee take into consideration the question of the authority of the Federal Government to deal with transactions which are confessedly and certainly local in character? What authority does the Federal Government have to deal with a little company, formed in a small town, a little sheep company or a little cattle company, for instance, where A, B, C, and D subscribe for a thousand dollars' worth of stock apiece, and form a little corporation, and the stock is issued to them, and which they are not attempting to dispose of or sell, and yet which they may sell? What authority has the Federal Government to control such a company?

Mr. BARKLEY. The committee considered that question. Of course, it is not necessary to write into every statute a provision that it shall not apply to purely intrastate business. As a matter of fact, this proposed act is, in part at least, based upon the power of Congress to regulate commerce. It is difficult now to conceive of even a small corporation which may not engage in interstate commerce. The fact that a corporation is locally owned, all of its stock owned in a given town, does not mean that it will not sell stuff in interstate commerce or ship commodities across a State line; and if it did so, it would, of course, be subject to the power of Congress to regulate it. Our business has become so largely interstate, and so complex and intricate, that it would be the smallest of local corporations organized for some definite local purpose which would not possibly come within the power of Congress to regulate as being engaged in interstate commerce.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield.

Mr. BYRNES. I intended to respond to the Senator from Utah, but I see he is busy. I call attention to the fact that in the very section to which the Senator from Utah was referring, the language of the bill is that—

> It shall be unlawful for any broker or dealer, singly or with any other person or persons, to make use of the mails or any other means or instrumentality of interstate commerce—

To create a market.

Mr. BARKLEY. That language presupposes that this bill is intended to regulate, insofar as Congress can regulate, securities of companies which are engaged in interstate commerce; and the mails and the facilities of interstate commerce are withdrawn from any such company which undertakes to engage in the business contrary to this proposed law or the regulations which may be made under it.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield.

Mr. FLETCHER. I call attention to section 3 of the bill, pages 6 and 7. The Senator from Utah raised the question about the power of the Commission. I do not know whether or not that section has been mentioned. I read:

(12) The term "exempted security" or "exempted securities" shall include securities which are direct obligations of or obligations guaranteed as to principal or interest by the United States; such securities issued or guaranteed by corporations in which the United States has a direct or indirect interest as shall be designated for exemption by the Secretary of the Treasury as necessary or appropriate in the public interest or for the protection of investors; securities which are direct obligations of or obligations guaranteed as to principal or interest by a State or any political subdivision thereof or any agency or instrumentality of a State or any political subdivision thereof or any municipal corporate instrumentality of one or more States; and such other securities (including unregistered securities, the market in which is predominantly intrastate) as the Commission may, by such rules and regulations as it deems necessary or appropriate in the public interest or for the protection of investors, either unconditionally or upon specified terms and conditions or for stated periods, exempt from the operation of any one or more provisions of this act which by their terms do not apply to an "exempted security" or to "exempted securities."

In other words, the Commission is required to exempt the securities which are handled in the manner therein described.

Mr. BARKLEY. That would be true even though part of the securities were sold or handled in interstate commerce. If handled predominantly intrastate, the Commission may have the power to exempt them, along with other securities which they may exempt because of their local character, or the small amount handled?

Mr. VANDENBERG. It is largely in the discretion of the Commission.

Mr. BARKLEY. It is largely in the discretion of the Commission, the direction to the Commission being as to what securities shall be exempted which are predominantly intrastate.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, the Senator from Kentucky, responding to a portion of the inquiry directed by the Senator from Utah, correctly embodied in his observations the situation in Illinois as reported in correspondence to me which I sought to express a moment past; that is of the small company, either now existing or to be formed within the State, having for its real object the ownership of a small business, such as a little railroad running from a village to the main line, or a little bank, to be owned only by those who are its stockholders. I feel that they fear the danger to them is that before they can undertake the business, whatever it is, they must first get the consent of the Commission, and, second, that in attempting to issue stock they would be restrained in the action by virtue of the fact that it is assumed the Commission might interrupt them.

Is there not some way to express in the bill their exemption from having to get their authority from the Commission, providing they have certain limitations?

Mr. BARKLEY. I will say to the Senator that that fear, expression of which has come to all of us through letters inspired in part, at least, by some of those who do not want any regulation at all of stock-market transactions, is without the slightest foundation, insofar as it affects the organization of companies anywhere, either in small towns or in large towns. There is nothing in the bill which gives the Commission any power over the organization of corporations.

Mr. LEWIS. How about the selling of the stock, may I ask my able friend?

Mr. BARKLEY. A new corporation is organized, and its stock is listed on a registered stock exchange such as the New York Stock Exchange, or the Curb Exchange, or the Chicago Stock Exchange, or smaller local stock exchanges all over the country, which deal in local securities, as well as Nation-wide securities, if I may so term them. It is, of course, conceivable that the regulation of stock-market transactions in such securities might indirectly affect their salability, but only insofar as it may require the issuing company to expose to the stock exchange and to the Federal Commission the real condition of the security which is proposed to be sold.

It seems to me incredible that anyone should fear that the telling of the truth to the Federal Commission here in Washington, or to the New York Stock Exchange, would materially lessen the opportunity to sell stocks, unless the telling of the truth and the exposition of the facts would be of such a nature as would warn the people that such a stock ought not to be dealt in in any way.

With reference to unlisted securities, it is conceivable, of course, that a set of men might be appointed on a commission here in Washington who would hedge about the sale of unlisted securities with such restrictions as to make it more difficult to sell them; but it is inconceivable to me that any intelligent body of men, such as we might expect the President to appoint and the Senate to confirm, would so hedge about the sale of unlisted securities of local corporations in your town and in mine as to affect adversely, or at all, the sale of stock of small local corporations.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield.

Mr. BYRNES. I will say to the Senator from Illinois that I think his correspondents have in mind not really the requirements of this bill but the requirements of the Securities Act of 1933, because the Senator speaks of the organization of a company and the issuance of stock, and the effort to sell stock of that company. If in so doing an attempt is made to use the mails or the instrumentalities of interstate commerce, the company must comply with the requirements of the Securities Act of 1933. That, however, is an entirely different thing from the terms of this bill; and, unfortunately, many business men in the country have confused the provisions of the two measures. This bill applies only to the registration upon the exchanges of the country, and only to stocks that are registered upon exchanges.

Mr. LEWIS. I beg to say to the Senator from Kentucky, which might aid him to make explanation to my able friend the Senator from Michigan and myself, that I happen to know two or three of the prospects. The companies to be formed are owned among the stock owners themselves. They have bought the stock. The owners of the company are building an electric railroad, we will say, leading from a large town to a small town, or are engaged in the opening of a bank which had previously failed; and such company is only to be owned by those who themselves own the stock of the company, and they themselves have paid for it. Their contention is that though the stock is not listed and not to be sold on the market, nevertheless they could not transfer their stock one to the other in a transaction where they owned the property themselves without the consent of this Commission. Am I wrong?

Mr. BARKLEY. I will say that the Senator is wrong there. That is, he is not wrong in saying others have a fear of that sort; but I will say that they are wrong in their fear.

Mr. LEWIS. I mean, are my people wrong in that fear?

Mr. BARKLEY. The Senator's people are wrong in their fear. If there is to be organized a new company, ab initio, to engage in interstate commerce, it must present certain facts to the Federal Trade Commission in order to receive permission to issue its stock, but not if it is engaged in intrastate commerce, if it operates in its own village. I am speaking of the Securities Act, which is already the law.

There is no change in this bill in the requirements of the Securities Act, unless the Senator from Florida should have his amendments adopted, which I think are meritorious; but the Senator from Illinois must not confuse this bill with the Securities Act which is already in effect. The issue of securities, whether of a new company being organized from the beginning, or whether of new stock which an old company is issuing to place upon the market, requires that such information shall be filed with the Federal Trade Commission before the stock may be issued, and the issue must be approved in a sense by the Federal Trade Commission. That is one thing.

The sale of stock locally from hand to hand in a community by the prospective president of a new corporation which is being organized for some local purpose, when solicitation is being engaged in among the people of the town to subscribe for a certain portion of stock, would not be regulated by the Commission sitting in Washington, unless we are to assume that the Commission would go entirely beyond the bounds of reason, and that its conception of this bill is that it must use the restrictive force of the Government relative to every share of stock which may be issued by any little corporation organized for any local purpose.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield.

Mr. LEWIS. The matter I described to the able Senator, I would have him understand, is not within the intent of the bill, not within the spirit of the bill; and, if it should happen, it would be by the unintentional misconstruction by the Commission of the intent of the bill.

Mr. BYRNES. I will say, Mr. President, that that applies even to the Securities Act of 1933. The provision of the law applying to the case cited by the Senator from Illinois is found in section 5 (c):

> The provisions of this section relating to the use of the mails shall not apply to the sale of any security where the issue of which it is a part is sold only to persons resident within a single State or Territory, where the issuer of such securities is a person resident and doing business within, or, if a corporation, incorporated by and doing business within, such State or Territory.

So, under the facts as stated by the Senator, even the Securities Act of 1933 would not apply; but if the security is sold in interstate commerce, or the mails are used, then it would apply.

Mr. BARKLEY. It was not the intention of the Securities Act itself to deal with the issue of securities of small local companies, such as, for instance, ice companies and small lumber companies which are locally organized, and whose business is restricted to local communities. Of course, it is conceivable that such a company, originally organized for local purposes, might expand until it became an important factor in interstate commerce; and then, of course, the Securities Act would apply and this act would apply, insofar as the Commission might see fit to issue general regulations which might cover it if it were engaged in interstate commerce and its securities were predominantly sold in interstate commerce.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield.

Mr. VANDENBERG. In view of the fact that the Senator says that such things as we have been discussing probably would not happen anyway, and in view of the statement by the Senator from South Carolina and the Senator from Florida that they would have no objection to a limitation of the sort I have indicated, may I ask the Senator from Kentucky if he would not be willing in his behalf to allow an amendment of that nature to go to conference for further study?

Mr. BARKLEY. Of course, I can only speak for myself.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I am asking for the Senator's own viewpoint.

Mr. BARKLEY. I cannot speak for the Senator from Florida and the Senator from South Carolina or the committee, but, personally, I would rather think over the possibility of such an amendment before suggesting that it go into the bill or even go to conference. I know of an important concern engaged in interstate commerce whose outstanding stock is more than the amount suggested by the Senator from Michigan which by other means, either by the issue of bonds or other forms of capital investment or by the accumulation of surplus, may be able to control a considerable amount of money, above $250,000, which is represented by the mere outstanding stock; and, as suggested by the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING], many companies now issue millions of shares of stock with no par value at all. I do not know how we would limit the jurisdiction of the proposed commission over the stock of such companies as that, where there is no par value, there is no way of estimating the real value of the stock. It may have a book value; it may have a value upon some exchange, if it is registered, but I know of no way by which a commission or any agency of the Government could definitely arrive at the value of millions of shares of stock which have been issued with no par value whatever attached to them.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, my amendment has this qualification—and I may ask the Senator from Washington to heed the suggestion—where there is no listing of a stock for sale, and where there is no interstate-commerce transaction, Could not that be placed in the bill as a specific qualification to compose the minds of people who may be fearful?

Mr. BARKLEY. Of course it could be, but the effort to exempt by language in this bill every conceivable situation which may arise is subject to the objection, in my judgment, that we would be taking away from the Commission, which is to be set up, the flexibility which it should have to regulate very largely the sale of unlisted stocks in such a way as to cripple the efficiency of the proposed act, because if we can eliminate one situation by an amendment there are hundreds of them that we can think of that ought to be similarly eliminated.

Mr. STEIWER and Mr. DILL addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kentucky yield, and if so, to whom?

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield first to the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. STEIWER. I merely want to make a suggestion. Is it not appropriate, in order to calm the fears of those who now raise the question as to the inclusion of small intrastate corporations, to say to them that the bill by its terms does not and cannot reach such corporations. In the first place, this bill deals with stock exchanges, and with the regulation of the over-the-counter market. The very least corporation, if it should seek to list its stock upon the stock exchange, would be obliged to comply with this proposed law. That might be so even though it were an intrastate institution, because the stock exchange may be engaged in an interstate business and the intrastate operation comes in quite incidentally.

I think, therefore, the very least corporation might subject itself to regulation under this proposed act if it should seek to sell its securities over the counter. But unless the stock crosses the threshold of one of these institutions or the other, it is not affected by the proposed law, whether it be a big institution or a little institution. Our friends, therefore, who are borrowing trouble for fear that this proposed law is going to affect adversely the little intrastate institutions, may very well quiet their fears, for unless they seek to sell their securities at some place in a way that comes within the act they are wholly unfounded.

Mr. BARKLEY. I appreciate what the Senator says. We have got to keep fairly in mind the difference between the actual physical operations of a corporation doing only an intrastate business and the placing of stock of such a corporation upon an exchange which is an interstate institution.

Mr. STEIWER. That is true.

Mr. BARKLEY. There may be a lumber company in the Senator's State which does not sell a foot of lumber outside of Oregon or does not buy a foot on the outside and ship it into Oregon, and yet if it registers its stock on the New York Stock Exchange or some other exchange outside the State it becomes, of course, subject to this proposed law and is regulated as an interstate institution. I doubt whether it is practicable to write into the bill language that would exempt a possible situation in order to calm the fears of people, admitting, as I think, that the fears have been groundless and that they have been rather conjured up by those who have been seeking to use this possible situation to create fear so that there might be opposition to this bill in any form.

Mr. STEIWER. There may be some ground for fear, and I should like to discuss that question at some later and more appropriate time; but, as far as the immediate question is concerned, I feel there is no substantial ground for contending that the small intrastate institutions need have any fear, because, literally, they are not covered by the proposed act.

Mr. BARKLEY. No; that is my contention.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kentucky yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield.

Mr. DILL. I have communications expressing the belief that under the language of the bill as written, corporations of all kinds with any established interstate business will be called upon to make reports to the Commission. I am not sufficiently familiar with the bill to say whether or not that is true, but, it seems to me, if there is any doubt, the language ought to be clarified, for certainly the determination of whether a corporation comes under this bill should be on the basis of whether its stocks are put on the market. If they are not, there ought to be no question as to the situation.

Mr. BARKLEY. I will say to the Senator in that connection that with reference to listed stocks reports are required and there cannot be any question about the propriety of such a provision.

Mr. DILL. Absolutely none, and I have no objection to that.

Mr. BARKLEY. I contend—and I do not think anybody can successfully contend to the contrary—that where any stock is registered upon a national stock exchange, as to which stock millions of people have no way of knowing the condition of the company, of knowing anything about its balance sheet, of anything about how much it earns or of knowing anything about the salaries paid its officers, they certainly have the right to go to some public place and to inquire of some public institution the condition of that company as a prerequisite to their engaging in the purchase of its stock.

Mr. DILL. I have not any question at all about that.

Mr. BARKLEY. That is one side. We have in our investigation disclosed situations affecting stock of large companies not registered on any stock exchange, but dealt in what they call "over-the-counter transactions", which, of course, are more or less vague.

Mr. DILL. I agree that they ought to report, but I am talking of those that do not engage in over-the-counter transactions.

Mr. BARKLEY. There is nothing in this bill, as I understand, that requires any corporation whose stock is not sold either on a registered exchange or in an over-the-counter transaction to make any kind of a report to the commission proposed to be set up by the measure.

Mr. DILL. Then, there certainly could be no objection to a proviso stating that this bill does not apply to any such corporation.

Mr. BARKLEY. Of course, that brings up the question——

Mr. DILL. If the Senator's statement is correct, there should not be any objection to that, and the very fact that the Senator is objecting to such a proviso makes me fearful that there is some question.

Mr. BARKLEY. Not at all. The trouble is there have been many groundless fears created in the minds of people all over this country by men who are not in favor of any kind of stock regulation—and they are perfectly honest fears, I grant—and if we should undertake to calm every fear on the part of everybody in this country by writing a sentence that would calm such fears, we never would understand what our bill means.

Mr. DILL. The very hesitancy of the Senator to accept some provision to clarify what he and I agree on is, it seems to me, to justify their fears.

Mr. BARKLEY. I hope the Senator will not assume that my hesitancy to accept an amendment suggested by him on the spur of the moment is actuated by any insidious desire on my part to clutter up this bill with language that cannot be understood.

Mr. DILL. I do not impute any insidious desire to the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. BARKLEY. The trouble about it is, as the Senator as a legislator knows, in trying to exempt everybody who feels that, although he is probably by the language of the bill not included, somebody after a while may interpret him to be included, that we might unwittingly exempt many people who ought to be included. That is the difficulty about it.

Mr. DILL. The Senator is a lawyer, and he knows that lawyers can make words mean almost anything. If it is the intent of this bill not to include corporations whose stock is not registered on an exchange or not dealt in over the counter, of course, if that is the intent, he, as a legislator, only has to write it in the bill so that there cannot be any question.

Mr. BARKLEY. Section 2 of the bill itself says that only those are included in the proposed law. Why should anybody imagine that someone else will be included in it?

Mr. DILL. The language is at least doubtful.

Mr. BARKLEY. This proposed law and no other law attaches to anybody to whom it does not apply by its terms.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, the mere fact that a stock is registered shows that the issuer of the stock intended it to be interstate commerce. The very fact that it is sold over the counter means that he intends it to be interstate commerce.

Mr. BARKLEY. It would be somewhat like passing a law dealing with black cattle and then for some man having a white cow, fearing that it might apply to his white cow, insisting that language be written in the act that it shall not apply to a white cow.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield.

Mr. BLACK. I have just read the bill rather carefully, and the only provision I find with reference to reports is in section 13 (a). It specifically states as to what the report shall be made. It says:

> The Commission may require every issuer of a security registered on a national securities exchange to file—

And so forth. That is all I have found relating to any requirement.

Mr. BARKLEY. There is a general provision in section 15.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kentucky yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield.

Mr. BYRNES. The only difficulty that has been brought out in the discussion is that in section 15 it is provided that the Commission may prescribe, where necessary in the public interest and to insure protection to investors, certain rules and regulations, and that such rules and regulations may provide for the regulation of all transactions on any such market.

Mr. BLACK. That is the over-the-counter market?

Mr. BYRNES. Yes; and because it is provided in the section that for the purpose the Commission may make special rules and regulations in respect to securities of specified classes, a fear has been expressed that the Commission might seek to make the same regulations, in order to register a stock which has been dealt in on the over-the-counter market, as are required for the registration of stocks upon the exchange. I think such a fear is not justified. It is a fear expressed by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG].

The provision giving to the Commission the power to adopt rules and regulations for the regulation of transactions on the over-the-counter market must refer to the first language in the section, where it is provided that it shall be—

> Unlawful for any broker, singly or with any other person or persons, to make use of the mails or any means or instrumentality of interstate commerce for the purpose of making or creating, or enabling another to make or create, a market.

That is the language. If they do that and make a market, then they engage in interstate commerce, and then the Commission has the right to prescribe rules and regulations. It does not require the Commission, in establishing such rules and regulations, to go into the details set forth as to stocks listed upon an exchange, but leaves it entirely with the Commission, so that they may differentiate as between stocks or securities and may not require it.

I do not share the fear of the Senator from Michigan has expressed nor the fear the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] has expressed. I said that, as far as I am personally concerned, if an amendment were drawn specifically to provide it was not to affect intrastate sales of stocks, in order to take care of the situation which the Senator from Illinois had in mind, of a little bank being organized and the stock being sold in the community, I would see no objection to adopting such a provision. Such a situation certainly is not covered, and such an amendment would have to be carefully drawn for fear it might do some injury that we really did not anticipate.

Mr. BARKLEY. That is what I had in mind a while ago when I suggested that any such amendment ought to be very carefully considered, because in undertaking to do what all of us have in mind as the object of the bill, we might let somebody out of a loophole that ought not to be left out.

I have no desire to occupy the time of the Senate longer, and therefore yield the floor.

MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT

Messages in writing from the President of the United States were communicated to the Senate by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries.

PROHIBITION OF LOANS TO DEFAULTING NATIONS

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, I apologize for this intrusion for a very brief diversion. I am not very often guilty of such a thing, but because of recent events I feel it not inappropriate to devote a few minutes to endeavoring to clarify a situation concerning a measure which has become a law and some of its provisions and what may eventuate in the very near future.

The Congress enacted a law, the President signing it, concerning foreign debts, prohibiting the sale of foreign bonds and securities and obligations of foreign countries which are in default to the Government of the United States. Wittingly and unwittingly there have been much misapprehension and some misrepresentation concerning that measure, its possibilities, and what it may do in the future. It is to those who unwittingly have misunderstood or misrepresented the measure that I address myself, not to that part of the press of the country which responds always to those nations which are indebted to us, and is ever endeavoring to aid them before the American public with poisonous propaganda published with intent to misrepresent and mislead.

Mr. President, a very brief history of the measure may account for some things in respect to it. A gentleman was traveling in Europe a year or two ago, one whom most of us know, and, I think, know quite favorably. He met on every side hostility. He met with sneers and jibes at our country and the debts which are due from foreign countries to ours. In something of exasperation one day he wrote me that there ought to be some mode in which we would express our will or our displeasure, some mode by which we would preclude the possibility in the future of that occurring which had occurred in the past. His letter describing exactly what he had come in contact with impressed me immensely, and I endeavored then, long ago, to present a measure to the Senate which would prevent individuals in this country selling the securities of those countries which had defaulted on the debts they owed us.

The measure was brought into the Senate infinitely broader than the measure that finally became the law and was signed by the President. It came before the Judiciary Committee. The Judiciary Committee reported it favorably. It came then to the floor of the Senate and, with practically no debate, it was passed as the calendar was called one day. Subsequently the distinguished Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed, and for a month or more we were in conference concerning amendments which were suggested to the bill in order that it might meet, as I understood, and as he did, I believe, all the views of all those who might be affected by it in our country and who were interested in its ultimate enforcement.

Finally the bill was amended, exactly as was asked; and thus amended, curtailing and limiting in a great degree its original purpose, it passed the Senate, went to the House, finally there was heard by the committee, passed the House, and was signed by the President of the United States and became a law.

That, sir, is a little of the history of the measure. Before the measure became a law, however, many months—indeed, in November last—token payments upon the debt of Great Britain were made by that country. Those token payments were accepted by the President of the United States. When the President accepted the token payments he made a public statement to Great Britain and to our country, a public statement where his words were measured, I take it, from their character, in which he said that he would not look upon the failure to pay the entire obligation then due as a default. His words were these:

> In view of these representations of the payment and of the impossibility at this time of passing finally and justly upon the request for readjustment of the debt, I have no personal hesitation in saying that I shall not regard the British Government as in default.

That statement was made on the 7th day of November 1933. Long subsequent thereto the particular measure was passed. It then came before those who were dealing with the subject matter for construction. Subsequent to the time the President made this statement in the words employed by him I said to the committee of the House, which queried me upon the subject when I appeared there in support of the bill, that I could not agree with the President in the view he thus presented; but I added, of course, that my view was of little or no consequence in the light of the views expressed by the President, and that his words undoubtedly would prevail.

Thus, the measure came to a determination and a construction by the Attorney General of the United States last Saturday; and the Attorney General of the United States, in accordance with the words which were stated by the President in November last, held that Great Britain was not in default because of the acceptance of the token payments and because of what had transpired during that particular period.

I have no quarrel with the decision rendered by the Attorney General. It is immaterial to me now what may have occurred in the past, and it is immaterial to me whether the view I entertained last November and have entertained ever since, at variance with that expressed in November, is the view that should prevail or be adopted by the Attorney General. That is gone; but there is another phase of this matter that is of extraordinary importance.

There is now impending another installment due upon her debt by Great Britain. Next month that installment will become due. Since the words of the President, since the various circumstances he detailed in his statement last November, this act has been passed; and this act, plain and unambiguous in its terms, states exactly the conditions under which there would be a default.

It would be silly to contemplate a prosecution of anyone after the November statement by the President in accepting the token payments and after the President's construction of those token payments, no matter how we might disagree with what might be said by the President in that regard; but, sir, a different situation and a different set of circumstances will confront us in June next, only a month from now; for the act in so many words describes when a default is an actuality on the part of the nations that owe us, and provides in substance that it occurs not only when there is no payment of its obligations, but also "or any part thereof."

I take it, therefore, Mr. President, there is an end of token payments. I take it, therefore, Mr. President, that the question of token payments next month cannot and will not arise; and I take it, Mr. President, that anyone who would be bold enough, after a payment of seven or seven and a half or ten or fifteen million dollars in silver upon a very large indebtedness, to undertake to sell the securities or the obligations of that particular government in this country would come within the plain provisions of the law, and would be guilty of a violation of those plain provisions.

So, Mr. President, we need not think of the past, nor need we assail the opinion that has been rendered by the Attorney General, nor need we comment upon what was said by the President in November 1933. Next month we will have the determining factor, and next month this statute will be effective in precluding the possibility of sale of the securities of any country which is in default on the whole or any part of its indebtedness.

In passing, let me just suggest what a perfect absurdity it is to accept now a token payment by a government which boasts to the world that its financial condition and position are better than those of any other country on the face of the earth, and boasts to the world that not only has it balanced its budget but that it has a very large surplus to its credit as well! A token payment of seven and a half million dollars or ten million dollars, as the case may be, or a small moiety upon its debt under such circumstances, would be simply a fraud, a farce, and a delusion; and we may consider, I take it, sir, in view of the facts which have transpired, that there will be an end of token payments, and the law will be wholly effective next month.

I cannot understand, Mr. President, and I do not try to understand, that part of the American press which indulges not only in its hostility to but in its denunciation and its vilification of any man who dares stand here or in any other place to say a word about the debts that are justly due to the United States from foreign countries; and yet there is a part of the press of this country which was aptly once designated the "Foreign Legion press of America", that is engaged in propagandizing against its own country and for foreign nations day in and day out.

Today, in the eyes of that part of the press, it is a disgrace to be an American, or to claim an American's rights. Only recently I was shocked to read in one of the great newspapers of the land a leading editorial concerning this small act which was designed for the protection of our people—shocked to read its designation of that act and its characterization of it. I read, in order that I may not be in error in the quotation, a portion of a leading editorial of the New York Times of Monday, April 16, 1934. It related to "Students and War", and in the course of it the editorial said some things about this particular measure of ours; and the things it said that shocked me were that this little bill by which we forbade the sale in our country of the securities of those countries that had defrauded us was a cause of war. The precise language is:

> Look at the parochial-minded bill which the President has just signed, closing American money markets to every nation—or to groups within it—which has not paid all of its public debt to the United States. Across it is written, although as yet in invisible ink, the ominous words "casus belli."

Just imagine a great American newspaper saying that a small penal statute of this character, justified by the events that had occurred in respect to debts due the Government of the United States, was a cause of war! How can it be possible for any American newspaper thus to characterize a measure of this sort?

This is not the first time in the history of the world that credit has been denied to nations that defaulted in their payments to other nations. It is not the first time in the history of the world that an effort has been made to prevent subsequently the flotation of securities of the nations in default. The historic one is described in the very interesting work of Mr. Edgar Turlington, on the Mexican debt situation. I find that many years ago when Mexico, small and unable to defend itself, defaulted to British bondholders—not to a government—they took the matter in hand so that upon every bourse in all Europe Mexico was denied credit or the right to sell any of her securities.

I read two or three excerpts from that book:

> On January 12, 1874, Foster—

Who then represented our country in Mexico—

> in the absence of official relations between Great Britain and Mexico, introduced to President Lerdo in an unofficial manner, John Geiger, representative of the London Corporation of Foreign Bondholders.

They are a little more delicate over there concerning their bondholders who have been swindled than we are over here, perhaps. Over there, when there are debts that are due to bondholders of Britain, they take very good care, by their bondholders' associations, to endeavor to render some aid to those who have suffered at the hands of defaulting peoples or defaulting governments.

I continue:

> The President expressed to Geiger the earnest desire of his Government for an adjustment of the London debt and the willingness of his Government to resume the payment of interest as soon as the condition of the treasury and its resources would permit. He declined to make any proposition for such adjustment and resumption, but stated that he would be pleased to receive and consider a proposition from the bondholders.

Then, again:

> Upon the return of Geiger to London the council of the corporation of foreign bondholders resolved to take "more decided action", with a view to inducing Mexico to conclude arrangements with her foreign creditors.

I may say in passing that the Corporation of Foreign Bondholders is a corporation under the ægis of the British Government, and that the British Government aids it in every fashion it can. I attached as the second title of the Securities Act, when it passed the Congress of the United States, a provision which created a public corporation the design of which was exactly that of the Foreign Bondholders' Association of Great Britain, and which was fashioned upon the statute creating the British Foreign Bondholders' Association. It has been a source of infinite regret to me that it has not become operative.

The council decided to take more decided action.

> A factor in the council's decision was "the advantage the country derived from the construction of the Mexican Railway, effected by means of funds procured by the hypothecation of a part of the securities which had been already assigned to the bondholders." After consultation with the bourses on the Continent, the council notified the Mexican Government that it would no longer be allowed to avail itself, directly or indirectly, of European markets for the purpose of raising capital. The effect of this notification, says the corporation in its report for 1874, became immediately apparent. After unsuccessful attempts to raise money in the United States as well as in Europe, President Lerdo at length authorized overtures to be made to the committee of Mexican bondholders at London.

Today, sir, this law may be of little consequence. Today, sir, there may be no European nation that seeks to float its securities in this country. But today, sir, the world is in ferment. Today, sir, no man can prophesy what may occur within the next few months or the next few years. If there come a time in that period when money be required by a European nation, where, Mr. President, do you think that nation will come? It will come here, where we were once so easy, and where once it was not difficult to prevent the payment of what they justly owed, and may ask again; and then I hope this statute, brought to its full fruition, will preclude the possibility of any other loans being made until the present loans shall be settled.

Mr. WALCOTT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JOHNSON. I yield.

Mr. WALCOTT. The Senator spoke of loans. I assume he means a loan of either a private banking house or the Federal Government.

Mr. JOHNSON. No. The bill was amended so that the only loans to which the law is applicable are loans which are due to our Government.

Mr. WALCOTT. But in the event a nation were in default to our Government, that government could not borrow even of a private banking house. Is that true?

Mr. JOHNSON. Yes; it is true; because this is a penal statute, and it forbids the sale of bonds or obligations of governments which are in default to our Government, or loans to them.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, it does not prevent those countries which are now in default to our Government coming here and getting more money from our Government.

Mr. JOHNSON. The Senator asks a rhetorical question. The Senator from Michigan says that it would not prevent those countries from coming here and asking for more money from our Government. No; one may ask of the moon anything he chooses, but I should like to see the country in Europe today which owes us coming to this country and asking our Government for more money. I should like to see what the reply of our Government would be to such a request. And who would doubt what the attitude of our people would be?

Mr. COUZENS. The American public was not consulted when the loans were originally made to those countries.

Mr. JOHNSON. Certainly not.

Mr. COUZENS. It was done by executive officers, and the country was not consulted.

Mr. JOHNSON. Quite so; and now we are arousing the country, and the country is aroused. Now there is a different situation. Of course, the people were not at that time in a situation where they could deny or give consent, and the Senator is quite right, the Government floated the loans, in reality, in this country.

Just here let me ask, what is there that is unfair, what is there that is unjust, when down in the vaults of the Treasury Department are the bonds of these defaulting countries, on not one of which could we raise a dime, in reality, in our saying to the countries thus in default to our Government, "You shall not float in the United States, until these obligations shall be redeemed, any other bonds." That is what newspapers in our Nation declaim against, and it seems incredible to me that that peculiar attitude should exist on the part of any newspaper, Tory or otherwise.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. JOHNSON. I yield.

Mr. FESS. I think the Senator indicates a broader interpretation of the law than the one I would give it.

Mr. JOHNSON. Perhaps so.

Mr. FESS. I did not understand the law to which the Senator is now referring to forbid the Government lending to, say, a foreign corporation, such, for instance, as the Amtorg Corporation.

Mr. JOHNSON. I think the Senator is right about that. That enters into the question of the Russian situation, and the amendment that was incorporated at the very end of the bill, if the Senator will recall it, was written, in my view of it, for the sole purpose of enabling trade with Russia. It provided just this, if the Senator will observe:

> As used in this act the term "person" includes individual, partnership, corporation, or association—

And the amendment that was inserted and accepted was—> other than a public corporation created by or pursuant to special authorization of Congress, or a corporation in which the Government of the United States has or exercises a controlling interest, through stock ownership or otherwise.

Mr. FESS. I thought the Senator's reply to the Senator from Connecticut was to the effect that the Government could not lend to a foreign corporation.

Mr. JOHNSON. I did not say that at all. What I said was that they could not sell here the bonds or obligations of a foreign country which was in default to our Government.

Mr. FESS. That is what I understood to be the law.

Mr. JOHNSON. That is the law.

I was reading the third excerpt from Mr. Turlington's work:

> Despite the inability of the Mexican Government to borrow money in Europe—

This was after they had put upon Mexico an embargo in every bourse in Europe—

> Despite the inability of the Mexican Government to borrow money in Europe, the Diario Oficial was able to state at the beginning of the year 1882 that day after day new applications were being made for railway concessions. In July 1882 an issue of ₱10,000,000 of bonds of the Mexican National Railway Co., owned by the American capitalists who had 2 years before obtained a concession for the construction of railways from Mexico City to Laredo, Tex., and Manzanillo, on the Pacific coast, was offered on the London market. These bonds were secured by a Government subsidy of approximately $11,000 for each mile of construction, charged upon a percentage of the customs duties claimed by the London bondholders. A warning was accordingly issued to the public by the bondholders' committee. The immediate result was that the bonds were virtually withdrawn from the European market.

Thus we see that historically there has been done in Europe just exactly what we have been attempting to do by this very inoffensive measure, designed to protect our people from being defrauded as our Government has.

Mr. President, I quoted from the editorial of the New York Times. I am very glad to say that an English publication recently characterized, as I would not dare characterize it, what has been done in Britain and the boast that has been made there of the balancing of the budget and of the great surplus.

Is it not absurd to talk now about token payments when British finances are in the condition in which they are? But let me say, too, that a budget can be balanced very easily. I could balance my budget if I would not pay my debts, and any country on the face of the earth can balance its budget if it declines to pay its just obligations.

In the New English Weekly of Thursday, April 12, 1934, there appears this article:

> Before the blackbirds begin to sing on the opening of the budget next week it will be well to recall how the pie was made. Like the alleged revival of prosperity, the budget "surplus" has been specially manufactured for home consumption and by means that would ensure an ordinary company the prosecution of its directors. The "windfall" of the Ellerman estate——

If Senators have followed what occurred recently in London, and the boast that was made by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, they will recall the enormous sum that was received from a specific estate, and how the statement was cheered as he reported it to the Commons.

> The "windfall" of the Ellerman estate that accounts for a quarter of the "surplus" may perhaps be regarded as a piece of luck; but it is not luck, but sheer chicanery, that calmly proclaims a surplus consisting entirely of England's unpaid debt to America. It is difficult to appreciate the ethics of our financial purists and especially of those who profess to be concerned for the credit of England in the financial world. They acknowledge the legitimacy of the American debt in terms of their own rules of sound finance. They propose to resume payment on the same old terms as soon as possible. And yet, with the means of payment in their hands, in the form of a surplus wrung from the public for the purpose, they content themselves with a "token" that is even not big enough to rank as payment on account. It can be taken for granted that our naive cousins in America will fail to see the honorificabilitude (city English for old-fashioned honor) of patent fraud and the cooking of accounts. Plain downright French refusal to pay and damn the consequences they can understand. The attitude of Germany, likewise, is intelligible: To demand a world conference for the settlement not of one isolated debt but the whole strangling network of international debts; and, in the alternative, to invite her creditors to come and collect their debts of a rearmed nation. But our city's attitude of mixed purity and trickery is beyond the comprehension of anybody but crooks. We have still to see, however, the ultimate consequences of evasion. Certainly they are not likely to take an immediately violent form. America cannot put the bailiffs into the British Empire. Nevertheless, it can be confidently calculated that another long nail will have been driven into the coffin of the world's hopes that most unquestionably lie in cooperation between America and the British Commonwealth. Once again, in short, our city is proving itself the chiefest enemy of world peace.

Mr. President, I desire to congratulate the New English Weekly upon the forthright frankness of this particular article. I would not dare say such things. It would be worth two leading editorials in various of the great newspapers for me to indulge in any such language as this, and the names that would be called would be so many and so terrible that I would shrink the rest of my life from even reading a newspaper. I dare read what is here, because it is published by Englishmen in an English weekly.

In conclusion, Mr. President, let me say just this: The past is past. No one thus far, so far as I know, has been indulging in animadversions on our foreign debtors. I do not propose to indulge in such discussion any longer on this occasion. But I am looking forward to next month, June, when there will be due a payment from a nation which boasts that it is in a finer and better financial condition than any other nation on earth; I am looking forward to see whether at that time a nation, so circumstanced as it boasts no other nation is, will have the effrontery to offer a small "token" and beg to be relieved of the stigma of default. I do not believe that is possible, and I am perfectly certain that that will not occur; and, if it should, I feel certain there will be neither acquiescence nor acceptance by our Government.

THE NEW PHASE OF FOREIGN DEBT

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I have from time to time addressed the Senate respecting the subject of the foreign debts, referred to as the debts of our debtor countries. My view has not always met the approval either of my colleagues or of certain of the financial interest among the public.

I am moved today to something of an expression of vanity, let it be conceded, perchance confessed. Lately I informed this honorable body that there was a move afoot among foreign nations indebted to us to omit in their budgets any acknowledgment of the debts, either for token payments or as installment payments recognizing the obligation of the principal.

I was particularly attracted to the fact that, though the eminent Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], the able Senator from Ohio [Mr. FESS], the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS], the Senator from Missouri [Mr. CLARK], and one or two others of the very eminent Members of this body joined in the interpellations and took occasion to express their views on the subject of the obligations, it was noticeable that certain portions of our financial press made not the slightest reference to the debate or the queries, and part of our very eminent press made not the slightest allusion to the character of the effort of the President in the transaction to maintain peace and concord with the debtors, all in a manner that would sustain the honor of America.

Subsequently, sir, some days following the address I refer to, there developed just what had been intimated; and in conformance to my prophecy, predicting that there would be no reference in the financial budget of these eminent debtors to the debt to the United States, there came forth no reference but the ignoring. When it developed that such result was actually the fact, as had been detailed by me on the floor, I then again took the liberty to address this body and tell this honorable Senate how the development disclosed proved the accusation made as expressed here.

I there presumed, sir, to set forth again certain information which I said was authentic, without relating the source from which it came, that these eminent lands would soon boldly announce that they would default, and I gave as the reason, coming from myself only, the deduction that as we were on the eve of seeking by treaty some form of reciprocity in prospective trade, through exports and imports, the debtor nations would announce to us, "Before we will go any further with you gentlemen touching such negotiations, you must make us equals. We will not let you put us as debtors on one side of the table and you as creditor on the other side of the table, subordinating us in such a demeaned attitude that we deal at a disadvantage, as one in debt to you, from whom you may command a form of obedience as from an inferior—a predicament which we cannot avoid."

Five days after that speech, in which I said such would be exacted, the very complete statement was made by two of the eminent debtors, one that it was in default and would make no effort to go further, saying it could not; the other announcing through its officials that it had one other proposition to make to us, and it would make it as one which should cover the whole subject and conclude any further reference to the obligations, and if we accepted it, very well; and if we did not, it should be the end; that they then, following our refusal, would duplicate the action of a previous nation and cry out "default." That declaration was fulfilled in action literally.

I again invite attention to what to me is a most ominous sign. I know it will be charged, of course, as is familiar in these days, either that I am disappointed because of omission of publicity, or that I sought by my speech more public attention paid to me, or that in some way I have some grievance or some pique. Unhappily, always there is the charge that anything certain of this Membership shall utter shall be ascribed to something of that nature. I am reciting that I would be fortunate in escaping the long-endured catalog of single phraseology of being referred to as "picturesque", an expression which the eminent men of the Conning Tower, I should hope, would have improved upon as time goes on by the invention of a more seeming, more elastic, and more satirical phrase, and one which has not endured as stale matter for so extended a length of time. Or, perhaps, it would be more agreeable to those who fancy themselves capable of scientific ignoring to refer to the wardrobe I wore, to comment on my apparel as indicating a show master, and assert that the real reason for my speech was that I might display my habiliments. [Laughter.]

Of none of this, Mr. President, am I unconscious. Sometimes when I see eminent veteran Senators trying to define the smallest estimate of value to one action or property, I cannot but conclude that if they really wanted a standard by which to measure littleness or insignificance they need but contemplate the petty worth ascribed by the gentlemen of the Conning Tower of the press to a United States Senator. [Laughter.]

Mr. President, I make these allusions not because I am personally concerned what one may write concerning these things applicable to myself; but I am compelled to note that when a great question such as that of foreign debts has been debated by honorable gentlemen on both sides of the Chamber, serious as the expressions are, it should not have been referred to by certain of the eminent press, and particularly its financial section. I cannot but be moved to the thought of that strange form of propaganda which has been effective in certain quarters, which has already begun to influence certain of our very great press, that silence on the debts and refusal ever to refer to the foreign debts is the most effective means of avoiding the payment of the debts. It is reasoned that soon it would be asserted that the whole matter is obsolete, no longer dominant; that it should be wiped out as a nuisance, to be considered as a burden to be carried, and is therefore an affliction on the body politic; therefore, out with it! Luckily, we shall not have to take the line out of Macbeth, "Out, damned spot! out, I say!" as the most fitting to the new abhorrent feeling as to collection of these debts.

But, Mr. President, today I call to your attention the query, What is the meaning of this new transformation? The eminent financiers and gentlemen of the exchequer, meaning statesmen, of two of our great debtors, suddenly announced their intention of resuming consultations looking to the payment or the offering of some payment, at least to the presentation to our President of some proposition.

Our President is to be greatly consoled in his efforts, and greatly to be approved in his conduct, for his patience, his perseverance, his patriotism in keeping the debts properly before the public without disruption of our relations with either country, or making the world feel that we could have a conflict of so base a nature as breaking friendship over a mere matter of dollars and cents, deeply as we regret the loss of our money, and deeply as we deplore the need which we cannot supply. But, Mr. President, I will not stand and within myself concede that I am so very, very stupid as not to see the design now set afoot.

The eminent Senator from California has just made a reference to certain matters touching a bill he has before the Senate which many of us will understand. My eminent leader on this side, Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas, having considered the bill in its early inception, we of this side quite well knew the spirit of the bill wherein we could sustain the measure as an administrative one to the full extent which it could go. But, Mr. President, now come forward the debtors, and, with a very clear declaration, indicate that they will now consider anew the suggestion of some payment to be made to us, the creditor. At the same hour comes underground and subterraneously the proposition that, hiding itself first, to use the figure of the vermin, "under the sand", then comes forth now fully padded, that two of the private banking establishments of one of the debtors, and an official of the government of the other, have a proposition for a new loan from the United States, which the debtors feel they have a right to have; perchance, that their security would justify it.

As to that I have no remark to make, not having seen what is proposed; but I cannot overlook this new spirit of reviving a consideration of the honorable obligations, placing themselves apart from the previous proposition of default—as saying, "Gentlemen, pas un sou" from one, from the other, "not a cent"—utterly making the change of front with the prospect of a token payment from one, and asking for consultation by the other, at the time a new loan is whispered in the offing of the new stage; and this transaction just 2 days after the suggestion from eminent sources in these countries that the new loan would be launched as approved—"taken up", to use the language of finance—by America.

Mr. President, it may be that it will be a wise thing for America to do, for aught I know, when the proposition shall be made in the open; but America must not fail to be on guard and behold the difference between that which is straightforward to its object and that which assumes that greatest form of hypocrisy and for the moment dazzles the senses with the pretension of friendship and fraternal regard while with the hand of deception it rips the pocket open and filches its contents again, as has been done before too often.

Mr. President, our President is seeking to do all he can to keep the kind regard of one land with the other, and we are seeking as best we can to collect the debts which are due us; but, sir, there is another consideration, and it is the final one which I take the liberty of imposing upon my eminent colleagues. It is to protect the investors of America, for these loans are evidenced by bonds; these bonds are then taken up by the financial houses of the country; they are then transferred to the citizens of our country for consideration, and it is held out that they are an excellent investment and that their money is secure; and when such is done, then default occurs, as in the case of certain South American bonds, which, it is conceded, to the extent of $900,000,000 today cannot be collected in any sum, while committee upon committee is multiplied one after the other, and investigation upon investigation is piled up, and then further investigation of the investigators who made the investigation, and parleys follow until the subject is drawn out, patience becomes exhausted, and nature, no longer able to combat the contest, surrenders in subdued silence. I hope we shall not have that experience duplicated.

There is the country of Germany. I realize its unhappy state, its regrettable situation; but here are its bonds in America. Surely Germany is not going to take it for granted, because we have been whipped into a confused state and perplexed condition by the varying forms of the dealings with us by our ally debtors, that she can duplicate that situation and leave us as a creditor with not sense enough in the multiplicity of manipulations to guard our citizens, and as having become so weak in our resources as that we will surrender all the rights of our citizens by inaction. Mr. President, I trust we have reached the end of that practiced supineness, and that now it shall be given well to be understood that no loan to any country that is in debt to us, and that as to the debt manifests a spirit of unwillingness to pay us or to acknowledge the debt, will be permitted by this Government if in the processes of government it can be restrained.

It does not matter so much, let it be said, that a government may not be able to pay. That is not default. That misfortune deplored may be endured. The loss of our money may be regretted, but if in spirit one shows anxiety to pay the debt and acknowledge the obligation, that, sir, can be well taken into consideration, and these conditions in no wise of themselves restrain a new loan that is sought if, on the merits and the equity of it, it can be taken up with safety to the citizen; yet, sir, where a debtor defiantly refuses to recognize his obligations, and holds us out before the world as having been defeated by strategy, or having been eloigned by a very capable and subtly flowing method of seduction that we have not the resources of mind or method to deal with the humiliation—sir, if that attitude should be assumed by any debtor, such a debtor cannot be rewarded for his assumption, his daring, or contemptuous conduct by having himself again received by our land and sent back with his palms flowing with our money.

It is well we should state as soon as we can, and appropriately, our real relations. We ask only the dealings of honor between men and men and country and country, and here we stand on principle. We are behind the President in his effort in every way to maintain peace and friendship; we want the concord of every kindly relation that may lead us in the future and that may aid in the growth of foreign trade and domestic kindliness; but, before all, the condition of courage and conduct for the uses of trade is in the saving by America of her American citizenship and the honor of her land as the first consideration.

I trust the Senate will understand why I have burdened it for the moment by intruding these expressions as to the menace of a threatened indignity.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Chaffee, one of its clerks, announced that the House had agreed to the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H.R. 3900) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to pay subcontractors for material and labor furnished in the construction of the post office at Las Vegas, Nev.

The message also announced that the House had passed the following bills of the Senate, severally with amendments, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

S. 2080. An act to provide punishment for killing or assaulting Federal officers;

S. 2249. An act applying the powers of the Federal Government, under the commerce clause of the Constitution, to extortion by means of telephone, telegraph, radio, oral message, or otherwise;

S. 2252. An act to amend the act forbidding the transportation of kidnaped persons in interstate commerce;

S. 2253. An act making it unlawful for any person to flee from one State to another for the purpose of avoiding prosecution or the giving of testimony in certain cases;

S. 2575. An act to define certain crimes against the United States in connection with the administration of Federal penal and correctional institutions and to fix the punishment therefor;

S. 2841. An act to provide punishment for certain offenses committed against banks organized or operating under laws of the United States or any member of the Federal Reserve System; and

S. 2845. An act to extend the provisions of the National Motor Vehicle Theft Act to other stolen property.

REGULATION OF SECURITIES EXCHANGES

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 3420) to provide for the regulation of securities exchanges and of over-the-counter markets operating in interstate and foreign commerce and through the mails, to prevent inequitable and unfair practices on such exchanges and markets, and for other purposes.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, when we were discussing the pending bill, before this very illuminating interruption, the point at issue was as to section 15 respecting the exemption of intrastate securities which are unregistered. I have been discussing the matter with the able

Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES], the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY], and the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER]. At the suggestion of the Senator from South Carolina, I am not offering the amendment at the moment, because he desires to inquire further into its implications, but I do want the RECORD to show the precise thing upon which we are in tentative agreement. I am referring to an amendment on page 36, line 12, after the word "obligations", to insert a comma and the following language:

or unregistered securities, the market in which is predominantly intrastate.

I ask that this amendment be printed and lie upon the table pending the appropriate time to bring it up.

Mr. LEWIS. The amendment of the able Senator embodies some views which I myself should like to see incorporated in the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GEORGE in the chair). The amendment intended to be proposed by the Senator from Michigan will be printed and lie on the table.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I ask to have printed in the RECORD an article appearing in Today of April 21, entitled "High Pressure Propaganda in Wall Street's Raid on the New Deal."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The article referred to is as follows:

[From the Today, Apr. 21, 1934]

HIGH-PRESSURE PROPAGANDA IN WALL STREET'S RAID ON THE NEW DEAL

Wall Street's raid on the new deal promises to be a supreme example of the power of propaganda in this generation.

No one ought to object to legitimate propaganda, and it is not the purpose of this article to claim that people, high or low, should be condemned in any sense for presenting their arguments in whatever way is proper and effective. The purpose of this article is rather to demonstrate by a review of the drive against the Fletcher-Rayburn bill the extent and character of the opposition. The public, when apprised of the facts, may make its own judgment.

There is no more serious consideration in this drive than the fact that 95 percent of those who are registering opinions on the bill are not basing them on what the bill is, but upon what somebody told them about the bill.

This is a distinction of the greatest importance. Thousands of business men, bankers, and others have slavishly registered opinions they did not create for themselves, concerning a measure which they have not seen; they are predicting effects that might result from this bill that they have no right whatsoever to predict because they have not examined the facts.

They have allowed themselves to be used as rubber stamps by a concentrated minority which constitutes the interested parties. They have, as they probably have many times in the past, based their faith and confidence on the magic value of a tip—a few words from a source "said to be authoritative." They have surrendered the right, on the basis of which free government is said to exist, to make decisions of their own. Such is the nature of government by propaganda.

In February, when the President sent his message to the Congress asking for stock-exchange regulation, sentiment in favor of such legislation was strong throughout the country. One pulse-feeling agency which reads the papers of all the 184 cities of 50,000 or more that have daily newspapers, found almost literally not one dissenting note in their editorials.

The investigation of the Senate Banking and Currency Committee, under Ferdinand Pecora, had come to a climax not long before. Much that had been of common belief had been confirmed by the testimony. More that had not even been gossiped had been revealed.

In the columns of Today, Samuel Untermyer summed up the results of 20 years of study of stock-exchange conditions and presented a detailed plan for regulation under the Federal Government. The interdepartmental committee of the Cabinet completed its inquiry and submitted a plan identical in purpose but differing in the machinery proposed.

Securities and commodities exchanges, banking institutions, and associations began to give serious thought to changes in their forms of organization and in their practices. Similar situations had arisen in the past, but soothing promises had been sufficient to assuage them. Now, to their dismay, they found that the pledge of the Democratic national platform was to be carried out.

Immediately upon the receipt of the President's message the Fletcher-Rayburn bill was introduced. Its terms were unmistakable—"Wall Street" was not to be allowed to say what housecleaning should be done, or how. The bill was a prescription, and "Wall Street" had its choice of but two alternatives—to accept the bill or to form its lines for the hottest of fights.

The second choice was made. Not since the opposition to the railroad legislation of 30 years ago, or to the Federal Reserve legislation of 10 years later, had a comparable conflict drawn on. Nor, it may be added, had there been such a mobilization of forces.

CALL TO BATTLE

February 13 saw the first of these forces moved to the front. On that day Richard Whitney, president of the New York Stock Exchange, called into council representatives of 30 principal "wire houses." He outlined to them what he regarded as the bad features of the Fletcher-Rayburn bill. Promptly the call to action went out to all the branches of these 30 houses, located in every important city of the country. One of the messages read:

"This proposed national securities act (sic) is a matter of grave concern to every owner of real estate and securities, to all officials of corporations or banks, and to every policyholder. It is no exaggeration to say that very few of your friends and clients can afford to disregard this new menace to national recovery.

"We are mailing you a copy of the bill. Please study it. The more you study it, the worse it seems. Please discuss it with others and urge them to acquaint themselves with some of these vicious provisions.

"I am confident that if the country understands the bill, an overwhelming protest will arise."

In New York, Chicago, San Francisco, Boston, and Philadelphia plans were made for organized opposition. On February 15 the battle front was extended. Mr. Whitney sent a letter to all members of the New York Exchange and another to the presidents of 80 companies whose stocks were listed on the "big board." In the latter letter he said:

"These powers (under the terms of the Fletcher-Rayburn bill) are so extensive that the Federal Trade Commission might dominate and actually control the management of each listed corporation."

This was bringing an old, old enemy into the fight—the cherished belief that the Commission seeks earnestly and constantly to gain increased powers. Opposition to the bill strengthened perceptibly. Testifying before the Interstate Commerce Committee of the House, Mr. Whitney touched upon the new issue, but not as a primary point. He was confident that the bill gave the Commission power to manage the corporations of America, but he was saving his frontal attack for another time.

The time seemed to have come on February 28 when he appeared before the Senate Banking and Currency Committee. There he declared that the Commission was given absolute power over every corporation whose stocks or bonds were listed on the exchange. He added an opinion that had not been voiced before—that even corporations not in interstate commerce would come under this power.

A final suggestion was that the bill might have been written for the purpose of establishing a "nationalization of industry and business hitherto alien to the American theory of Federal Government."

Meanwhile the enlistment of support throughout the country was going on, especially among speculators and investors. Then the enlistment was extended to employees of brokerage houses. Eventually they were organized in 43 cities. A typical message was this, from Livingston & Co., of New York.

"Regarding Fletcher-Rayburn bill:

"Will you please ascertain and advise what is being done by concerted action of savings banks, corporations, lister or unlisted, insurance companies, in your territory in the way of organized effort for the fight on the above bill.

"Are your employees alive to the fact that with the passage of the bill a great many of them will be out of employment?

"Are they writing their Senators and Representatives? If not, they should do so at once, using their own note paper, not firm paper, and writing in their own way, protesting the passage of a bill which will rob them of employment. Please advise."

The results of the drive were unmistakable in Washington. Every mail brought protests. Brokers' employees wrote their Congressmen. (Some of them disobeyed the instructions to use their own stationery and some of them said frankly that they had been told to write.) Brokers telegraphed their members. Corporation officials expressed their judgment.

A new group made its appearance—borrowers who had been told that if the bill became law their collateral-supported loans would have to be called or, at best, greatly reduced; bankers who had been told that they would have to take such action; bankers outside the Federal Reserve System who, under the original terms of the bill, would have been barred from making loans to brokers and who did not know that this provision had been changed.

DRIVE BY MAIL IS PRESSED

Great quantities of mail came to the White House. As a matter of routine, it was sent to the Federal Trade Commission for acknowledgment. More than a few of these acknowledgments, especially those to the Pacific coast, came back stamped: "Unknown at address given."

Early in March the familiar device of mobilization of support from the colleges was begun. Theodore Prince, a broker of New York, took charge of this. To the professors he wrote:

"It seems that the power given to the bureaus or commissions named in the Fletcher-Rayburn bill is far beyond anything that was ever given to any individual, bureau, or commission. It means that such a bureau or commission would have economic power over every industry and corporation through control—indirectly—of the credit and capital sources and machinery by which corporation ownership and distribution is made possible.

"Does it not appear as though under the bill a tentative, partial control would be impossible—that it must be absolute and almost communistic? If that be so, should the bill not make that purpose and object clear to all?"

Mr. Prince testified that of the replies he received 39 were opposed and only 4 unqualifiedly in favor of the measure. Among these latter was prof. Nathan Miller, of the Carnegie Institute of Technology, Pittsburgh. He wrote Mr. Prince:

"I wish that we 'forgotten men' had the funds at our disposal which might make it possible for us to combat this type of propaganda you are emitting."

Suddenly the battle ceased to be an attack on the stock-exchange bill alone and became a drive on the new deal as a whole.

James H. Rand, Jr., commanded the troops of this spear head. As chairman of the Committee for the Nation and ostensibly in opposition to the stock exchange bill, Mr. Rand was a witness on March 23. He read then into the record the statement by Dr. William A. Wirt, superintendent of schools at Gary, Ind., which had been so categorical in its accusations that the "brain trusters" were planning "the overthrow of the established American social order", but which proved, at the hearing of the BULWINKLE committee on April 10, to be the opinion of his own, to which persons he thought were "satellites" of the brain trust had given what he took to be assent.

The cobweb character of Dr. Wirt's statement did not prevent its being turned to skillful account, however. It was seized upon as proof by those who were seeking proof. Its background was guarded against examination by any who refused to accept it as what it purported to be. It found, perhaps, wider newspaper publication than any other single piece of testimony during the hearings.

No detail of the Wall Street raid was more shrewdly directed. New themes were found in it for such sedulous disparagers of the new deal as Mark Sullivan and David Lawrence. New impetus was given to the whole drive and, incidentally, new distinctions for the Committee for the Nation.

The Committee for the Nation, it may be pointed out here, was in no small part a creation of Dr. Wirt himself, although he is not listed as an officer nor does his name appear among those of the members which the committee makes public. The authority for this attribution to Dr. Wirt is the active executive of the committee—Dr. Edward A. Rumely.

"It was Dr. Wirt", says Dr. Rumely, "who first had the idea of forming this group to do something about the economic crisis."

Dr. Rumely has not been in the public eye since 1924. For a period of nearly 10 years before that time, however, he was a conspicuous figure. He is a physician, with a degree from Freiburg; he founded the Interlaken School in Indiana; he took over his family's farm-machinery plant and expanded it into the Advance-Rumely Co.

In 1916 he was revealed as the real purchaser of the New York Evening Mail. When Dr. Rumely was accused of having bought the Evening Mail with German money (to secure a spokesman here for Germany during the World War) he took oath that no such money had been used.

Promptly, Dr. Rumely was indicted for perjury in making that statement. On November 4, 1920, he was found guilty, and sentenced to a term of a year and a day in the Atlanta Penitentiary. The Supreme Court refused to review the verdict, and then for 4 years influential friends sought Executive intervention in his behalf. Finally President Coolidge commuted the sentence to 1 year, which kept Dr. Rumely from the penitentiary. A month later, service of sentence having been begun, Mr. Coolidge reduced it to 1 month, and that term was duly served at Eastview, Westchester County.

Dr. Rumely is not listed as an officer of the Committee for the Nation. If you write the committee, however, he may answer you in its behalf. If you ask in person for information, you will be told that "when he returns", he will serve you. At the offices you will hear that he is the one actively in charge.

CAMPAIGN IS WIDENED

In this new phase the drive on the stock exchange bill has been widened particularly to take in the desirability of modifying the Securities Act and the "dangers" of the Wagner company union bill and the unemployment-insurance bill.

On April 4, for illustration, a special train carried to Washington a group of 175 Connecticut manufacturers to meet in conference with the whole Connecticut delegation in the Congress excepting only Representative MALONEY. All four of these bills were formally opposed.

As this is written opponents of the legislation list these organizations in their support:

United States Chamber of Commerce, National Association of Manufacturers, Association of Railway Executives, National Industrial Conference Board, American Bankers Association, National Association of Mutual Savings Banks, National Board of Fire Underwriters, the Merchants Association of New York, and Chambers of Commerce of Baltimore, Boston, Philadelphia, Detroit, Richmond, St. Louis, San Francisco, Buffalo, Cleveland, Toledo, Seattle, Harrisburg, San Jose, and Sacramento.

A steady shift of front has gone on, in the meantime, among the newspapers of the country. On February 23, 7 out of 10 editorials were favorable to the Fletcher-Rayburn bill; on February 24, 8 out of 10. Day by day, almost, the ranks of the newspaper supporters of the bill have thinned. There have been complete rights-about-face, perhaps the most interesting of them that of the Miami Herald. On February 24 it said:

"Mr. Whitney asked for another chance with some additional grant of power. Perhaps the exchanges could wipe out the evils more successfully than Federal laws, but the question remains as to why they have not done so."

By March 28, however, the Herald had evolved a new theory which enabled it to join the chorus against the pending regulation.

"If stocks are held down by the damper of margins", it said, "so will prices of grain and cotton be kept low in the pit, and they influence commodity prices generally. In other words, the Nation prospers through gambling. This may not be morally right, but nevertheless it is a fact."

Thus is developed one of the most extraordinary theories of human progress that has ever been enunciated. Perhaps the slogan of this new drive on the new deal might be borrowed from this Miami suggestion:

Prosperity through gambling.

President Roosevelt says: "A more definite and more highly organized drive is being made against effective legislation (for Federal supervision of stock exchanges) than against any similar recommendation made by me."

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I wish to call attention to the fact that I presented and had printed three amendments, which I wish to take up at the first opportunity. Perhaps if no other Senator desires to offer amendments, I may do so now. One amendment is on page 57, after line 9, to insert the following:

Title 2, amendment to the Securities Act—

And so forth.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. FLETCHER. I yield.

Mr. McNARY. I inquire if the Senator has secured action upon all the committee amendments?

Mr. FLETCHER. There are no committee amendments.

Mr. McNARY. None at all?

Mr. FLETCHER. No. I am referring now to an amendment——

Mr. McNARY. To the Securities Act?

Mr. FLETCHER. To an amendment which I have heretofore offered and which has been printed.

Mr. McNARY. I am curious to know, if there is any other amendment to the bill which is the unfinished business, why would it not be better to go forward and consider the amendments to the pending measure before we take up an amendment which relates to an entirely different subject?

Mr. FLETCHER. The amendments to which I have referred are amendments to the bill.

Mr. McNARY. I appreciate that; but does not one of the amendments referred to by the Senator affect and modify the existing Securities Act?

Mr. FLETCHER. One does modify it, but that is not so important.

Mr. McNARY. May I ask the able Senator from Florida is he offering amendments to be printed or for the consideration of the Senate at this time?

Mr. FLETCHER. The amendments have already been printed, and I was going to try to have considered the amendment which I suggested.

Mr. McNARY. That is what I understood.

Mr. FLETCHER. I also have an amendment with reference to the Securities Act. The other amendment was in reference to this bill on page 23, at the end of line 16, to strike out "two years" and insert in lieu thereof "one year"; and in line 18 to strike out "six years" and in lieu thereof to insert "five years." If it is desired, I can now present the amendments. I do not believe there will be any opposition at all to those amendments.

Mr. McNARY. I do not want to interfere with the Senator's plan of procedure, but would it not be the natural and logical way of proceeding if we were to consider all the amendments to the pending measure before taking up those pertaining to the Securities Act? I think that would be much better and would give notice to Members of the Senate that we intend to follow that course.

Mr. FLETCHER. Suppose I just offer this amendment now on page 23, line 16, to strike out "two years" and insert in lieu thereof "one year." It refers to the time in which suit must be brought. The bill provides for 2 years, and I am offering to make that 1 year. The bill carries a limitation of 6 years, and I am offering to make that 5 years. I think the bill itself allows too much leeway there. If any suit is to be brought, it ought to be brought within 1 year after knowledge of the breach of the agreement or misinformation or untrue statement; and then the time ought to be limited to 5 years.

Mr. WALCOTT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. FLETCHER. I yield.

Mr. WALCOTT. The two points referred to by the Senator from Florida were thoroughly discussed by the committee and, as I recall, there was no objection on the part of any member of the committee to the two amendments.

Mr. FLETCHER. I think the committee agrees to them.

Mr. KING. May I suggest to the Senator that he send the amendments to the desk and have them read, so that we may understand their proper relation to the bill?

Mr. FLETCHER. The amendments have been printed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendments proposed by the Senator from Florida will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 23, line 16, it is proposed to strike out "2 years" and insert in lieu thereof "1 year"; and in line 18 to strike out "6 years" and insert in lieu thereof "5 years".

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the amendments?

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I do not object to the first amendment; I think it is a perfectly proper amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the first amendment submitted by the Senator from Florida is agreed to.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. FLETCHER. I yield.

Mr. KING. With respect to the second amendment, may I ask the Senator if the committee considered the advisability of limiting the period to 4 years or 3 years? Six years is rather a long period. The statute of limitations in many of the States does not cover a period so long. It seems to me that suits brought for contractual violations under State laws must be brought within 2 years.

Mr. FLETCHER. The amendment provides 5 years instead of 6 years.

Mr. KING. I suggest that is rather a long period. It seems to me 3 or 4 years would be ample, and yet if the committee fully considered all phases of it, I shall not object.

Mr. FLETCHER. We went into it very carefully. I think in the Securities Act it is limited to 10 years. I have changed the other amendment which I shall offer to the Securities Act to conform to this amendment. That is why we are changing this provision, so as to make it conform to the Securities Act as we will eventually amend that act.

Mr. KING. There may be no relation between the Securities Act and the amendment now under discussion. Yet they may be so clearly integrated as that one ought to be determinative of the other.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, will the Senator from Florida yield?

Mr. FLETCHER. Certainly.

Mr. BYRNES. As a matter of fact, the language of the Securities Act to which the Senator from Florida has referred is similar to the language in this bill. The cause of action is based upon a false or misleading statement. To make the provisions of the two accord, it was determined to agree upon a final limitation of 5 years, and that suit must be brought within 1 year after discovery of the misleading or untrue statements. It is the same cause of action in each case.

Mr. KING. I think the Senator will agree that in most of the States an action for fraud or fraudulent representation resulting in damage must be brought within 2 years, according to my recollection, and the statute of limitations in some States is 3 or 4 years. I am not very particular, however, but it seems to me it was rather a long time.

Mr. BYRNES. Suit must be brought within 1 year after discovery of the statement, but the untrue or false statement might not be discovered for 4 years after its utterance. It means only that there is but 1 year after discovery of the statement in which action may be brought. In the States a suit may be brought within 4 years. It simply means that after 5 years or 6 years a suit may not be brought at all.

Mr. KING. In view of that explanation I shall offer no objection.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, is there any conflict between 2 years in the one case and 6 years in the other? Six years is the final limit. A good defense could be made if suit were brought within 6 years, even though the false statement had never been discovered until the action was brought. Why is not that a sufficient limitation? Why should we have one time fixed for the final limitation and another time fixed as a limitation based on the discovery of the fraud? There will be many cases where the fraud will not be discovered within a year.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, the thought was that a man ought not to delay suit more than 1 year after he discovers the fraud. If he has been injured and finds that he has been injured, he ought to bring his action within a reasonable time, and we fix that time at 1 year. If he has not discovered it, the person who made the misrepresentation or false statement ought to feel safe at some reasonable time that he will not be disturbed.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; that is true.

Mr. FLETCHER. So we fixed 5 years for that period. I think the Senator will agree that where a representation is made as to a security and a man buys it and finds the representation was false and that he was misled as to material facts and was damaged and had suffered a loss, he ought to act within 1 year after he makes the discovery.

Mr. NORRIS. But that is not the general rule applied in statutes. We fix a limitation in the statutes. Of course, it is arbitrary. Six years may be too long. I do not believe we ought in a law to have two limitations. That will lead to controversies untold. It will lead to a great deal of difficulty and a great deal of uncertainty.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NORRIS. It seems to me there is no reason why there should be two limitations in the same statute. I yield to the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. BARKLEY. It really is not two limitations. If a man makes no discovery of fraud within the time limit of the statute then he cannot sue at all. The lapse of the 5 years or the 6 years, whichever may be finally fixed, bars him from bringing suit at all where he has made the discovery. But if within that time he makes discovery of fraud and damage, then he is required to bring his suit within 1 year after such discovery. It does not extend the real statute of limitations. It simply requires that within that statute of limitations, if he makes discovery of fraud, he must bring his suit within 1 year. There is really no conflict between the two provisions.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I think the explanation is very clear. Suppose a person against whom a fraud was committed did not discover it until 6 years and 1 day; then no action would lie. If he discovered it 5 years after the fraud, then he must bring it before the expiration of the 5 years. If he discovers it 1 day after the fraud was committed he must bring it within 1 year. I think there is no conflict.

Mr. NORRIS. I think there is no misunderstanding as to what it means. I agree to all that.

Mr. KEAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; I yield.

Mr. KEAN. I should like to point out to the Senator that if a man buys something today and discovers tomorrow that some mistake has been made and perhaps he has a ground for suit because of fraud, under the terms of the bill he must bring his suit within 1 year. But suppose he thinks, "Perhaps the bonds I have bought will go up. I will not bring suit until I find out about that. If the bonds go down then I will have the option of suing these people and trying to recover. If the bonds go up, then I will not sue because I can get a profit on them."

Mr. NORRIS. In the case the Senator puts it will not be a ground for suit because the bonds go up or down. That will not be a good reason for suit unless the purchaser has been guaranteed that they will not go down, which he never would be. That will not happen. It is not a ground for fraud of itself that the bonds happen to go down after they have been bought. There is no fraud in that.

Mr. KEAN. But if he finds some technical mistake in the statement that has been put out, he might say to himself, "I have something that I can sue on if these bonds go down. If they go up I will not want to sue because I will get a profit on them, but should they go down, then I have the option of suing."

Mr. NORRIS. Suppose we take that case and the man who bought the bonds thinks that. He has the option of bringing his suit for damages under the statute. If there is a statute of limitations against that suit he has to bring it within that time.

Mr. KEAN. Yes; he has to bring it within 1 year under the terms of the bill now before us.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not see why there should be any difference, why there should be two periods of limitation. As a matter of fact, this is what would happen as a rule:

If we say that the man who is defrauded must bring an action within 1 year after he discovers the fraud when the general statute of limitations is 6 years or 5 years, what he would do, what he ought to do, what everybody would want him to do to save litigation and expense, would be at once to enter into negotiations with the man who had defrauded him, to see if he could not make a settlement with him, to see if he could not reach some conclusion with him. A year's time is not enough for that. There would be, on the one hand, a continual object in trying to delay any settlement that might occur, in order that the year's statute of limitations might run. When some other man commenced a suit later, the defense undoubtedly would be, if that had happened, "Why, you had notice of what you claimed to be a fraud by the action that the other man commenced", and at once litigation would arise as to whether or not the man had discovered the fraud. The parties would be trying a side issue.

If there is a statute of limitations fixing the time, that is settled definitely. If there are two statutes, there always will be a defense made, or practically always, as I look at it, if the first time has expired, that the man had notice of whatever happened. It may be that there has been court notice in a suit to which he was not a party. Some other person has sued, and has been successful or unsuccessful; but it would be charged on the one hand that notice of the suit was notice to the world, and that this man had really had notice, and that he did not commence his suit within a year's time after that.

Running all through the statutes that we pass—criminal statutes and civil statutes—there is a statute of limitations. Everybody concedes that it is a wise thing to have a statute of limitations. I am not contending otherwise. There ought to be a limitation; but I think the passage of this bill with these two limitations in it would invite litigation. We should be giving an opportunity to the defendants in a case where a charge of fraud is made to try to get into the case notice of something that happened before they were sued.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield there?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. BARKLEY. It seems to me that the contrary is more liable to happen. By putting in a limitation of 1 year after the discovery of the fraud, we are actually limiting the possibility of litigation. If we should strike that out we would have a straight period of 6 years in which anybody damaged could bring suit. Whether or not he discovered the damage 3 years after it was actually perpetrated, he would still have 6 years from the actual perpetration of the fraud in which to bring the suit. So, when we say, "Although you discovered the fraud within a month or within 6 months after it was committed, you have to bring suit within a year, or you cannot bring it at all", we actually limit rather than encourage litigation. Otherwise, the man could go on until the end of 5 years, although he had known about the fraud all the time, and still bring his suit.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, that is not a limitation, as I see it. It will be the contrary. If we desire to make a limitation of a year, while I am opposed to that—I think it is too short—that would end it all, and that ought to end it all, whatever the limitation is.

Suppose, however, that bonds are sold and that there is some fraud connected with their sale. Some of them are sold in California, and others are sold in Maine. The man in Maine discovers within a year that a fraud has been committed. He may commence suit in Maine, and 4 years later the man in California may commence suit. In either case the man does not know of the fraud until he himself discovers it. The man in California commences his suit within a year after he discovers the fraud; but the defense is that the case in Maine has given notice to the world of the alleged fraud, and that notice of it is bound to be taken in California and in every other place under the jurisdiction of our courts.

We may have limited litigation in that way; but, as a matter of fact, if that is a good defense, we have shut out a great many people who otherwise would have been in.

Mr. BYRNES rose.

Mr. NORRIS. Let me finish.

The suggestion made by the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY] is, I think, a repetition of the suggestion he made the first time he interrupted me. If litigation such as I have described should be instituted, we would have invited litigation that would result in the end, if it should be successful, in the defense of the men who were guilty of the fraud; and we might limit it in the first place to 1 year just as well as to have two limitations in the bill, as I see it.

To repeat what I said before, such a limitation as is proposed here will prevent the settlement of cases. The man will have to go to law at once. Suppose he discovers 6 months after purchasing bonds that there has been what he claims to be, fraud in the sale and the representations that were made. Immediately upon discovering that something is wrong, very likely he will privately claim to the defendant in the case that he has been defrauded. He will try to make a settlement. If he makes a prompt settlement, it will prevent litigation. If he does not make a prompt settlement, when the negotiations are only half through he will have to commence suit. He has not time enough.

These negotiations will be carried on at first by correspondence, I presume, mostly from all parts of the United States into New York City; and we shall be limiting any negotiations that might result in avoiding litigation by making the time for negotiations in regard to settlement so short that ordinarily they will not be completed within the prescribed time, thereby forcing a man to go into court when otherwise he probably would stay out considerably longer; and if that were the case, it might result in no court action whatever. In that sense we should be increasing litigation by what is proposed here.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. BYRNES. Ordinarily I should be disposed to agree with the Senator that a provision of this kind would require suit to be brought too quickly. There were, however, two questions confronting us. The point has been made that if fraud should be discovered after 2 years, suit could be brought within 10 years. It was argued, and with considerable force, that, inasmuch as the particular suit referred to in this section might be a suit against the directors of a corporation for omission to state a material fact in securing the registration of an issue, it would deter men from serving on boards of directors, because the man might die and his estate would be liable possibly 8 years after his death to a suit brought by an individual.

Mr. NORRIS. That would not be true under this language.

Mr. BYRNES. I am just giving the Senator the background, so that he will understand it. In considering the subject, since even those charged with the administration of the proposed law were of the opinion that that provision might be modified, it was agreed that we should modify it to the extent of providing that if a man discovered the falsity of a statement, or the omission to state a material fact, and wished to sue the director of a corporation, he ought to bring suit within 1 year; but, knowing that he might not possibly learn of the falsity or omission for some years, we provided that it must be done within 5 years, and this provision was then changed to accord with the amendment which the Senator from Florida has offered.

I think the Senator is familiar with the purpose; but there were two things to be considered. Looking at the matter from the standpoint of the director of a corporation, one was that we should bring to an end his fear, or the fear of his estate, of a suit. At the same time we desired to preserve the right of a man who might not discover the falsity of a statement for 4 years, because in the very nature of things he might not do so; but, upon discovery, he should not be denied the right to bring a suit.

The Senator and I will agree that there is nothing sacred about any particular period for a statute of limitations. Whether it is 6 years, as in my State, or 5 years, as in some other States, it is always arbitrary; and, admittedly, this is arbitrary.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. BYRNES. I see the Senator's position that fixing a short period may result in the man's bringing suit when otherwise he will not do so. It may. I might advise a director that I am going to bring a suit in the hope of getting a settlement. Some suits might be encouraged if I were not permitted to negotiate. At the same time, from the standpoint of the director, the more quickly he knows whether or not he is liable, the better. Therefore, within a year I can file a suit, and then I can continue to negotiate and try to arrange a settlement.

Mr. NORRIS. Oh, yes. We can always do that, of course, in any lawsuit.

Mr. BYRNES. We can always do that. There is not any sanctity about the 2-year period or the 1-year period. We were just trying to agree upon something that would be just and fair to both sides.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator now is speaking, however, of a man who might be liable who dies, and whose estate might be liable. That would be true if we made the period 1 year. His estate might be liable at any time within 6 years under the language as it stands now.

Mr. BYRNES. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. If the suit were commenced within that statute of limitations, if it were like the suit from Chicago the other day, it might last 11 years longer, and somebody else might die of old age before getting through with it.

Mr. BYRNES. The only difference is that this period is 5 instead of 10 years, as was provided under the Securities Act of 1933. This is just 5 years better; that is all.

Mr. NORRIS. I myself think that 10 years is too long.

Mr. BYRNES. It is too long.

Mr. NORRIS. I realize that honest men might disagree as to what the time should be.

Mr. BYRNES. Of course where a period is fixed arbitrarily, men will disagree about it.

Mr. NORRIS. But what we ought to do here is to fix just one limitation and stop at that. It ought to be more than 1 year. I have no doubt about that.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President——

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, may I venture an observation?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; I yield.

Mr. ADAMS. In the explanation made by the Senator from South Carolina, he points to the liability that might come to a director by reason of a statement that was not true. That is not all that is covered by this provision. It provides causes of action for willful fraud. Where willfully false statements have been made, and people have been led into making investments under false statements and in order to recover under this provision the plaintiff must prove that the false statement was willful, it seems to me that a limitation of a year is entirely inadequate.

Mr. NORRIS. I think so.

Mr. ADAMS. It seems to me that the provisions originally incorporated in the bill should be allowed to stand as they are. They were discussed with a good deal of care in the committee; and to say that a man shall be shut off within 1 year after the discovery of a willful fraud upon him, when, as the Senator from Nebraska explains, the victim may live in California and the fraud may be perpetrated in New York, is to fix altogether too short a period.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. BYRNES. Whether the man lives in California or in Colorado, if he discovers the willful fraud, what difference is there in the matter of time? Why could he not bring suit within 12 months after he found that John Jones had defrauded him?

Mr. ADAMS. He could, Mr. President, but it is true that the ordinary statutes provide limitations of 3, 5, and 6 years, and very rarely does a man gather himself together and consult his attorneys and others within a year. It would be found that four fifths of the cases where recoveries might be had would be lost. We would not be eliminating lawsuits altogether; we would just be eliminating recoveries.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator from Nebraska yield?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. Of course, there are different sorts of statutes of limitation. In the matter of a personal injury, for instance, where, of course, a man knows whether he is injured or not, all the States require that he should sue within a certain length of time. In my State it is a year. He must bring a suit within 12 months after a personal injury. There are different limitations fixed in different statutes of limitation. For instance, in the case of an open account, the statute begins to run from the incurring of the debt. There are different periods of limitations upon promissory notes and upon contracts, written and unwritten.

In the bill it is proposed that we give anybody 5 years in which to discover whether he has been defrauded or not, so that the 5-year limitation fixes the ultimate period of limitation when he can bring suit. But if a man discovers within 6 months, or 1 month, after he has been defrauded, that he has been defrauded—and he knows it just as well then as he would know it 3 years from that date—it does seem that he ought not to be allowed to let the whole period of the limitation run and within a week or two of its expiration bring suit on a transaction when he knew 4 years before that he had a right to sue.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, that is true in the case of every statute of limitations. I do not know an exception to it. A man may begin suit immediately, or he may wait and begin just before the statute expires.

I think we should not neglect to consider what the Senator from Colorado has said about this matter. There would be a burden of proof on one man to show something it would be difficult for him to show. Perhaps he would have to go into the enemy's camp to get his evidence. I think that in 9 cases out of 10, under this kind of a statute, when they got to trial the question would arise whether the man had notice or whether he did not, what constituted notice, and how much he ought to have known about it.

Probably after he first discovers that something is wrong he will have a weary time of it before he ferrets it out and finds out what the facts were. He may have to make considerable investigation. Yet, before he can decide, on his own judgment or on the judgment of his attorney, whether he has a valid action against his adversary or not, he may have to make a lot of investigation, and when they get to trial the first claim that will be made on the part of the defendant may be that the statute of limitations of 1 year has run against the plaintiff. That will date from the very beginning of his investigation. That will date from the very first knowledge he had that there was anything wrong with the case.

I think this would react in favor of the man who committed the wrong, if a wrong were committed, and in my judgment he would not be entitled to consideration as against the man who has been wronged.

Mr. DUFFY. Mr. President, I desire at this time to send to the desk an amendment I intend to propose to the pending bill. I ask that it be printed and lie on the table, and I will call it up at the proper time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be received, printed, and lie on the table.

Mr. BULKLEY. Mr. President, I send to the desk an amendment which I intend to propose to the pending bill. I ask that it be printed and lie on the table. I will discuss it later.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment will be received, printed, and lie on the table.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I present an amendment, which I should like to have printed and lie on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment will be received, printed, and lie on the table.

Mr. KEAN. Mr. President, I send to the desk sundry amendments to be proposed to the pending bill, and ask that they be printed and lie on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendments will be received, printed, and lie on the table.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I am not concerned very greatly about whether the limitation of time within which a suit may be brought after discovery is made 1 year or 2 years. I think there is no question of principle involved in the matter. It is just a question of whether, after a man discovers that he has been defrauded by a false statement as to some stock, or by the omission of a material fact, he shall be allowed 1 year or 2 years within which to bring suit after he makes the discovery.

I would not believe it wise to follow the suggestion of the Senator from Nebraska to the extent of providing for only one period of limitation, because if we did that, we would make the limitation apply not only to the discovery of the fraud, but to the committing of the fraud also, so that a man would be barred at the end of 5 years, or 4 years, or whatever time we fix, from bringing a suit for damages upon a false representation or a material ommission, no matter when he might have discovered the fraud.

If we want simply to say that no suit under any circumstances shall be brought after 3 years, we have a right to do that, or we have a right to fix the limit at 4 years, or 5 years, or at any other period. But I do believe that we must keep in mind the difference between the statute of limitations running against the actual commission of a fraud, and the discovery of the fraud.

In the bill as it is written we give a man 6 years in which to discover whether or not a fraud has been committed on him. After that 6-year period he cannot bring suit. He might discover the fraud 5 years 11 months and 29 days after it was committed, but he could still bring suit, if he brought it on the thirtieth day, or on the first day after he made the discovery.

If he discovers the fraud 1 month after it is committed, should there not be a reasonable limitation upon his power to hold over the opposite party for 5 or 6 years the possibility of a suit? Should we not require him to bring the suit within a reasonable time after he discovers that he has been defrauded, but not in any case to bring it after the lapse of 5 or 6 years, as the case may be, depending on what we do with this amendment?

I think we have to consider this proposed statute of limitations in a little different light from that in which we consider ordinary statutes of limitations. Most statutes begin to run from the time of the commission of the act, either the making of a note or the commission of some tort against the person of a plaintiff, the damaged party. We have to differentiate between the situation where it is not difficult to discover when a right of action accrues and another situation where it may take years to discover that a right of action has accrued.

It would be manifestly unfair, it seems to me, to limit any damaged party to 1 year or 2 years or 3 years in the bringing of a suit, because it may sometimes take 4 or 5 years to discover that a fraud has been committed in a statement of facts or in the omission of a statement with reference to a share of stock or a report which may be made based upon the condition of a company. So that we cannot adopt a rule, it seems to me, applicable to these transactions which we would adopt in establishing an ordinary statute fixing a time after which a man could not bring a suit.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield.

Mr. AUSTIN. I inquire of the Senator from Kentucky whether he does not recognize another exceptional circumstance in that the burden of proof is shifted around on the question of knowledge or willfulness in a misrepresentation. The committee have put the burden upon the defendant, so that in this case the plaintiff does not have to spend any time going out and seeking his evidence. All he has to prove is the fact of misrepresentation.

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes.

Mr. AUSTIN. And thereupon it becomes the duty, or burden, of the defendant, to clear himself of knowledge or willfulness.

Mr. BARKLEY. That is true. All the plaintiff would have to do would be to prove that there had been a misrepresentation, and that he had discovered it on such a date, so as to bring his suit within the time prescribed. Then the burden of proof would shift to the defendant.

Mr. NORRIS. Why should it not shift?

Mr. BARKLEY. I am not objecting to that at all. It is in the bill, and I am for it.

Mr. NORRIS. If there has been any fraud in the way of a misrepresentation, there is one party who knows about it, and that is the party who makes the misrepresentation.

Mr. BARKLEY. That is true, and I am for the provision. I think the burden of proof ought to shift to the man who is guilty of fraud. But we must recognize that that does present a different kind of procedure from the ordinary lawsuit, where the burden of proof is on the man who alleges fraud to prove that fraud has been committed. As I said, I am not concerned with whether the limit is fixed at 1 year or 2 years after the discovery, but I think there ought to be a limitation after the discovery has been made within the limit of 5 years.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection——

Mr. NORRIS. No, Mr. President; I am not making this objection for fun. I want a vote. I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The yeas and nays have been requested. Is the request seconded?

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. NORRIS. Then, Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nebraska suggests the absence of a quorum. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Adams	Bulkley	Cutting	Goldsborough
Ashurst	Bulow	Davis	Gore
Austin	Byrd	Dickinson	Hale

Mr. LEWIS. I announce the absence of the Senator from California [Mr. McADOO], occasioned by illness; the absence of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BAILEY], and the absence of the Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL], made necessary by official business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Seventy-six Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I ask for a division of the question. Here are two propositions, one to strike out the limitation to 2 years and insert in lieu thereof "1 year", the other to strike out "6 years" and to insert in lieu thereof "5 years."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state to the Senator from Nebraska that the first amendment has been agreed to.

Mr. NORRIS. When did that happen?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Before the debate commenced on the other amendment.

Mr. NORRIS. That is the part of the amendment I have been debating, and it has been the subject of debate ever since the motion was introduced.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a request for reconsideration of the vote by which it was agreed to?

Mr. NORRIS. I did not know that it had been agreed to. I ask that the vote by which it was agreed to be reconsidered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request submitted by the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. NORRIS. The amendment proposing to strike out "2 years" and insert in lieu thereof "1 year" is the only one in which I am interested.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, the other amendment does not involve that question.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I shall not oppose the change in line 18, on page 23, from 6 years to 5 years.

Mr. BARKLEY. That has not been voted on.

Mr. NORRIS. That is what I understood, but the Chair said otherwise.

Mr. BARKLEY. The first amendment was voted on.

Mr. NORRIS. That is the one I have been discussing, and the one we have all been discussing; and if it is true that it has been agreed to, we have all been "talking through our hats" all this while. Was the vote reconsidered, Mr. President?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the vote by which the amendment was agreed to will be reconsidered.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, since many Senators have just come in, I desire to say that I was trying to get a roll call, and I did not get a sufficient number to second my request. I think we are entitled to a roll call. If we can get it I will take my seat. If we cannot get it I shall have to keep on.

The amendment is on page 23, line 16. The language as it read now is:

> No action shall be maintained to enforce any liability created under this section, unless brought within 2 years after the discovery—

And so forth. The amendment offered by the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] is to strike out "2 years" and insert "1 year." That is the vote on which we are dividing now.

Mr. President, I think this is a very important amendment, and I think we ought to have a roll call of the Senate on it. I again ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. FESS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS]. Not knowing how he would vote, I am compelled to withhold my vote. If permitted to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. FLETCHER (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. HATFIELD]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BAILEY], who is necessarily detained, and vote "yea."

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED]. Not knowing how he would vote, I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL] and vote "yea."

Mr. WALCOTT (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from California [Mr. McADOO]. I am informed that he would vote as I intend to vote, and I am therefore at liberty to vote. I vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. LEWIS. I announce my general pair with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. HEBERT]. I transfer that pair to my colleague the junior Senator from Illinois [Mr. DIETERICH], who is necessarily absent. I vote "yea."

Mr. WAGNER (after having voted in the affirmative). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. PATTERSON]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] and permit my vote to stand.

Mr. BULKLEY (after having voted in the affirmative). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CAREY], who is unavoidably detained from the Senate. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. COOLIDGE] and allow my vote to stand.

Mr. STEPHENS (after having voted in the affirmative). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Indiana [Mr. ROBINSON]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Iowa [Mr. MURPHY] and allow my vote to stand.

Mr. FESS. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED], the Senator from Indiana [Mr. ROBINSON], and the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. HATFIELD].

I also wish to announce that the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. HEBERT], the Senator from Delaware [Mr. HASTINGS], the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CAREY], and the Senator from Maine [Mr. WHITE] are detained on official business.

Mr. LEWIS. I desire to announce the following general pairs:

The senior Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] with the Senator from Maine [Mr. WHITE]; and

The result was announced—yeas 45, nays 30, as follows:
